DUCTOR DUBITANTIUM;

OR, THE RULE OF CONSCIENCE.

-------------------	----

BOOK I.

OF CONSCIENCE, THE KINDS OF IT, AND THE GENERAL RULES OF CONDUCTING THEM.

CHAPTER I.

THE RULE OF CONSCIENCE IN GENERAL.

	PAGE
RULE I.
Conscience is the Mind of a Man, governed by a Rule, and measured by the Proportions of Good and Evil, in order to Practice; viz. to Conduct all our Relations, and all our Intercourse, between God, our Neighbours, and ourselves: that is, in all moral Actions	55
RULE II.
The Duty and Offices of Conscience are to dictate, and to testify or bear witness; to accuse or excuse; to loose or bind	61
RULE III.
Be careful that Prejudice or Passion, Fancy and Affection, Error or Illusion, be not mistaken for Conscience	70
RULE IV.
The Conscience of a vicious Man is an evil Judge, and an imperfect Rule	73
RULE V.
All Consciences are to walk by the same Rule; and that which is just to one, is so to all, in the like circumstances	74
RULE VI.
In Conscience, that which is first, is truest, easiest, and most useful	74
RULE VII.
Conscience by its several Habitudes and Relations or Tendencies towards its proper Object, is divided into several Kinds	75

CHAPTER II.

OF THE RIGHT OF SURE CONSCIENCE.

RULE I.

A right Conscience is that which guides our Actions, by right and proportioned Means, to a right End	77
--	----

	PAGE		PAGE
RULE II.		RULE II.
In a right Conscience, the practical Judgment, that is, the last Determination to an Action, ought to be sure and evident	77	A probable Conscience may be made certain	125
RULE III.		RULE III.
The practical Judgment of a right Conscience is always agreeable to the speculative Determination of the Understanding	78	Of two Opinions equally probable, one may be safer	138
RULE IV.		RULE IV.
A Judgment of Nature, or Inclination, is not sufficient to make a sure Conscience	91	An Opinion speculatively probable, is not always practically the same	139
RULE V.		RULE V.
When two Motives concur to the determination of an Action, whereof one is virtuous, and the other secular, a right Conscience is not prejudiced by that Mixture	92	The greater Probability destroys the less	140
RULE VI.		RULE VI.
An Argument not sufficient nor competent, though it do persuade us to a Thing in itself good, is not the Ground of a Right, nor a sufficient Warrant for a sure Conscience	97	When two Opinions seem equally probable, the last Determination is to be made by collateral Inducements	142
RULE VII.		RULE VII.
A Conscience determined by the Counsel of wise Men, even against its own Inclinations, may be sure or right	101	It is not lawful to change our practical Sentence, while the same Probability remains	144
RULE VIII.		RULE VIII.
He that sins against a right and sure Conscience, whatever the Instance be, commits a great Sin, but not a double one	102	A Probability is not to be followed, except in great Necessity	145
RULE IX.		RULE IX.
The Goodness of an Object is not made by Conscience, but is accepted, declared, and published, by it, and made personally obligatory	110	Multitudes of Authors is not ever the most probable Inducement	146
CHAPTER III.		RULE X.
OF THE CONFIDENT OR ERRONEOUS CONSCIENCE.		In following the Authority of Men, the Choice is wholly to be conducted by Prudence	149
RULE I.		RULE XI.
An erroneous Conscience defined	113	A probable Opinion may be lawfully deposed, upon Confidence of the Sentence of another	153
RULE II.		RULE XII.
An erroneous Conscience binds us to Obedience, but not so as a right Conscience does	114	He that inquires of several Doctors until he find one answering according to his Mind, cannot by that Inquiry make his Conscience safe	154
RULE III.		RULE XIII.
An erring Conscience is a cause of Sin	118	A Man may sometimes answer against his own Opinion	155
RULE IV.		RULE XIV.
It is a greater Sin to do a good Action against our Conscience, than to do an evil Action in obedience to it	119	The Guide of Souls may sometimes proceed according to the Conscience of the Penitent	155
RULE V.		RULE XV.
It is not lawful to delight in an evil Action, after the Discovery of our Error	120	The probable Sentence of a Prudent Man, is more than a probable Warranty to Actions otherwise undeterminable	155
RULE VI.		CHAPTER V.
Conscience is to be obeyed even against the Commandment of our Superiors	120	OF A DOUBTFUL CONSCIENCE.
RULE VII.		RULE I.
An abused Conscience ought to be reformed by the Will, and contrary Reason	122	A doubtful Conscience defined	156
RULE VIII.		RULE II.
The Error of a Conscience is not always to be opened to the erring Person	123	A negative Doubt binds only to Caution and Observance	157
CHAPTER IV.		RULE III.
OF THE PROBABLE, OR THINKING CONSCIENCE.		A privative Doubt cannot obstruct a prudent Inducement	158
RULE I.		RULE IV.
A probable Conscience defined	124	In Doubts of Right, or Law, we are always bound to inquire; but in Doubts of Fact not always	158
		RULE V.
		In Doubts the safer Part is to be chosen	159
		RULE VI.
		The Conscience may act against a speculative Doubt	162

	PAGE		PAGE
RULE VII.		RULE XII.
Every Judgment of the Conscience is sufficient for the Deposition of a Doubt	163	The Exactness of natural Laws may be allayed by Equity	215
RULE VIII.		CHAPTER II.
Of two contrary Precepts, the more binding is preferable	164	OF THE LAW OF NATURE, OR OF ALL MANKIND, AS IT IS COMMANDED, DIGESTED, AND PERFECTED, BY OUR SU- PREME LAWGIVER, JESUS CHRIST, VIZ. OF THE CHRIS- TIAN LAW, THE GREAT RULE OF CONSCIENCE.
CHAPTER VI.		RULE I.
OF THE SCRUPULOUS CONSCIENCE.		The Law of Jesus Christ is more obligatory than the Old Testament	216
RULE I.		RULE II.
A scrupulous Conscience defined	176	The Ceremonial Law is void	218
RULE II.		RULE III.
A Conscience sufficiently instructed by proper Argu- ments, may proceed to Action against the Scruple	178	The Judicial Law of Moses is annulled	221
RULE III.		RULE IV.
He that is troubled with Scruples, ought to rely upon the Judgment of a prudent Guide	179	The Ten Commandments of Moses are not a perfect Digest of the Law of Nature	241
RULE IV.		RULE V.
When a Doubt is resolved in the Entrance of an Action, we must judge of our Action by the same Measures as before	179	Explications of the Moral Law, found in the Old Testa- ment, are Parts of the Moral Law	243
RULE V.		RULE VI.
Remedies of a scrupulous Conscience	180	Every Thing in the Decalogue is not obligatory to Christians	244
BOOK II.		RULE VII.
CHAPTER I.		There is no state of Men or Things, but is to be guided by the Proportion of some Rule or Precept in the Christian Law	273
OF THE LAW OF NATURE IN GENERAL.		CHAPTER III.
RULE I.		OF THE INTERPRETATION AND OBLIGATION OF THE LAWS OF JESUS CHRIST.
The Law of Nature defined	183	RULE I.
RULE II.		In negative Precepts the Affirmatives are commanded; and in the affirmative Commandments, the Negatives are included	283
The Law of Nature is the Foundation of all Laws, and the Measure of their Obligation	196	RULE II.
RULE III.		When a Negative and an Affirmative seem opposite in any Sense, the Affirmative is to be expounded by the Negative, not the Negative by the Affirmative	286
The greatest Band of the Law of Nature is Fear of Punishment	197	RULE III.
RULE IV.		In the affirmative and negative Precepts of Christ, not only what is in the Words of the Commandment, but whatsoever is symbolical or alike, is equally forbidden or commanded	287
The second Band of Virtue is Love	199	RULE IV.
RULE V.		When any Thing is forbidden by the Laws of Jesus Christ, all those Things are forbidden also which fol- low from that forbidden Action, and for whose Sake it was forbidden	290
The Imperfection of civil Laws is supplied by natural Obligation	201	RULE V.
RULE VI.		The Laws of Jesus Christ are the Measures of the Spirit, and are always to be extended to a spiritual Signification	292
Criterion of Sins against the Laws of Nature	205	RULE VI.
RULE VII.		The imperate Acts of one Commandment must not contradict the elicit Acts of another	295
Actions forbidden by the Law of Nature are not only unlawful but also void	206	RULE VII.
RULE VIII.		All those Things also, by which we come to a forbidden Sin, are understood to be forbidden by the same Law	297
An Act forbidden by the Law of Nature for the Turpi- tude of the Action, is also void, when the Turpitude remains	207	RULE VIII.
RULE IX.		Suppositive Propositions are always equivalent to a Commandment	299
The Law of Nature can be dispensed with, by the Divine Power	208
RULE X.
The Law of Nature cannot be dispensed with, by any human Power	212
RULE XI.
That the Obligation to a natural Law does cease in any Particular, is to be declared by the public Voice	214

	PAGE		PAGE
RULE IX.		RULE VII.
The Institution of a Rite or Sacrament is a direct Law	300	That a Law should oblige the Conscience, does not depend upon the Acceptation of the Law by the People	406
RULE X.		RULE VIII.
If the Sense of a Law be dubious, we are sometimes to expound it by Liberty, sometimes by Restraint	307	Human Laws of indifferent Matter do not oblige the Conscience of the Subjects out of the Dominions of the Superior	408
RULE XI.		RULE IX.
Positive Laws cannot be dispensed with by any human Power	312	Obedience to Laws is to be paid according to what is commanded	409
RULE XII.		CHAPTER II.
Not every Thing, that is in the Doctrine of Jesus Christ, was intended to bind as a Law	317	OF LAWS PENAL AND TRIBUTARY.
RULE XIII.		RULE I.
Some things may be used in the Service of God, which are not commanded, nor explicitly commended	320	It is lawful for Christian Magistrates to make penal Laws	410
RULE XIV.		RULE II.
The Christian Law is fully contained in the Holy Scriptures	331	Penal Laws do sometimes oblige the guilty Person to the suffering the Punishment, even before the Sentence of the Judge	413
RULE XV.		RULE III.
In the Law of Christ no Precept wholly ministers to the Law of Moses	358	Penalties imposed by the Judge, may not be inflicted by the Hands of the condemned	420
RULE XVI.		RULE IV.
The Laws of Jesus Christ are to be interpreted according to their Subject-matter	359	He that hath suffered the Punishment, must also repent of the Disobedience	425
RULE XVII.		RULE V.
Those, whom Christ addressed, were not always considered the Representatives of the whole Church	370	It is not lawful for a guilty Person to defend himself by Calumny	426
RULE XVIII.		RULE VI.
Evangelical Laws, given to one concerning the Duty of another, concern them both in differing Degrees	374	Private Christians may not, without public Authority, punish Malefactors, but they may require it of the Magistrate	441
RULE XIX.		RULE VII.
Custom is no sufficient Interpreter of the Laws of Christ	375	It is not lawful to punish one for the Offence of another	446
RULE XX.		RULE VIII.
The Measure of Obedience expected of Christians is greater than that of the Jews	379	The Laws of Tribute are moral Laws; and therefore do oblige the Conscience to an active Obedience	450
BOOK III.		RULE IX.
OF HUMAN LAWS, THEIR OBLIGATION AND RELAXATION; AND OF THE COLLATERAL, INDIRECT, AND ACCIDENTAL BANDS OF CONSCIENCE.		The Laws of Tribute have the same Measures with other Laws of Government	451
CHAPTER I.		RULE X.
OF HUMAN LAWS IN GENERAL; AND WHAT OBLIGATION THEY PASS UPON THE CONSCIENC.		Customs which are due, are to be paid whether they be demanded or no	454
RULE I.		CHAPTER III.
The Conscience is obliged to obey the Laws of Men	381	OF KINGS, PRINCES, AND ALL SUPREME CIVIL POWERS, AND THEIR LAWS IN SPECIAL.
RULE II.		RULE I.
Human Laws do not oblige the Conscience to an active Obedience, when there is very grievous Evil in the Obedience	395	The supreme Power in every Republic is unlimited	453
RULE III.		RULE II.
The Laws of our Superior, that are not just, do not oblige the Conscience	398	The supreme Power is superior to the civil Laws, but not wholly free from them	458
RULE IV.		RULE III.
A Law founded upon a false Presumption, does not oblige the Conscience	401	It is not lawful for Subjects to rebel, upon any pretence whatsoever	465
RULE V.		RULE IV.
Human Laws bind the Conscience in secret, as well as in public	403	The supreme civil Power is also supreme Governor over all Persons ecclesiastical	471
RULE VI.		RULE V.
Human Laws, before sufficient Promulgation, do not oblige the Conscience	405	Kings have a legislative Power in the Affairs of Religion	472
		RULE VI.
		The supreme civil Power hath a Power of Coercion in the whole Order ecclesiastical	482

	PAGE		PAGE
RULE VII.		RULE XIV.
The supreme civil Power hath Jurisdiction in Causes internal and spiritual	494	The Canons of the ancient general and provincial Councils are then Laws to the Conscience, when they are bound upon us by the Authority of the respective Governors of Churches	543
RULE VIII.		RULE XV.
The supreme civil Power is to govern in Causes ecclesiastical, by the Assistance and Ministries of ecclesiastical Persons	498, 499	The laudable Customs of the Catholic Church, which are in present Observation, do oblige the Conscience of all Christians	544
CHAPTER IV.		RULE XVI.
OF THE POWER OF THE CHURCH IN CANONS AND CENSURES, WITH THEIR OBLIGATIONS AND POWERS OVER THE CONSCIENCE.		The Decrees and Canons of the Bishops of Rome oblige the Conscience of none but his own Subjects	551
RULE I.		SECTION IV.
The whole Power, which Christ hath left in ordinary to his Church, is merely spiritual	501	Of the Matter and Conditions of ecclesiastical Laws required to the Obligation of Conscience	553
RULE II.		RULE XVII.
The Church hath Power to make Laws and to give Commands obliging the Conscience, that is, tying the Subjects to Obedience under the Penalty of committing Sin, or of incurring the Divine Displeasure	506	Ecclesiastical Laws, that are merely such, cannot be universal and perpetual	553
RULE III.		RULE XVIII.
The Church hath Power to make Laws in all Things of necessary Duty, by a direct Power and a Divine Authority	508	Ecclesiastical Laws of Ceremonies and Circumstances of external Observances, do not bind the Conscience beyond the Cases of Contempt and Scandal	559
RULE IV.		RULE XIX.
The Church hath Power to make Laws in such Things, which are Helps and apt Ministries and Advantages of necessary Duty	509	Ecclesiastical Laws must be charitable and easy; and, when they are not, they oblige not	561
RULE V.		RULE XX.
When the Canons or Rules of the ecclesiastical Rulers are confirmed by the supreme civil Power, they oblige the Conscience by a double Obligation	514	Ecclesiastical laws must ever promote the Service of God and the Good of Souls; but must never put a Snare or Stumbling-block to Consciences	565
RULE VI.		SECTION V.
Kings and Princes are, by the Ties of Religion, not of Power, obliged to keep the Laws of the Church	515	Of ecclesiastical Laws of Faith, or Articles of Confession	582
RULE VII.		RULE XXI.
It is not lawful for the ecclesiastical Power to excommunicate Christian Princes, or the supreme civil Power	517	The Catholic Church is a Witness of Faith, and a Record of all necessary Truths; but not the Mistress and Ruler of our Creed; that is, cannot make any Laws of Faith	582
RULE VIII.		RULE XXII.
Ecclesiastical Censures are to be inflicted by the Consent and Concurrence of the supreme civil Power	521	The Decrees of general Councils are of great Use in the Conduct of Conscience, but not the proper Measure, or last determination of Matters of Belief	583
RULE IX.		RULE XXIII.
Excommunication, inflicted upon a light Cause, binds externally, but not internally; but if it be inflicted upon an unjust Cause, it binds not at all	526	Subscription to Articles and Forms of Confession in any particular Church, is wholly of political Consideration	585
RULE X.		CHAPTER V.
It is not lawful to communicate with those, whom the Church hath, by a just Sentence, excommunicated	529	OF LAWS DOMESTIC; OR THE POWER WHICH FATHERS OF FAMILIES HAVE TO BIND THE CONSCIENCES OF THEIR RELATIVES.
SECTION III.		RULE I.
Of Canons ecclesiastical	532	Children are bound to obey the Laws and Commandments of their Parents in all Things domestical, and in all Actions personal relating to the Family, or done within it	587
RULE XI.		RULE II.
The Canons of the Apostles, which are of Order and external Government, do oblige the Conscience by being accepted in several Churches, not by their first establishment	532	Fathers have a Power to chastise their offending Children, but not a Power of Life and Death	589
RULE XII.		RULE III.
All those Rituals, which were taught to the Church by the Apostles concerning Ministries, which were of Divine Institution, do oblige all Christendom to their Observation	533	A Father hath Power over the Goods and Persons of his Children, so as to be maintained by them	591
RULE XIII.		RULE IV.
In the Rules which the Apostles gave to their Churches in Things indifferent, the Church hath a Liberty; but it is not used but for great Reason and great Necessity, and for the Edification of the People committed to their Charge	535	The Father's Power does not extend to Matter of Religion, and Persuasions of Faith	592
		RULE V.
		The Father's Power over the Children can remit an Injury done to them, without their Leave or Consent	593

	PAGE		PAGE
RULE VI.		BOOK IV.
A Father's Authority cannot abide, after his Death; but the Son's Piety to his Father must, and may, pass upon him some indirect Obligations	594	OF THE NATURE AND CAUSES OF GOOD AND EVIL, THEIR LIMITS AND CIRCUMSTANCES, THEIR AGGRAVATIONS AND DIMINUTIONS.
RULE VII.		CHAPTER I.
Neither the Father's Authority, nor the Son's Piety, can oblige them to do an Action against the Laws of God, or of the Father and our just Superior	595	OF THE EFFICIENT CAUSES OF ALL HUMAN ACTIONS, GOOD AND EVIL.
RULE VIII.		SECTION I.
It is not lawful for Children to enter into any lasting Course of Life, against the Will or Approbation of their Parents	597	Of Choice and Election, voluntary and involuntary	630
CHAPTER VI.		RULE I.
OF THE INTERPRETATION, DIMINUTION, AND ABOGATION, OF HUMAN LAWS.		An Action is neither good nor evil, unless it be voluntary and chosen	630
SECTION I.		RULE II.
Of Equity	609	The virtual and interpretative Consent of the Will is imputed to Good or Evil	640
RULE I.		RULE III.
When the Letter of the Law is burdensome and unjust, the Meaning and Charity of the Law do only oblige the Conscience	609	The Act of the Will alone, although no external Action or Event do follow, is imputed to Good or Evil by God and Men	654
SECTION II.		RULE IV.
Judicial Interpretation	614	An involuntary Effect, proceeding from a voluntary Cause, is imputed to the Agent, as if it were voluntary and directly chosen	659
RULE II.		SECTION II.
When the Power that made the Law, does interpret the Law, the Interpretation is authentical, and obliges the Conscience as much as the Law; and can release the Bond of Conscience so far as the Interpretation extends, as much as if the Law were abrogated	614	Of the Diminutions of voluntary Actions; and, first, of Ignorance and its Influence into the Morality of human Actions	661
SECTION III.		RULE V.
A contrary or ceasing Reason	616	Nothing is good or bad, but what we know, or concerning which we can deliberate	661
RULE III.		RULE VI.
A Law made for a particular Reason, when the Reason wholly ceases, does no longer oblige the Conscience	616	Ignorance does always excuse the Fact, or diminish the Malignity of it, or change the Kind and Nature of the Sin	665
SECTION IV.		SECTION III.
Dispensation	623	Of Fear and Violence, and how these can make an Action involuntary	671
RULE IV.		RULE VII.
The Legislator hath Authority to dispense in his own Laws, for any Cause, that himself shall prudently judge to be reasonable, so that no distinct Interest be prejudiced or injured	623	Fear that makes our Reason useless, and suffers us not to consider, leaves the Actions it produces free from Crime, even though itself be culpable	671
SECTION V.		CHAPTER II.
Commutation	625	OF THE FINAL CAUSE OF HUMAN ACTIONS; AND ITS INFLUENCE OR CAUSALITY OF GOOD AND EVIL.
RULE V.		RULE I.
The same Power that can dispense, can also commute, a Duty; and as, in the first, it eases, so, in the latter, it binds, the Conscience	625	In every good Action the Means and the End must be symbolical: so that, 1. a good Action done for an evil End, and, 2. an evil Action done for a good, are alike criminal	675
SECTION VI.		RULE II.
Contrary Customs	625	To do an Action of itself lawful, for temporal Regards, for Ends of Profit, Pleasure, or Honour, is not unlawful, except it be accidentally	677
RULE VI.		RULE III.
A Custom can interpret a Law, but can never abrogate it without the Consent of the supreme Power	625	The End and Intention of a Law is under the Commandment, as much as the Action itself commanded in order to the End	680
SECTION VII.
Abrogation	628
RULE VII.
Abrogation of a Law by a competent, that is, by the supreme Power, may be just and reasonable, though the Law itself be neither unreasonable or unjust	628

CONFIRMATION.

Εἰ Πνεῦμα ἅγιον ἐλάβετε πιστεύσαντες.
Acts xix. 2.

TO HIS GRACE

JAMES DUKE OF ORMONDE,

LORD LIEUTENANT-GENERAL.

AND GENERAL-GOVERNOR OF HIS MAJESTY'S KINGDOM OF IRELAND,

ONE OF THE LORDS OF HIS MAJESTY'S MOST HONOURABLE PRIVY COUNCILS OF HIS MAJESTY'S KINGDOMS OF ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND IRELAND, &c., AND KNIGHT OF THE MOST NOBLE ORDER OF THE GARTER.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR GRACE,

IT is not any confidence that I have dexterously performed this charge, that gives me the boldness to present it to your Grace. I have done it as well as I could, and for the rest, my obedience will bear me out: for I took not this task upon myself, but was entreated to it by them, who have power to command me. But yet it is very necessary that it should be addressed to your Grace, who are, as Sozomen said of Theodosius, "certaminum magister, et orationum judex constitutus:" "You are appointed the great master of our arguings, and are most fit to be the judge of our discourses;" especially when they do relate and pretend to public influence and advantages to the church. We all are witnesses of your zeal to promote true religion, and every day find you to be a great patron to this very poor church, which groans under the calamities and permanent effects of a war acted by intervals for above four hundred years: such which the intermedial sunshines of peace could but very weakly repair. Our churches are still demolished, much of the revenues irrecoverably swallowed by sacrilege, and digested by an unavoidable impunity; religion infinitely divided, and parted into formidable sects: the people extremely ignorant, and wilful by inheritance: superstitiously irreligious, and incapable of reproof. And amidst these and very many more inconveniences, it was greatly necessary that God should send us such a king, and he send us such a viceroy, who weds the interests of religion, and joins them to his heart.

For we do not look upon your Grace only as a favourer of the church's temporal interest, though even for that the souls of the relieved clergy do daily bless you: neither are you our patron only as the Cretans were to Homer, or the Alenadæ to Simonides, Philip to Theopompus, or Severus to Oppianus: but as Constantine and Theodosius were to christians: that is, desirous that true religion should be promoted, that the interest of souls should be advanced, that truth should flourish, and wise principles should be entertained, as the best cure against those evils which this nation hath too often brought upon themselves. In order to which excellent purposes it is hoped, that the reduction of the holy rite of confirmation into use and holy practice may contribute some very great moments. For besides that the great usefulness of this ministry will greatly endear the episcopal order, to which (that I may use St. Jerome's words) if "there be not attributed a more than common power and authority, there will be as many schisms as priests;" it will also be a means of endearing the persons of the prelates to their flocks, when the people shall be convinced that there is, or may be, if they please, a perpetual intercourse of blessings and love between them: when God by their holy hands refuses not to give to the people the earnest of an eternal inheritance, when by them he blesses; and that the grace of our Lord Jesus, and the love of God, and the communication of his Spirit, is conveyed to all persons capable of the grace, by the conduct, and on the hands and prayers of their bishops.

And indeed not only very many single persons, but even the whole church of Ireland, hath need of confirmation. We have most of us contended for false religions and unchristian propositions: and now that by God's mercy, and the prosperity and piety of his sacred Majesty, the church is broken from her cloud, and many are reduced to the true religion and righteous worship of God, we cannot but call to mind, how the holy fathers of the primitive church often have declared themselves in councils, and by a perpetual discipline, that such persons who are returned from sects and heresies into the bosom of the church should not be rebaptized, but that the bishops should impose hands on them in confirmation. It is true, that this was designed to supply the defect of those schismatical conventicles, who did not use this holy rite: for this rite of confirmation hath had the fate to be opposed only by the schismatical and puritan parties of old, the Novatians or Cathari, and the Donatists; and of late by the Jesuits and new Cathari, the puritans and presbyterians; the same evil spirit of contradiction keeping its course in the same channel, and descending regularly amongst men of the same principles. But therefore in the restitution of a man, or company of men, or a church, the holy primitives, in the council of Constantinople, Laodicea, and Orange, thought that to confirm such persons was the most agreeable discipline; not only because such persons did not in their little and dark assemblies use this rite, but because they always greatly wanted it. For it is a sure rule in our religion, and is of an eternal truth, that "they who keep not the unity of the church, have not the Spirit of God:" and therefore it is most fit, should receive the ministry of the Spirit, when they return to the bosom of the church, that so indeed they may "keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." And therefore Asterius bishop of Amasia compares confirmation to the ring, with which the father of the prodigal adorned his returning son: "Datur nempe prodigo post stolam et annulus, nempe symbolum intelligibile signaculi Spiritus." And as the Spirit of God, the holy dove, extended his mighty wings over the creation, and hatched the new-born world, from its seminal powers, to light and operation, and life and motion; so in the regeneration of the souls of men, he gives a new being, and heat and life, procedure and perfection, wisdom and strength: and because that this was ministered by the bishops' hands in confirmation, was so firmly believed by all the primitive church, therefore it became a law, and a universal practice in all those ages, in which men desired to be saved by all means. The Latin church and the Greek always did use it; and the blessings of it, which they believed consequent to it, they expressed in a holy prayer, which in the Greek "Euchologion" they have very anciently and constantly used: "Thou, O Lord, the most compassionate and great King of all, graciously impart to this person the seal of the gift of thy holy, almighty, and adorable Spirit." ^a For as an ancient Greek said truly and wisely, "The Father is reconciler, and the Son is the reconciler; but to them who are by baptism and repentance made friends of God, the Holy Spirit is collated as a gift." ^b They well knew what they received in this ministration, and therefore wisely laid hold of it, and would not let it go.

This was anciently ministered by apostles, and ever after by the bishops, and religiously received by kings and greatest princes: and I have read that St. Sylvester confirmed Constantine the emperor: and when they made their children servants of the holy Jesus, and soldiers under his banner, and bondsmen of his institution, then they sent them to the bishop to be confirmed; who did it sometimes by such ceremonies that the solemnity of the ministry might with greatest religion addict them to the service of their great Lord. We read in Adrovallus, ^c that Charles Martel, entering into a league with Bishop Luitprandus, sent his son Pepin to him, "ut, more christianorum fidelium, capillum ejus primus attonderet, ac pater illi spiritualis existeret," "that he might, after the manner of christians, first cut his hair," (in token of service to Christ,) "and" in confirming him "he should be his spiritual father." And something like this we find concerning William earl of Warren and Surrey, who when he had dedicated the church of St. Pancratius and the priory of Lewes, received confirmation, and gave seizure "per capillos capitis mei," (says he in the charter,) "et fratris mei Radulphi de Warrena, quos absceidit cum cultello de capitibus nostris Henricus episcopus Wintoniensis." "By the hairs of my head and of my brother's, which Henry bishop of Winchester cut off before the altar:" meaning, (according to the ancient custom,) in confirmation, when they by that solemnity addicted themselves to the free servitude of the Lord Jesus. The ceremony is obsolete and changed, but the mystery can never. And indeed that is one of the advantages in which we can rejoice concerning the ministration of this rite in the church of England and Ireland: that whereas it was sometimes clouded, sometimes hindered, and sometimes hurt, by the appendage of needless and useless ceremonies; it is now reduced to the primitive and first simplicity amongst us, and the exerecences used in the church of Rome are wholly pared away, and by holy prayers and the apostolical ceremony of imposition of the bishops' hands, it is worthily and zealously administered. The Latins used to send chrism to the Greeks, when they had usurped some jurisdiction over them, and the pope's chaplains went with a quantity of it to Constantinople, where the Russians usually met them for it; for that was then the ceremony of this ministration: but when the Latins demanded fourscore pounds of gold besides other gifts, they went away and changed their custom, rather than pay an unlawful and ungodly tribute. "Non quærimus vestra sed vos;" we require nothing but leave to impart God's blessings with pure intentions and a spiritual ministry. And as the bishops of our churches receive nothing from the people for the ministration of this rite, so they desire nothing but love and just obedience in spiritual and ecclesiastical duties; and we offer our flocks spiritual things without mixture of temporal advantages from them; we minister the rituals of the gospel without the inventions of men, religion without superstition, and only desire to be believed in such things, which we prove from Scripture expounded by the catholic practice of the church of God.

Concerning the subject of this discourse, “the Rite of Confirmation;” it were easy to recount many great and glorious expressions which we find in the sermons of the holy fathers of the primitive ages: so certain it is, that in this thing we ought to be zealous, as being desirous to persuade our people to give us leave to do them great good. But the following pages will do it, I hope, competently: only we shall remark, that when they had gotten a custom anciently, that in cases of necessity they did permit deacons and laymen sometimes to baptize, yet they never did confide in it much; but with much caution and curiosity commanded that such persons should, when that necessity was over, be carried to the bishop to be confirmed, so to supply all precedent defects relating to the past imperfect ministry, and future necessity and danger; as appears in the council of Eliberis. And the ancients had so great estimate and veneration to this holy rite, that as in heraldry they distinguish the same thing by several names, when they relate to persons of greater eminency, and they blazon the arms of the gentry by metals, of the nobility by precious stones, but of kings and princes by planets; so when they would signify the unction which was used in confirmation, they gave it a special word, and of more distinction and remark; and therefore the oil used in baptism they called ἐλαιον, but that of confirmation was μύρον καὶ χρίσμα: and they who spake properly, kept this difference of words, until, by incaution and ignorant carelessness, the names fell into confusion, and the thing into disuse and disrespect. But it is no small addition to the honour of this ministration, that some wise and good men have piously believed, that when baptized christians are confirmed, and solemnly blessed by the bishop, that then it is that a special angel-guardian is appointed to keep their souls from the assaults of the spirits of darkness. Concerning which, though I shall not interpose mine own opinion, yet this I say, that the piety of that supposition is not disagreeable to the intention of this rite: for since by this the Holy Spirit of God (the Father of spirits) is given, it is not unreasonably thought by them, that the other good spirits of God, the angels, who are “ministering spirits, sent forth to minister to the good of them that shall be heirs of salvation,” should pay their kind offices in subordination to their prince and fountain; that the first in every kind might be the measure of all the rest. But there are greater and stranger things than this that God does for the souls of his servants, and for the honour of the ministries which himself hath appointed.

We shall only add that this was ancient, and long before popery entered into the world, and that this rite has been more abused by popery than by any thing: and to this day the bigots of the Roman church are the greatest enemies to it; and from them the presbyterians. But besides that the church of England and Ireland does religiously retain it, and hath appointed a solemn officer for the ministry; the Lutheran and Bohemian churches do observe it carefully, and it is recommended and established in the harmony of the protestant confessions.

And now, may it please your Grace to give me leave to implore your aid and countenance for the propagating this so religious and useful a ministry, which, as it is a peculiar of the bishop’s office, is also a great enlarger of God’s gifts to the people. It is a great instrument of union of hearts, and will prove an effective delectory to schism, and an endearment to the other parts of religion; it is the consummation of baptism, and a preparation to the Lord’s supper: it is the virtue from on high, and the solemnity of our spiritual adoption. But there will be no need to use any arguments to inflame your zeal in this affair, when your Grace shall find, that to promote it will be a great service to God; for this alone will conclude your Grace, who are so ready, by laws and executions, by word and by example, to promote the religion of Christ, as it is taught in these churches. I am not confident enough to desire your Grace, for the reading this discourse, to lay aside any one hour of your greater employments, which consume so much of your days and nights: but I say that the subject is greatly worthy of consideration: “Nihil enim inter manus habui, cui majorem sollicitudinem præstare deberem.” And for the book itself, I can only say what Secundus did to the wise Lupercus, “Quoties ad fastidium legentium deliciasque respicio, intelligo nobis commendationem ex ipsâ mediocritate libri petendam.” I can commend it because it is little, and so not very troublesome. And if it could have been written according to the worthiness of the thing treated in it, it would deserve so great a patronage: but because it is not, it will therefore greatly need it; but it can hope for it on no other account, but because it is laid at the feet of a princely person, who is great and good, and one who not only is bound by duty, but by choice hath obliged himself to do advantages to any worthy instrument of religion. But I have detained your Grace so long in my address, that your pardon will be all the favour which ought to be hoped for by

Your Grace’s most humble

And obliged Servant,

JER. DUNENSIS.

DISCOURSE OF CONFIRMATION.

THE INTRODUCTION.

NEXT to the incarnation of the Son of God, and the whole economy of our redemption wrought by him in an admirable order and conjugation of glorious mercies, the greatest thing that ever God did to the world, is the giving to us the Holy Ghost: and possibly this is the consummation and perfection of the other. For in the work of redemption Christ indeed made a new world; we are wholly a new creation, and we must be so: and therefore when St. John began the narrative of the gospel, he began in a manner and style very like to Moses in his history of the first creation; "In the beginning was the Word," &c. "All things were made by him; and without him was not any thing made that was made." But as in the creation the matter was first, (there were indeed heavens, and earth, and waters; but all this was rude and "without form," till "the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters,") so it is in the new creation. We are a new mass, redeemed with the blood of Christ, rescued from an evil portion, and made candidates of heaven and immortality; but we are but an embryo in the regeneration, until the Spirit of God enlivens us and moves again upon the waters: and then every subsequent motion and operation is from the Spirit of God. "We cannot say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost." By him we live, in him we walk, by his aids we pray, by his emotions we desire: we breathe, and sigh, and groan, by him: he "helps us in all our infirmities," and he gives us all our strengths; he reveals mysteries to us, and teaches us all our duties; he stirs us up to holy desires, and he actuates those desires; he "makes us to will and to do of his good pleasure."

For the Spirit of God is that in our spiritual life, that a man's soul is in his natural: without it we are but a dead and lifeless trunk. But then, as man's soul, in proportion to the several operations of life, obtains several appellatives (it is vegetative and nutritive, sensitive and intellective, according as it operates); so is the Spirit of God. He is the Spirit of regeneration in baptism, of renovation in repentance; the Spirit of love, and the Spirit of holy fear; the Searcher of the hearts, and the Spirit of discerning; the Spirit of wisdom, and the Spirit of prayer. In one mystery he illuminates, and in another he feeds us: he begins in one, and finishes and perfects in another. It is the same Spirit working divers operations. For he is all this now reckoned, and he is every thing else that is the principle of good unto us; he is the beginning and the progression, the consummation and perfection, of us all: and yet every work of his is perfect in its kind, and in order to his own designation; and from the beginning to the end is perfection all the way. Justifying and sanctifying grace is the proper entitative product in all; but it hath divers appellatives and connotations in the several rites: and yet even then also, because of the identity of the principle, the similitude and general consonancy in the effect, the same appellative is given, and the same effect imputed to more than one; and yet none of them can be omitted, when the great Master of the family hath blessed it, and given it institution. Thus St. Dionysius calls baptism τὴν ἱερὰν τῆς Θεογονίας τελείωσιν, "the perfection of the divine birth;" and yet the baptized person must receive other mysteries, which are more signally perfective: ἡ τοῦ μύρου χρίσις τελειωτική: confirmation is yet more perfective, and is properly "the perfection of baptism."

By baptism we are heirs, and are adopted to the inheritance of sons, admitted to the covenant of repentance, and engaged to live a good life; yet this is but the solemnity of the covenant, which must pass into after-acts by other influences of the same divine principle. Until we receive the spirit of obsignation or confirmation, we are but babes in Christ, in the meanest sense, infants that can do nothing, that cannot speak, that cannot resist any violence, exposed to every rudeness, and perishing by every temptation.

But therefore, as God at first appointed us a ministry of a new birth; so also hath he given to his church the consequent ministry of a new strength. The Spirit moved a little upon the waters of baptism, and gave us the principles of life; but in confirmation he makes us able to move ourselves. In the first he is the Spirit of life; but in this he is the Spirit of strength and motion. "Baptisma est nativitas, unguentum verò est nobis actionis instar et motus," said Cabasilas.—"In baptism we are entitled to the inheritance: but because we are in our infancy and minority, the Father gives unto his sons a tutor, a guardian and a teacher in confirmation," said Rupertus:^a that as we are baptized into the death and resurrection of Christ; so in confirmation we may be renewed in the inner man, and strengthened in all our holy vows and purposes, by the Holy Ghost ministered according to God's ordinance.

The holy right of confirmation is a divine ordinance, and it produces divine effects, and is ministered by divine persons, that is, by those whom God hath sanctified and separated to this ministration. At first all that were baptized, were also confirmed; and ever since, all good people that have understood it, have been very zealous for it; and time was in England, even since the first beginnings of the Reformation, when confirmation had been less carefully ministered for about six years, when the people had their first opportunities of it restored, they ran to it in so great numbers, that churches and churchyards would not hold them; insomuch that I have read^b that the bishop of Chester was forced to impose hands on the people in the fields, and was so oppressed with multitudes, that he had almost been trod to death by the people, and had died with the throng, if he had not been rescued by the civil power.

But men have too much neglected all the ministries of grace, and this most especially, and have not given themselves to a right understanding of it, and so neglected it yet more. But because the prejudice, which these parts of the christian church have suffered for want of it, is very great, (as will appear by enumeration of the many and great blessings consequent to it,) I am not without hope, that it may be a service acceptable to God, and a useful ministry to the souls of my charges, if by instructing them that know not, and exhorting them that know, I set forward the practice of this holy rite, and give reasons why the people ought to love it and to desire it, and how they are to understand and practise it, and consequently, with what duteous affections they are to relate to those persons, whom God hath in so special and signal manner made to be, for their good and eternal benefit, the ministers of the Spirit and salvation.

St. Bernard in the life of St. Malachias, my predecessor in the see of Down and Connor, reports that it was the care of that good prelate to renew the rite of confirmation in his diocese, where it had been long neglected and gone into desuetude. It being too much our case in Ireland, I find the same necessity, and am obliged to the same procedure, for the same reason, and in pursuance of so excellent an example: "Hoc enim est evangelizare Christum, (said St. Austin,) non tantum docere quæ sunt dicenda de Christo, sed etiam quæ observanda ei, qui accedit ad compagem corporis Christi;" "For this is to preach the gospel, not only to teach those things which are to be said of Christ, but those also which are to be observed by every one who desires to be confederated into the society of the body of Christ," which is his church: that is, not only the doctrines of good life, but the mysteries of godliness, and the rituals of religion, which issue from a Divine fountain, are to be declared by him who would fully preach the gospel.

In order to which performance I shall declare,

1. The Divine original, warranty, and institution, of the holy rite of confirmation.

2. That this rite was to be a perpetual and never-ceasing ministration.

3. That it was actually continued and practised by all the succeeding ages of the purest and primitive churches.

4. That this rite was appropriate to the ministry of bishops.

5. That prayer and imposition of the bishops' hands did make the whole ritual; and though other things were added, yet they were not necessary, or any thing of the institution.

6. That many great graces and blessings were consequent to the worthy reception and due ministration of it.

7. I shall add something of the manner of preparation to it, and reception of it.

SECTION I.

Of the Divine Original, Warranty, and Institution, of the holy Rite of Confirmation.

IN the church of Rome, they have determined confirmation to be a sacrament, "proprii nominis," properly and really; and yet their doctors have, some of them at least, been "paulò iniquiores," "a little unequal and unjust" to their proposition; insomuch that from themselves we have had the greatest opposition in this article. Bonacina^d and Henriquez allow the proposition, but make the sacrament to be so unnecessary, that a little excuse may justify the omission and almost neglect of it. And Loemilius and Daniel à Jesu, and generally the English Jesuits, have, to serve some ends of their own family and order, disputed it almost into contempt, that by representing it as unnecessary, they might do all the ministries ecclesiastical in England without the assistance of bishops their superiors, whom they therefore love not, because they are so. But the theological faculty of Paris have condemned their doctrine as temerarious, and savouring of heresy; and in the latter schools have approved rather the doctrine of Gamachæus, Estius, Kellison, and Bellarmine, who indeed do follow the doctrine of the most eminent persons in the ancient school, Richard of Armagh, Scotus, Hugo Cavalli, and Gerson the learned chancellor of Paris; who following the old Roman order, Amalarius and Albinus, do all teach confirmation to be of great and pious use, of Divine original, and to many purposes necessary, according to the doctrine of the Scriptures and the primitive church.

Whether confirmation be a sacrament or no, is of no use to dispute; and if it be disputed, it can never be proved to be so as baptism and the Lord's supper, that is "as generally necessary to salvation:" but though it be no sacrament, it cannot follow that it is not of very great use and holiness : and as a man is never the less tied to repentance, though it be no sacrament ; so neither is he ever the less obliged to receive confirmation, though it be (as it ought) acknowledged to be of a use and nature inferior to the two sacraments of divine, direct, and immediate institution. It is certain that the fathers, in a large, symbolical, and general sense, call it “a sacrament ;” but mean not the same thing by that word when they apply it to confirmation, as they do when they apply it to baptism and the Lord’s supper. That it is an excellent and Divine ordinance to purposes spiritual, that it comes from God, and ministers in our way to God, that is all we are concerned to inquire after : and this I shall endeavour to prove not only against the Jesuits, but against all opponents of what side soever.

My first argument from Scripture is what I learn from Optatus and St. Cyril. Optatus writing against the Donatists hath these words : “ Christ descended into the water,—not that in him, who is God, was any thing that could be made clearer, but that the water was to precede the future unction, for the initiating and ordaining and fulfilling the mysteries of baptism. He was washed, when he was in the hands of John ; then followed the order of the mystery, and the Father finished what the Son did ask, and what the Holy Ghost declared: the heavens were opened, God the Father anointed him, the spiritual unction presently descended in the likeness of a dove, and sat upon his head, and was spread all over him, and he was called ‘the Christ,’ when he was ‘the anointed of the Father.’ To whom also, lest imposition of hands should seem to be wanting, the voice of God was heard from the cloud, saying, ‘This is my Son in whom I am well pleased, hear ye him.’”—That which Optatus says is this ; that, upon and in Christ’s person, baptism, confirmation, and ordination, were consecrated and first appointed. He was baptized by St. John ; he was confirmed by the Holy Spirit, and anointed with spiritual unction in order to that great work of obedience to his Father’s will ; and he was consecrated by the voice of God from heaven. In all things Christ is the head, and the first-fruits ; and in these things was the fountain of the sacraments and spiritual grace, and the great exemplar of the economy of the church. For Christ was “nullius penitentiae debitor :” baptism of repentance was not necessary to him, who never sinned ; but so it became him to fulfil all righteousness, and to be a pattern to us all. But we have need of these things, though he had not ; and in the same way in which salvation was wrought by him for himself and for us all, in the same way he intended we should walk. He was baptized, because his Father appointed it so : we must be baptized, because Christ hath appointed it, and we have need of it too. He was consecrated to be the great prophet and the great priest, because “no man takes on him this honour, but he that was called of God, as was Aaron :” and all they who are to minister in his prophetic office under him, must be consecrated and solemnly set apart for that ministration, and after his glorious example. He was anointed with a spiritual unction from above after his baptism ; for “after Jesus was baptized,” he ascended up from the waters, and then the Holy Ghost descended upon him. It is true, he received the fulness of the Spirit ; but we receive him by measure ; but “of his fulness we all receive, grace for grace :” that is, all that he received in order to his great work, all that in kind, one for another, grace for grace, we are to receive according to our measures and our necessities. And as all these he received by external ministrations, so must we : God the Father appointed his way, and he, by his example first, hath appointed the same to us ; that we also may follow him in the regeneration, and work out our salvation by the same graces in the like solemnities. For if he needed them for himself, then we need them much more. If he did not need them for himself, he needed them for us, and for our example, that we might follow his steps, who, by receiving these exterior solemnities and inward graces, became “the author and finisher of our salvation,” and the great example of his church.—I shall not need to make use of the fancy of the Murcosians and Colobarsians, who turning all mysteries into numbers, reckoned the numeral letters of περιστερά, and made them coincident to the α and ω ; but they intended to say, that Christ, receiving the holy dove after his baptism, became all in all to us, the beginning and the perfection of our salvation ; here he was confirmed, and received the ω to his α, the consummation to his initiation, the completion of his baptism and of his headship in the gospel. But that which I shall rather add, is what St. Cyril¹ from hence argues : “When he truly was baptized in the river of Jordan, he ascended out of the waters, and the Holy Ghost substantially descended upon him, like resting upon like. And to you also in like manner, after ye have ascended from the waters of baptism, the unction is given which bears the image or similitude of him by whom Christ was anointed—that as Christ after baptism and the coming of the Holy Spirit upon him, went forth to battle (in the wilderness) and overcame the adversary ; so ye also, after holy baptism and the mystical unction, (or confirmation,) being vested with the armour of the Holy Spirit, are enabled to stand against the opposite powers.”—Here then is the first great ground of our solemn receiving the Holy Spirit, or the unction from above after baptism, which we understand and represent by the word confirmation, denoting the principal effect of this unction, spiritual strength. Christ, who is the head of the church, entered this way upon his duty and work : and he who was the first of all the church, the head and great example, is the measure of all the rest ; for we can go to heaven no way but in that way in which he went before us.

There are some, who from this story would infer

the descent of the Holy Ghost after Christ's baptism not to signify, that confirmation was to be a distinct rite from baptism, but a part of it,—yet such a part as gives fullness and consummation to it. St. Jerome, Chrysostom, Euthymius, and Theophylact, go not so far, but would have us by this to understand that the Holy Ghost is given to them that are baptized. But reason and the context are both against it. 1. Because the Holy Ghost was not given by John's baptism; that was reserved to be one of Christ's glories; who also, when by his disciples he baptized many, did not give them the Holy Ghost: and when he commanded his apostles to baptize all nations, did not at that time so much as promise the Holy Ghost: he was promised distinctly and given by another ministration. 2. The descent of the Holy Spirit was a distinct ministry from the baptism: it was not only after Jesus ascended from the waters of baptism; but there was something intervening, and by a new office or ministration: for there was prayer joined in the ministry. So St. Luke observes; "while Jesus was praying, the heavens were opened," and the Holy Spirit descended: for so Jesus was pleased to consign the whole office and ritual of confirmation. Prayer for invoking the Holy Spirit, and giving him by personal application; which as the Father did immediately, so the bishops do by imposition of hands. 3. St. Austin observes that the apparition of the Holy Spirit like a dove was the visible or ritual part; and the voice of God was the word to make it to be sacramental; "accedit verbum ad elementum, et fit sacramentum:"^g for so the ministration was not only performed on Christ, but consigned to the church by similitude and exemplar institution. I shall only add, that the force of this argument is established to us by more of the fathers. St. Hilary upon this place hath these words:^h "The Father's voice was heard, that from those things which were consummated in Christ, we might know, that, after the baptism of water, the Holy Spirit from the gates of heaven flies unto us; and that we are to be anointed with the unction of a celestial glory, and be made the sons of God by the adoption of the voice of God; the truth by the very effects of things, prefigured unto us the similitude of a sacrament."—So St. Chrysostom:ⁱ "In the beginnings always appear the sensible visions of spiritual things for their sakes, who cannot receive the understanding of an incorporeal nature; that if afterwards they be not so done, (that is, after the same visible manner,) they may be believed by those things which were already done.—But more plain is that of Theophylact:^k "The Lord had not need of the descent of the Holy Spirit, but he did all things for our sakes; and himself is become the first-fruits of all things, which we afterwards were to receive, that he might become the first-fruits among many brethren." The consequent is this, which I express in the words of St. Austin, affirming, "Christi in baptismo columbam unctionem nostram præfigurasse," "The dove in Christ's baptism did represent and prefigure our unction from above," that is, the descent of the Holy Ghost upon us in the rite of confirmation. Christ was baptized, and so must we. But after baptism he had a new ministration for the reception of the Holy Ghost: and because this was done for our sakes, we also must follow that example. And this being done immediately before his entrance into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil, it plainly describes to us the order of this ministry, and the blessing designed to us: after we are baptized, we need to be strengthened and confirmed "propter pugnam spiritualem;" we are to fight against the flesh, the world, and the devil, and therefore must receive the ministration of the Holy Spirit of God: which is the design and proper work of confirmation. For (they are the words of the excellent author of the imperfect work upon St. Matthew, imputed to St. Chrysostom)^l "The baptism of water profits us, because it washes away the sins we have formerly committed, if we repent of them. But it does not sanctify the soul, nor precedes the concupiscences of the heart and our evil thoughts, nor drives them back, nor represses our carnal desires. But he therefore who is (only) so baptized, that he does not also receive the Holy Spirit, is baptized in his body, and his sins are pardoned; but in his mind he is yet but a catechumen: for so it is written, 'He that hath not the Spirit of Christ, is none of his:' and therefore afterward out of his flesh will germinate worse sins, because he hath not received the Holy Spirit conserving him, (in his baptismal grace,) but the house of his body is empty; wherefore that wicked spirit finding it swept with the doctrines of faith, as with besoms, enters in, and in a sevenfold manner dwells there." Which words, besides that they well explicate this mystery, do also declare the necessity of confirmation, or receiving the Holy Ghost after baptism, in imitation of the Divine precedent of our blessed Saviour.

2. After the example of Christ, my next argument is from his words spoken to Nicodemus in explication of the prime mysteries evangelical: "Unless a man be born of water and of the Holy Spirit, he shall not enter into the kingdom of God."^m These words are the great argument, which the church uses for the indispensable necessity of baptism; and having in them so great effort, and not being rightly understood, they have suffered many convulsions (shall I call them?) or interpretations. Some serve their own hypothesis by saying that water is the symbol, and the Spirit is the baptismal grace: others, that it is a ἐν διὰ δυοῖν, one is only meant, though here be two signaturs. But others conclude, that water is only necessary, but the Spirit is superadded as being afterwards to supervene and move upon these waters: and others yet affirm, that by water is only meant a spiritual ablution, or the effect produced by the Spirit; and still they have entangled the words so that they have been made useless to the christian church, and the meaning too many other things makes nothing to be understood. But truth is easy, intelligible, and clear, and without objection, and is plainly this:

Unless a man be baptized into Christ, and confirmed by the Spirit of Christ, he cannot enter into the kingdom of Christ; that is, he is not perfectly adopted into the christian religion, or fitted for the christian warfare. And if this plain and natural sense be admitted, the place is not only easy and intelligible, but consonant to the whole design of Christ and analogy of the New Testament.

For, first, Our blessed Saviour was catechising of Nicodemus, and teaching him the first rudiments of the gospel, and like a wise master-builder, first lays the foundation, "the doctrine of baptism and laying on of hands:" which afterwards St. Paul put into the christian catechism, as I shall show in the sequel. Now these also are the first principles of the christian religion taught by Christ himself, and things which at least to the doctors might have been so well known, that our blessed Saviour upbraids the not knowing them as a shame to Nicodemus. St. Chrysostom and Theophylact, Euthymius and Rupertus, affirm, that this generation by water and the Holy Spirit might have been understood by the Old Testament, in which Nicodemus was so well skilled. Certain it is, the doctrine of baptism was well enough known to the Jews, and the ἐπιφώτισις τοῦ Πνεύματος τοῦ Θεοῦ, "the illumination and irradiations of the Spirit of God" was not new to them, who believed the visions and dreams, the daughter of a voice, and the influences from heaven upon the sons of the prophets: and therefore although Christ intended to teach him more than what he had distinct notice of, yet the things themselves had foundation in the law and the prophets: but although they were high mysteries, and scarce discerned by them who either were ignorant or incurious of such things; yet to the christians they were the very rudiments of their religion, and are best expounded by observation of what St. Paul placed in the very foundation. But,

2. Baptism is the first mystery, that is certain; but that this of "being born of the Spirit" is also the next, is plain in the very order of the words: and that it does mean a mystery distinct from baptism, will be easily assented to by them who consider, that although Christ baptized and made many disciples by the ministry of his apostles, yet they who were so baptized into Christ's religion, did not receive this baptism of the Spirit till after Christ's ascension.

3. The baptism of water was not peculiar to John the Baptist, for it was also of Christ, and ministered by his command; it was common to both; and therefore the baptism of water is the less principal here. Something distinct from it is here intended. Now if we add to these words, that St. John tells of another baptism which was Christ's peculiar, "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire;" that these words were literally verified upon the apostles in Pentecost, and afterwards upon all the baptized in spiritual effect, (who, besides the baptism of water, distinctly had the baptism of the Spirit in confirmation,) it will follow, that of necessity this must be the meaning and the verification of these words of our blessed Saviour to Nicodemus, which must mean a double baptism: "Transibimus per aquam et ignem, antequam veniemus in refrigerium," "We must pass through water and fire, before we enter into rest;" that is, we must first be baptized with water, and then with the Holy Ghost, who first descended in fire; that is, the only way to enter into Christ's kingdom is by these two doors of the tabernacle, which God hath pitched, and not man,—first by baptism, and then by confirmation; first by water, and then by the Spirit.

The primitive church had this notion so fully amongst them, that the author of the Apostolical Constitutions, attributed to St. Clement,ⁿ who was St. Paul's scholar, affirms, That a man is made a perfect christian (meaning ritually and sacramentally, and by all exterior solemnity) by the water of baptism and confirmation of the bishop; and from these words of Christ now alleged, derives the use and institution of the rite of confirmation. The same sense of these words is given to us by St. Cyprian,^o who intending to prove the insufficiency of one without the other, says, "Tunc enim plenè sanctificari et esse Dei filii possunt, si sacramento utroque nascentur, cum scriptum sit, 'Nisi quis natus fuerit ex aqua et Spiritu, non potest intrare in regnum Dei,'" "Then they may be fully sanctified, and become the sons of God, if they be born with both the sacraments, or rites; for it is written, 'Unless a man be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God.'"—The same also is the commentary of^p Eusebius Emisenus; and St. Austin^q tells, that although some understand these words only of baptism, and others of the Spirit only, viz. in confirmation; yet others (and certainly much better) understand "utrumque sacramentum," "both the mysteries," of confirmation as well as baptism. Amalarius Fortunatus^r brings this very text to reprove them that neglect the episcopal imposition of hands: "Concerning them who by negligence lose the bishop's presence, and receive not the imposition of his hands, it is to be considered, lest in justice they be condemned, in which they exercise justice negligently, because they ought to make haste to the imposition of hands: because Christ said, 'Unless a man be born again of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God:' and as he said this, so also he said, 'Unless your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven.'"

To this I foresee two objections may be made. 1. That Christ did not institute confirmation in this place, because confirmation being for the gift of the Holy Ghost, who was to come upon none of the apostles till Jesus was glorified, these words seem too early for the consigning an effect that was to be so long after, and a rite that could not be practised till many intermedial events should happen. So said the evangelist;^s “the Holy Ghost was come upon none of them, because Jesus was not yet glorified;” intimating that this great effect was to be in after-time: and it is not likely that the ceremony should be ordained before the effect itself was ordered and provided for; that the solemnity should be appointed before provisions were made for the mystery; and that the outward, which was wholly for the inward, should be instituted, before the inward and principal had its abode amongst us.

To this I answer, 1. That it is no unusual thing; for Christ gave the sacrament of his body before his body was given; the memorial of his death was instituted before his death. 2. Confirmation might here as well be instituted as baptism; and by the same reason that the church from these words concludes the necessity of one, she may also infer the designation of the other; for the effect of baptism was at that time no more produced than that of confirmation. Christ had not yet purchased to himself a church, he had not wrought remission of sins to all that believe on him; the death of Christ was not yet past, into which death the christian church was to be baptized. 3. These words are so an institution of confirmation, as the sixth chapter of St. John is of the blessed eucharist: it was “designativa,” not “ordinativa,” it was in design, not in present command; here it was preached, but not reducible to practice till its proper season. 4. It was like the words of Christ to St. Peter; “When thou art converted, confirm thy brethren.” Here the command was given, but that confirmation of his brethren was to be performed in a time relative to a succeeding accident. 5. It is certain that long before the event, and grace was given, Christ did speak of the Spirit of confirmation, that Spirit which was to descend in Pentecost, which all they were to receive who should believe on him, which whosoever did receive, “out of his belly should flow rivers of living waters,” as is to be read in that place of St. John^t now quoted. 6. This pre-designation of the Holy Spirit of confirmation was presently followed by some antepast and “donariola,” or “little givings” of the Spirit; for our blessed Saviour gave the Holy Ghost three several times. First, ἀμυδρῶς, “obscurely,” and by intimation and secret virtue, then when he sent them to heal the sick, and anoint them with oil in the name of the Lord. Secondly, ἐκτυποτέρως, “more expressly” and signally after the resurrection, when he took his leave of them, and said, “Receive ye the Holy Ghost:” and this was to give them a power of ministering remission of sins, and therefore related to baptism and the ministries of repentance. But, thirdly, he gave it τελειοτέρως, “more perfectly,” and this was the Spirit of confirmation; for he was not at all until now, οὐπω γὰρ ἦν Πνεῦμα ἅγιον, says the text: “the Holy Ghost was not yet:” so almost all the Greek copies, printed and manuscript; and so St. Chrysostom, Athanasius, Cyril, Ammonius in the Catena of the Greeks, Leontius, Theophylact, Euthymius, and all the Greek fathers read it; so St. Jerome^u and St. Austin^x among the Latins, and some Latin translations, read it. Our translations read it, “the Holy Ghost was not yet given,” was not ἐν αὐτοῖς, “in them,” as some few Greek copies read it: but the meaning is alike, confirmation was not yet actual,—the Holy Spirit, viz. of confirmation, was not yet come upon the church; but it follows not but he was long before promised, designed and appointed, spoken of and declared. The first of these collations had the ceremony of chrism or anointing joined with it, which the church in process of time transferred into her use and ministry: yet it is the last only that Christ passed into an ordinance for ever; it is this only which is the sacramental consummation of our regeneration in Christ; for in this the Holy Spirit is not only ἐνεργεία παρὸν, “present by his power,” but present οὐσιωδῶς, ὡς ἂν εἴποι τις συγγινόμενόν τε καὶ πολιτευόμενον, as St. Gregory Nazianzen expresses it, to dwell with us, to converse with us, and to abide for ever; οὐ ἔσχέε ἐφ’ ἡμᾶς πλουσίως so St. Paul describes this Spirit of confirmation, the Spirit “which he hath poured forth upon us richly or plentifully,” that is, in great measures, and to the full consummation of the first mysteries of our regeneration. Now because Christ is the great fountain of this blessing to us, and he it was who sent his Father’s Spirit upon the church, himself best knew his own intentions, and the great blessings he intended to communicate to his church; and therefore it was most agreeable that from his sermons we should learn his purposes, and his blessing, and our duty. Here Christ declared “rem sacramenti,” the spiritual grace,” which he would afterwards impart to his church by exterior ministry, in this as in all other graces, mysteries, and rituals evangelical: “Nisi quis, ‘unless a man’ be born both of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God.”

But the next objection is yet more material. 2. For if this be the meaning of our blessed Saviour, then confirmation is as necessary as baptism, and without it ordinarily no man can be saved. The solution of this will answer a case of conscience, concerning the necessity of confirmation; and in what degree of duty and diligence we are bound to take care that we receive this holy rite. I answer therefore, that “entering into the kingdom of God,” is being admitted into the christian church and warfare, to become sons of God, and soldiers of Jesus Christ. And though this be the outward door, and the first entrance into life, and consequently the king’s highway, and the ordinary means of salvation; yet we are to distinguish the external ceremony from the internal mystery: the “Nisi quis” is for this, not for that; and yet that also is the ordinary way. “Unless a man be baptized,” that is, unless he be indeed regenerate, he cannot be saved: and yet baptism, or the outward washing, is the solemnity and ceremony of its ordinary ministration; and he that neglects this, when it may be had, is not indeed regenerate; he is not renewed in the spirit of his mind, because he neglects God’s way, and therefore can as little be saved as he who, having received the external sacrament, puts a bar to the intromis-

sion of the inward grace. Both cannot always be had; but when they can, although they are not equally valuable in the nature of the thing, yet they are made equally necessary by the Divine commandment. And in this there is a great, but general mistake, in the doctrine of the schools, disputing concerning what sacraments are necessary "necessitate medii," that is, as "necessary means," and what are necessary by the necessity of precept, or Divine commandment. For although a less reason will excuse from the actual suscepcion of some than of others, and a less diligence for the obtaining of one will serve than in obtaining of another, and a supply in one is easier obtained than in another; yet no sacrament hath in it any other necessity than what is made merely by the Divine commandment. But the grace of every sacrament, or rite, or mystery, which is of Divine ordinance, is necessary indispensably, so as without it no man can be saved. And this difference is highly remarkable in the words of Christ recorded by St. Mark;^y "He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved: but he that believeth not, shall be damned." Baptism itself, as to the external part, is not necessary "necessitate medii," or indispensably; but baptismal faith for the remission of sins in persons capable, that indeed is necessary: for Christ does not say that the want of baptism damns as the want of faith does; and yet both baptism and faith are the ordinary way of salvation, and both necessary; baptism because it is so by the Divine commandment, and faith as a necessary means of salvation, in the very economy and dispensation of the gospel. Thus it is also in the other sacrament; "Unless we eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, we have no life in us:"^z and yet God forbid that every man that is not communicated should die eternally. But it means plainly, that without receiving Christ, as he is by God's intention intended we should receive him in the communion, we have no life in us. Plainly thus, without the internal grace we cannot live; and the external ministry is the usual and appointed means of conveying to us the internal: and therefore although without the external it is possible to be saved, when it is impossible to be had; yet with the wilful neglect of it we cannot. Thus therefore we are to understand the words of Christ declaring the necessity of both these ceremonies: they are both necessary, because they are the means of spiritual advantages and graces, and both minister to the proper ends of their appointment, and both derive from a Divine original: but the ritual or ceremonial part in rare emergencies is dispensable; but the grace is indispensable. Without the grace of baptism we shall die in our sins; and without the grace or internal part of confirmation we shall never be able to resist the devil, but shall be taken captive by him at his will. Now the external or ritual part is the means, the season, and opportunity, of this grace; and therefore is at no hand to be neglected, lest we be accounted despisers of the grace, and tempters of God to ways and provisions extraordinary. For although when without our fault we receive not the sacramental part, God can and will supply it to us out of his own stores, because no man can perish without his own fault; and God can permit to himself what he pleases, as being Lord of the grace and of the sacrament: yet to us he hath given a law and a rule; and that is the way of his church, in which all christians ought to walk. In short, the use of it is greatly profitable; the neglect is inexcusable; but the contempt is damnable. "Tenentur non negligere, si pateat opportunitas," said the bishops in a synod at Paris: "If there be an opportunity, it must not be neglected."—"Obligantur suscipere, aut saltem non contemnere," said the synod at Sens: "They are bound to receive it, or at least not to despise it."—Now he despises it, that refuses it when he is invited to it, or when it is offered, or that neglects it without cause. For "causelessly" and "contemptuously" are all one. But these answers were made by gentle casuists: he only values the grace that desires it, that longs for it, that makes use of all the means of grace, that seeks out for the means, that refuses no labour, that goes after them as the merchant goes after gain: and therefore the old "ordo Romanus"^a admonishes more strictly; "Omnino præcavendum esse, ut hoc sacramentum confirmationis non negligatur, quia tunc omne baptisma legitimum Christianitatis nomine confirmatur:" "We must by all means take heed, that the rite of confirmation be not neglected, because, in that, every true baptism is ratified and confirmed."—Which words are also to the same purpose made use of by Albinus Flaccus.^b No man can tell to what degrees of diligence and labour, to what sufferings or journeyings, he is obliged for the procuring of this ministry: there must be "debita sollicitudo," a real, providential, zealous care to be where it is to be had, is the duty of every christian according to his own circumstances; but they who will not receive it unless it be brought to their doors, may live in such places and in such times, where they shall be sure to miss it, and pay the price of their neglect of so great a ministry of salvation. "Turpissima est jactura, quæ per negligentiam fit," "He is a fool that loses his good by carelessness:"^c but no man is zealous for his soul, but he who not only omits no opportunity of doing it advantage when it is ready for him, but makes and seeks and contrives opportunities. "Si non necessitate, sed incuriâ et voluntate remanserit," as St. Clement's expression is; If a man wants it by necessity, it may, by the overflowings of the Divine grace, be supplied; but not so if negligence or choice cause the omission.

3. Our way being made plain, we may proceed to other places of Scripture to prove the Divine original of confirmation. It was a plant of our heavenly Father's planting, it was a branch of the vine, and how it springs from the root Christ Jesus we have seen; it is yet more visible as it was dressed and cultivated by the apostles. Now as soon as the apostles had received the Holy Spirit, they preached and baptized, and the inferior ministers did the same, and St. Philip particularly did so at Samaria, the converts of which place received all the fruits of baptism; but christians though they were, they wanted a τελειώσις, "something to make them perfect." The other part of the narrative I shall set down in the words of St. Luke:^d "Now when the apostles which were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they sent unto them Peter and John; who, when they were come down, prayed for them that they might receive the Holy Ghost: for as yet he was fallen upon none of them, only they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. Then laid they their hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghost." If it had not been necessary to have added a new solemnity and ministration, it is not to be supposed the apostles Peter and John would have gone from Jerusalem to impose hands on the baptized at Samaria. "Id quod deerat à Petro et Joanne factum est, ut, oratione pro eis habitâ et manu impositâ, invocaretur et infunderetur super eos Spiritus Sanctus," said St. Cyprian:^e "It was not necessary that they should be baptized again, only that which was wanting was performed by Peter and John, that by prayer and imposition of hands the Holy Ghost should be invoked and poured upon them."—The same also is, from this place, affirmed by Pope Innocentius the First,^f St. Jerome,^g and many others: and in the Acts of the Apostles we find another instance of the celebration of this ritual and mystery, for it is signally expressed of the baptized christians at Ephesus, that St. Paul first baptized them, and then laid his hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghost. And these testimonies are the great warranty for this holy rite. "Quod nunc in confirmandis neophytis manûs impositio tribuit singulis, hoc tunc Spiritûs Sancti descensio in credentium populo donavit universis," said Eucherius Lugdunensis, in his homily of Pentecost: "The same thing that is done now in imposition of hands on single persons, is no other than that which was done upon all believers in the descent of the Holy Ghost;" it is the same ministry, and all deriving from the same authority.

Confirmation or imposition of hands for the collation of the Holy Spirit, we see, was actually practised by the apostles, and that even before and after they preached the gospel to the gentiles; and therefore Amalarius, who entered not much into the secret of it, reckons this ritual as derived from the apostles, "per consuetudinem," "by catholic custom;" which although it is not perfectly spoken as to the whole αὐθεντία or "authority" of it, yet he places it in the apostles, and is a witness of the catholic succeeding custom and practice of the church of God. Which thing also Zanchius observing, though he followed the sentiment of Amalarius, and seemed to understand no more of it, yet says well; "Interim" (says he) "exempla apostolorum et veteris ecclesiæ vellem pluris æstimari:" "I wish that the example of the apostles and the primitive church were of more value amongst christians.—It were very well indeed they were so; but there is more in it than mere example. These examples of such solemnities productive of such spiritual effects are, as St. Cyprian calls them, "apostolica magisteria," "the apostles are our masters" in them, and have given rules and precedents for the church to follow. This is a christian law, and "written, as all Scriptures are, for our instruction." But this I shall expressly prove in the next paragraph.

4. We have seen the original from Christ, the practice and exercise of it in the apostles and the first converts in christianity: that which I shall now remark is, that this is established and passed into a christian doctrine. The warranty for what I say, are the words of St. Paul,^h where the holy rite of confirmation, so called from the effect of this ministration, and expressed by the ritual part of it, "imposition of hands," is reckoned a fundamental point, ῥεμίλιος ἐπιθέσεως χειρῶν. "Not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith towards God, of the doctrine of baptisms, and of laying on of hands, of resurrection from the dead, and eternal judgment." Here are six fundamental points of St. Paul's catechism, which he laid as the foundation or the beginning of the institution of the christian church; and amongst these, imposition of hands is reckoned as a part of the foundation, and therefore they who deny it, dig up foundations. Now that this "imposition of hands" is that, which the apostles used in confirming the baptized, and invoking the Holy Ghost upon them, remains to be proved.

For it is true that imposition of hands signifies all christian rites except baptism and the Lord's supper; not the sacraments, but all the sacramentals of the church: it signifies confirmation, ordination, absolution, visitation of the sick, blessing single persons, (as Christ did the children brought to him,) and blessing marriages; all these were usually ministered by imposition of hands. Now the three last are not pretended to be any part of this foundation; neither reason, authority, nor the nature of the thing, suffers any such pretension: the question then is between the first three.

First, "Absolution of penitents" cannot be meant here, not only because we never read that the apostles did use that ceremony in their ablutions; but because the apostle, speaking of the foundation in which baptism is, and is reckoned one of the principal parts in the foundation, there needed no absolution but baptismal, for they and we believing "one baptism for the remission of sins;"ⁱ this is all the absolution that can be at first and in the foundation. The other was "secunda post naufragium tabula," it came in after, when men had made a shipwreck of their good conscience, and were, as St. Peter says, λήθη λαβόντες τοῦ καθαρισμοῦ τῶν πάλαι αὐτῶν ἁμαρτιῶν, "forgetful of the former cleansing and purification and washing of their old sins."^k and this is also evident. 1. Because the apostle says he would thenceforth leave to speak of the foundation, and "go on to perfection," that is, to higher mysteries. Now in rituals, of which he speaks, there is none higher than ordination. 2. The apostle saying he would speak no more of imposition of hands, goes presently to discourse of the mysteriousness of the evangelical priesthood, and the honour of that vocation; by which it is evident he spake nothing of ordination in the catechism or narrative of fundamentals. 3. This also appears from the context, not only because "laying on of hands" is immediately set after "baptism," but also because in the very next words of his discourse he does enumerate and apportion to baptism and confirmation their proper and proportioned effects: to baptism, illumination, according to the perpetual style of the church of God, calling baptism φωτισμόν, "an enlightening;" and to confirmation he reckons "tasting the heavenly gift," and "being made partakers of the Holy Ghost," by the thing signified declaring the sign, and by the mystery the rite. Upon these words St. Chrysostom discoursing, says, "that all these are fundamental articles; that is, that we ought to repent from dead works, to be baptized into the faith of Christ, and be made worthy of the gift of the Spirit, who is given by imposition of hands, and we are to be taught the mysteries of the resurrection and eternal judgment. This catechism (says he) is perfect: so that if any man have faith in God, and being baptized is also confirmed, and so tastes the heavenly gift, and partakes of the Holy Ghost, and by hope of the resurrection tastes of the good things of the world to come,—if he falls away from this state, and turns apostate from this whole dispensation, digging down and turning up these foundations, he shall never be built again, he can never be baptized again, and never be confirmed any more; God will not begin again, and go over with him again, he cannot be made a christian twice: if he remains upon these foundations, though he sins, he may be renewed ἐν μετάνοιᾳ, 'by repentance,' and by a resurrection of the Spirit, if he have not wholly quenched him; but if he renounce the whole covenant, disown and cancel these foundations, he is desperate, he can never be renewed εἰς μετάνοιαν, to the title and economy of repentance." This is the full explication of this excellent place, and any other ways it cannot reasonably be explicated: but therefore into this place any notice of ordination cannot come, no sense, no mystery, can be made of it or drawn from it; but by the interposition of confirmation the whole context is clear, rational, and intelligible.

Secondly, It cannot be meant of "ordination;"

This then is that imposition of hands, of which the apostle speaks. "Unus hic locus abunde testatur," &c. saith Calvin: "This one place doth abundantly witness that the original of this rite or ceremony was from the apostles:" οὕτω γὰρ τὸ Πνεῦμα ἐλάβετε, saith St. Chrysostom;¹ "for by this rite of imposition of hands they received the Holy Ghost."—For though the Spirit of God was given extra-regularly, and at all times, as God was pleased to do great things; yet this imposition of hands was διακονία Πνεύματος, this was "the ministry of the Spirit." For so we receive Christ, when we hear and obey his word: we eat Christ by faith, and we live by his Spirit; and yet the blessed eucharist is διακονία σώματος καὶ αἵματος, "the ministry of the body and blood of Christ." Now as the Lord's supper is appointed ritually to convey Christ's body and blood to us; so is confirmation ordained ritually to give unto us the Spirit of God. And though, by accident and by the overflowings of the Spirit, it may come to pass, that a man does receive perfective graces alone, and without ministries external: yet such a man without a miracle is not a perfect christian "ex statum vitæ dispositione;" but in the ordinary ways and appointment of God, and until he receive this imposition of hands, and be confirmed, is to be accounted an imperfect christian. But of this afterwards.

I shall observe one thing more out of this testimony of St. Paul. He calls it "the doctrine of baptisms and laying on of hands:" by which it does not only appear to be a lasting ministry, because no part of the christian doctrine could change or be abolished; but hence also it appears to be of Divine institution. For if it were not, St. Paul had been guilty of that which our blessed Saviour reproves in the scribes and Pharisees, and should have "taught for doctrines the commandments of men." Which because it cannot be supposed, it must follow, that this doctrine of confirmation or imposition of hands is apostolical and Divine. The argument is clear, and not easy to be reproved.

SECTION II.

The Rite of Confirmation is a perpetual and never-ceasing Ministry.

YEA, but what is this to us? It belonged to the days of wonder and extraordinary: the Holy Ghost breathed upon the apostles and apostolical men; but then he breathed his last: "recedente gratiâ, recessit disciplina;" when the grace departed, we had no further use of the ceremony. In answer to this I shall ψιλαῖς ἐπινοίαις, by divers particulars evince plainly, that this ministry of confirmation was not temporary and relative only to the acts of the apostles, but was to descend to the church for ever. This indeed is done already in the preceding section; in which it is clearly manifested that Christ himself^m made the baptism of the Spirit to be necessary to the church. He declared the fruits of this baptism, and did particularly relate it to the descent of the Holy Spirit upon the church at and after that glorious Pentecost. He sanctified it, and commended it by his example; just as in order to baptism he sanctified the flood Jordan, and all other waters, to the mystical washing away of sin, viz. by his great example, and fulfilling this righteousness also. This doctrine the apostles first found in their own persons and experience, and practised to all their converts after baptism by a solemn and external rite; and all this passed into an evangelical doctrine, the whole mystery being signified by the external rite in the words of the apostle, as before it was by Christ expressing only the internal; so that there needs no more strength to this argument. But that there may be wanting no moments to this truth, which the Holy Scripture affords, I shall add more weight to it: and,

1. The perpetuity of this holy rite appears, because this great gift of the Holy Ghost was promised "to abide with the church for ever." And when the Jews heard the apostles speak with tongues at the first and miraculous descent of the Spirit in Pentecost, to take off the strangeness of the wonder and the envy of the power, St. Peter^a at that very time tells them plainly, "Repent and be baptized every one of you,—and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost:" ἕκαστος ὑμῶν not the meanest person amongst you all but shall receive this great thing which ye observe us to have received; and not only you, but your children too; not your children of this generation only, "sed nati natorum, et qui nascentur ab illis," but your children for ever: "for the promise is to you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even to as many as the Lord our God shall call." Now then let it be considered,

1. This gift is by promise; by a promise not made to the apostles alone, but to all; to all for ever.

2. Consider here at the very first, as there is a "verbum," "a word" of promise, so there is "sacramentum" too (I use the word, as I have already premonished, in a large sense only, and according to the style of the primitive church): it is a rite partly moral, partly ceremonial; the first is prayer, and the other is laying on of the hands; and to an effect that is but transient and extraordinary, and of a little abode, it is not easy to be supposed that such a solemnity should be appointed. I say, "such a solemnity;" that is, it is not imaginable that a solemn rite annexed to a perpetual promise should be transient and temporary, for by the nature of relatives they must be of equal abode. The promise is of a thing for ever; the ceremony or rite was annexed to the promise, and therefore this also must be for ever.

3. This is attested by St. Paul, who reduces this argument to this mystery, saying, "In whom after that ye believed, 'signati estis Spiritu Sancto promissionis,' 'ye were sealed by that Holy Spirit of promise.'" He spake it to the Ephesians,^o who well understood his meaning by remembering what was done to themselves by the apostles but awhile before,^p who, after they had baptized them, did lay their hands upon them, and so they were sealed, and so they received the Holy Spirit of promise; for here the very matter of fact is the clearest commentary on St. Paul's words: the Spirit which was promised to all christians, they then received, when they were consigned, or had the ritual seal of confirmation by imposition of hands. One thing I shall remark here, and that is, that this and some other words of Scripture relating to the sacraments or other rituals of religion, do principally mean the internal grace, and our consignment is by a secret power, and the work is within; but it does not therefore follow, that the external rite is not also intended; for the rite is so wholly for the mystery, and the outward for the inward, and yet by the outward God so usually and regularly gives the inward, that as no man is to rely upon the external ministry, as if the "opus operatum" would do the whole duty; so no man is to neglect the external, because the internal is the more principal. The mistake in this particular hath caused great contempt of the sacraments and rituals of the church, and is the ground of the Socinian errors in these questions.

But, 4. What hinders any man from a quick consent at the first representation of these plain reasonings and authorities? Is it because there were extraordinary effects accompanying this ministration, and because now there are not, that we will suppose the whole economy must cease? If this be it, and indeed this is all that can be supposed in opposition to it, it is infinitely vain.

1. Because these extraordinary effects did continue even after the death of all the apostles. St. Irenæus^q says they did continue even to his time, even the greatest instance of miraculous power: "Et in fraternitate, sæpissime propter aliquid necessarium, eâ quæ est in quoquo loco, universâ ecclesiâ postulante per jejunium et supplicationem multam reversus est spiritus," &c. When God saw it necessary, and the church prayed and fasted much, they did miraculous things, even of reducing the spirit to a dead man.

2. In the days of the apostles the Holy Spirit did produce miraculous effects, but neither always, nor at all, in all men: "Are all workers of miracles? do all speak with tongues? do all interpret? can all heal?"^r No, "the Spirit bloweth where he listeth," and as he listeth; he gives gifts to all, but to some after this manner, and to some after that.

3. These gifts were not necessary at all times any more than to all persons; but the promise did belong to all, and was made to all, and was performed to all. In the days of the apostles there was an effusion of the Spirit of God, it ran over, it was for themselves and others, it wet the very ground they trod upon, and made it fruitful; but it was not to all in like manner, but there was also then, and since then, a diffusion of the Spirit, "tanquam in pleno." St. Stephen was full of the Holy Ghost, "he was full of faith and power:"^s the Holy Ghost was given to him to fulfil his faith principally; the working miracles was but collateral and incident. But there is also an infusion of the Holy Ghost, and that is to all, and that is for ever: "the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal," saith the apostle.¹ And therefore if the grace be given to all, there is no reason that the ritual ministration of that grace should cease, upon pretence that the Spirit is not given extraordinarily.

4. These extraordinary gifts were indeed at first necessary: "In the beginnings always appear the sensible visions of spiritual things for their sakes, who cannot receive the understanding of an incorporeal nature; that if afterward they be not so done, they may be believed by those things which were already done," said St. Chrysostom² in the place before quoted; that is, these visible appearances were given at first by reason of the imperfection of the state of the church, but the greater gifts were to abide for ever: and therefore it is observable that St. Paul says that the gift of tongues is one of the least and most useless things; a mere sign, and not so much as a sign to believers, but to infidels and unbelievers; and before this he greatly prefers the gift of prophesying or preaching, which yet, all christians know, does abide with the church for ever.

To every ordinary and perpetual ministry at first there were extraordinary effects and miraculous consignations. We find great parts of nations converted at one sermon. Three thousand converts came in at once preaching of St. Peter, and five thousand at another sermon: and persons were miraculously cured by the prayer of the bishop in his visitation of a sick christian; and devils cast out in the conversion of a sinner; and blindness cured at the baptism of St. Paul; and Æneas was healed of a palsy at the same time he was cured of his infidelity; and Eutychus was restored to life at the preaching of St. Paul. And yet that now we see no such extraordinaries, it follows not that the visitation of the sick, and preaching sermons, and absolving penitents, are not ordinary and perpetual ministrations: and therefore to fancy that invocation of the Holy Spirit and imposition of hands is to cease when the extraordinary and temporary contingencies of it are gone, is too trifling a fancy to be put in balance against so sacred an institution relying upon so many scriptures.

6. With this objection some vain persons would have troubled the church in St. Austin's time; but he considered it with much indignation, writing against the Donatists. His words are these:³ "At the first times the Holy Spirit fell upon the believers, and they spake with tongues which they had not learned, according as the Spirit gave them utterance. They were signs fitted for the season; for so the Holy Ghost ought to have signified in all tongues, because the gospel of God was to run through all the nations and languages of the world; so it was signified, and so it passed through. But is it therefore expected that they upon whom there is imposition of hands that they might receive the Holy Ghost, that they should speak with tongues? Or when we lay hands on infants, does every one of you attend to hear them speak with tongues? And when he sees that they do not speak with tongues, is any of you of so perverse a heart as to say, they have not received the Holy Ghost; for if they had received him, they would speak with tongues, as it was done at first? But if by these miracles there is not now given any testimony of the presence of the Holy Spirit, how doth any one know that he hath received the Holy Ghost? 'Interroget cor suum, Si diligit fratrem, manet Spiritus Dei in illo.'" It is true, the gift of tongues doth not remain, but all the greater gifts of the Holy Spirit remain with the church for ever; sanctification and power, fortitude and hope, faith and love. Let every man search his heart, and see if he belongs to God; whether the "love of God be not spread in his heart by the Spirit of God:" let him see if he be not patient in troubles, comforted in his afflictions, bold to confess the faith of Christ crucified, zealous of good works. These are the miracles of grace, and the mighty powers of the Spirit, according to that saying of Christ,⁴ "These signs shall follow them that believe: in my name shall they cast out devils, they shall speak with new tongues, they shall tread on serpents, they shall drink poison, and it shall not hurt them; and they shall lay their hands on the sick, and they shall recover." That which we call the miraculous part, is the less power; but to cast out the devil of lust, to throw down the pride of Lucifer, to tread on the great dragon, and to triumph over our spiritual enemies, to cure a diseased soul, to be unharmed by the poison of temptation, of evil examples and evil company: these are the true signs that shall follow them, that truly and rightly believe on the name of the Lord Jesus; this is "to live in the Spirit," and "to walk in the Spirit;" this is more than to receive the Spirit to a power of miracles and supernatural products in a natural matter: for this is from a supernatural principle to receive supernatural aids to a supernatural end in the diviner spirit of a man; and this being more miraculous than the other, it ought not to be pretended that the discontinuance of extraordinary miracles should cause the discontinuance of an ordinary ministration; and this is that which I was to prove.

7. To which it is not amiss to add this observation, that Simon Magus offered to buy this power of the apostles, that he also, by laying on of hands, might thus minister the Spirit. Now he began this sin in the christian church, and it is too frequent at this day; but if all this power be gone, then nothing of that sin can remain; if the subject-matter be removed, then the appendant crime cannot abide, and there can be no simony, so much as by participation; and whatever is or can be done in this kind, is no more of this crime than drunkenness is of adultery; it relates to it, or may be introductive of it, or be something-like it. But certainly since the church is not so happy as to be entirely free from the crime of simony, it will be hard to say that the power (the buying of which was the principle of this sin, and therefore the rule of all the rest) should be removed, and the house stand without a foundation, the relative without the correspondent, the accessory without the principal, and the accident without the subject. This is impossible, and therefore it remains that still there abides in the church this power, that, by imposition of the hands of fit persons, the Holy Ghost is ministered. But this will be further cleared in the next section.

SECTION III.

The Holy Rite of Imposition of Hands for the giving the Holy Spirit, or Confirmation, was actually continued and practised by all the succeeding Ages of the purest and primitive Church.

NEXT to the plain words of Scripture, the traditive interpretation and practice of the church of God is the best argument in the world for rituals and mystical ministrations; for the tradition is universal, and all the way acknowledged to be derived from Scripture. And although in rituals the tradition itself, if it be universal and primitive, as this is, were alone sufficient, and is so esteemed in the baptism of infants, in the priests' consecrating the holy eucharist, in public liturgies, in absolution of penitents, the Lord's day, communicating of women, and the like; yet this rite of confirmation being all that, and evidently derived from the practice apostolical, and so often recorded in the New Testament, both in the ritual and mysterious part, both in the ceremony and spiritual effect, is a point of as great certainty as it is of usefulness and holy designation.

Theophilus Antiochenus lived not long after the death of St. John,² and he derives the name of christian, which was first given to the disciples in his city, from this chrism or spiritual unction, this confirmation of baptized persons; Ἡμεῖς τούτου εἵνεκεν καλούμεθα Χριστιανοί, ὅτι χρίσμεθα ἔλαιον Θεοῦ, "We are therefore called christians, because we are anointed with the unction of God." These words will be best understood by the subsequent testimonies, by which it will appear that confirmation (for reasons hereafter mentioned) was for many ages called chrism or unction. But he adds the usefulness of it: "For who is there that enters into the world, or that enters into contention or athletic combats, but is anointed with oil?" By which words he intimates the unction anciently used in baptism, and in confirmation both: for in the first we have our new birth; in the second we are prepared for spiritual combat.

Tertullian^a having spoken of the rites of baptism, proceeds; "Dehinc" (saith he) "manus imponitur, per benedictionem advocans et invitans Spiritum Sanctum. Tunc ille Sanctissimus Spiritus super emundata et benedicta corpora libens à Patre descendit:"^b "After baptism the hand is imposed, by blessing, calling, and inviting, the Holy Spirit.

Then that most Holy Spirit willingly descends from the Father upon the bodies that are cleansed and blessed;" that is, first baptized, then confirmed. And again;^c "Caro signatur, ut anima muniatur. Caro manûs impositione adumbratur, ut anima Spiritu illuminetur;" "The flesh is consigned, or sealed," (that also is one of the known primitive words for confirmation,) "that the soul may be guarded or defended: and the body is overshadowed by the imposition of hands, that the soul may be enlightened by the Holy Ghost." Nay, further yet, if any man objects that baptism is sufficient, he answers,^d "It is true, it is sufficient to them that are to die presently; but it is not enough for them that are still to live and to fight against their spiritual enemies. For in baptism we do not receive the Holy Ghost" (for although the apostles had been baptized, yet the Holy Ghost was come upon none of them until Jesus was glorified); "sed in aquâ emundati, sub angelo Spiritui Sancto præparamur;" "but being cleansed by baptismal water, we are disposed for the Holy Spirit, under the hand of the angel of the church," under the bishop's hand. And a little after he expostulates the article: "Non licebit Deo in suo organo per manus sanctas sublimitatem modulari spiritalem?" "Is it not lawful for God, by an instrument of his own, under holy hands to accord the heights and sublimity of the Spirit?" for indeed this is the Divine order: and therefore Tertullian reckoning the happiness and excellency of the church of Rome at that time, says,^e "She believes in God, she signs with water, she clothes with the Spirit," (viz. in confirmation,) "she feeds with the eucharist, she exhorts to martyrdom; and against this order or institution she receives no man."

St. Cyprian,^f in his epistle^g to Jubaianus, having urged that of the apostles going to Samaria to impose hands on those whom St. Philip had baptized, adds, "quod nunc quoque apud nos geritur, ut qui in ecclesia baptizantur, per præpositos ecclesiæ offerantur, et per nostram orationem ac manûs impositionem Spiritum Sanctum consequantur, et signaculo Dominico consummentur:" "which custom is also descended to us, that they who are baptized might be brought by the rulers of the church, and by our prayer and the imposition of hands, (said the martyr bishop,) may obtain the Holy Ghost, and be consummated with the Lord's signature." And again:^h "Ungi necesse est eum qui baptizatus est," &c. "Et super eos qui in ecclesia baptizati erant, et ecclesiasticum et legitimum baptismum consecuti fuerant, oratione pro iis habitâ, et manu impositâ, invocaretur et infunderetur, Spiritus Sanctus:" "It is necessary that every one who is baptized, should receive the unction, that he may be Christ's anointed one, and may have in him the grace of Christ. They who have received lawful and ecclesiastical baptism, it is not necessary they should be baptized again; but that which is wanting must be supplied, viz. that prayer being made for them, and hands imposed, the Holy Ghost be invoked and poured upon them."

St. Clementⁱ of Alexandria, a man of venerable antiquity and admirable learning, tells^k that a certain young man was by St. John delivered to the care of a bishop, who having baptized him, “postea verò sigillo Domini, tanquam^l perfectâ tutâque ejus custodiâ, eum obsignavit;” “afterward he sealed him with the Lord’s signature” (the church-word for confirmation) “as with a safe and perfect guard.”

Origen^m in his seventh homily upon Ezekiel, expounding certain mystical words of the prophet, saith, “Oleum est quo vir sanctus ungitur, oleum Christi, oleum sanctæ doctrinæ. Cùm ergò aliquis accepit hoc oleum quo ungitur sanctus, id est, Scripturam Sanctam instituentem quomodo oporteat baptizari, in nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritûs Sancti, et pauca commutans unxerit quempiam, et quodammodo dixerit, Jam non es catechumenus, consecutus es lavacrum secundæ generationis; talis homo accipit oleum Dei,” &c. “The unction of Christ, of holy doctrine, is the oil by which the holy man is anointed, having been instructed in the Scriptures, and taught how to be baptized; then changing a few things he says to him, Now you are no longer a catechumen, now you are regenerated in baptism: such a man receives the unction of God,” viz. he then is to be confirmed.

St. Dionysius, commonly called the Areopagite, in his excellent book of Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, speaks most fully of the holy rite of confirmation or chrism. Having described at large the office and manner of baptizing the catechumens, the trine immersion, the vesting them in white garments, he adds, “Then they bring them again to the bishop, and he consigns him” (who had been so baptized) δουρηγικώτῳ μύρῳ, “with the most divinely-operating unction,” and then gives him the most holy eucharist. And afterwards he says,^o “But even to him who is consecrated in the most holy mystery of regeneration, τοῦ μύρου τελειωτικὴ χρίσις, the perfective unction of chrism, gives to him the advent of the Holy Spirit.” And this right of confirmation, then called chrism, from the spiritual unction then effected, and consigned also and signified by the ceremony of anointing externally, which was then the ceremony of the church, he calls it τὴν ἱερὰν τῆς δεογενείας τελείωσιν, “the holy consummation of our baptismal regeneration;” meaning, that without this, there is something wanting to the baptized persons.

And this appears fully in that famous censure of Novatus^p by Cornelius bishop of Rome, reported by^q Eusebius. Novatus had been baptized in his bed, being very sick and like to die: “but when he recovered, he did not receive those other things, which by the rule of the church he ought to have received; ‘neque Domini sigillo ab episcopo consignatus est,’ he was not consigned with the Lord’s signature by the hands of the bishop, he was not confirmed: ‘quo non impetrato, quomodo Spiritum Sanctum obtinuisse putandus est?’” which having not obtained, how can he be supposed to have received the Holy Spirit?” The same also is something more fully related by Nicephorus,^r but wholly to the same purpose.

Melchides,^s in his epistle to the bishops of Spain, argues excellently about the necessity and usefulness of the holy rite of confirmation. “What does the mystery of confirmation profit me after the mystery of baptism? Certainly we did not receive all in our baptism, if, after that lavatory, we want something of another kind. Let your charity attend. As the military order requires that when the general enters a soldier into his list, he does not only mark him, but furnishes him with arms for the battle; so in him that is baptized, this blessing is his ammunition. You have given (Christ) a soldier, give him also weapons. And what will it profit him, if a father gives a great estate to his son, if he does not take care to provide a tutor for him? Therefore the Holy Spirit is the guardian of our regeneration in Christ, he is the comforter and he is the defender.

I have already^t alleged the plain testimonies of Optatus and St. Cyril in the first section. I add to them the words of St. Gregory Nazianzen^u speaking of confirmation or the christian signature; “Hoc et viventi tibi maximum est tutamentum: ovis enim quæ sigillo insignita est, non faciliè patet insidiis; quæ verò signata non est, faciliè à furibus capitur:” “This signature is your greatest guard while you live: for a sheep, when it is marked with the master’s sign, is not so soon stolen by thieves; but easily, if she be not.”—The same manner of speaking is also used by St. Basil, who was himself together with Eubulus confirmed by Bishop Maximinus: “Quomodo curam geret tanquam ad se pertinentis angelus? Quomodo eripiat ex hostibus, si non agnoverit signaculum?” “How shall the angel know what sheep belong unto his charge? How shall he snatch them from the enemy, if he does not see their mark and signature?”—Theodoret^x also and Theophylact speak the like words: and, so far as I can perceive, these and the like sayings are most made use of by the schoolmen to be their warranty for an indelible character imprinted in confirmation. I do not interest myself in the question, but only recite the doctrine of these fathers in behalf of the practice and usefulness of confirmation.

I shall not need to transcribe hither those clear testimonies, which are cited from the epistles of St. Clement, Urban the First, Fabianus, and Cornelius; the sum of them is in those plainest words of Urban the First: “Omnes fideles per manûs impositionem episcoporum, Spiritum Sanctum post baptismum accipere debent;” “All faithful people ought to receive the Holy Spirit by imposition of the bishop’s hands after baptism.” Much more to the same purpose is to be read, collected by Gratian “de Consecrat. dist. 4. Presbyt. et de Consecrat. dist. 5. Omnes Fideles, et ibid. Spiritus Sanctus.”

St. Jerome^y brings in a Luciferian asking, “why he that is baptized in the church, does not receive the Holy Ghost, but by imposition of the bishop's hands?" The answer is, "Hanc observationem ex Scripturæ auctoritate ad sacerdotii honorem descendere," "This observation for the honour of the priesthood did descend from the authority of the Scriptures;" adding withal, "it was for the prevention of schisms, and that the safety of the church did depend upon it. 'Exigis ubi scriptum est?' 'If you ask where it is written,' it is answered, 'In Actis Apostolorum,' 'It is written in the Acts of the Apostles.' But if there were no authority of Scripture for it, 'totius orbis in hanc partem consensus instar præcepti obtineret,' 'the consent of the whole christian world in this article ought to prevail as a commandment.'" But here is a two-fold cord, Scripture and universal tradition; or rather Scripture expounded by a universal traditive interpretation. The same observation is made from Scripture by St. Chrysostom:² the words are very like those now recited from St. Jerome's Dialogue, and therefore need not to be repeated.

St. Ambrose^a calls confirmation "spirituale signaculum quod post fontem superest, ut perfectio fiat," "a spiritual seal remaining after baptism, that perfection be had."—Œcumenius calls it τελειότηα, "perfection."—"Lavacro peccata purgantur, chrismate Spiritus Sanctus superfunditur; utraque verò ista manu et ore antistitis impetramus," said Pacianus^b bishop of Barcinona: "In baptism our sins are cleansed, in confirmation the Holy Spirit is poured upon us; and both these we obtain by the hands and mouth of the bishop." And again: "Vestra plebi unde Spiritus, quam non consignat unctus sacerdos?"^c The same with that of Cornelius in the case of Novatus before cited.

I shall add no more, lest I overset the article, and make it suspicious by too laborious a defence: only after these numerous testimonies of the fathers, I think it may be useful to represent, that this holy rite of confirmation hath been decreed by many councils.

The council^d of Eliberis, celebrated in the time of Pope Sylvester the First, decreed, that whosoever is baptized in his sickness, if he recover, "ad episcopum eum perducatur, ut per manus impositionem perfici possit;" "let him be brought to the bishop, that he may be perfected by the imposition of hands." To the same purpose is the seventy-seventh canon: "Episcopus eos per benedictionem perficere debet," "The bishop must perfect those, whom the minister baptized by his benediction."

The council of Laodicea^e decreed ὅτι δὲ τοὺς φωτιζομένους κατὰ τὸ βάπτισμα χρίσθαι χρίσματι ἐπουρανίῳ, καὶ μετόχους εἶναι τῆς βασιλείας τοῦ Χριστοῦ: "all that are baptized, must be anointed with the celestial unction, and (so) be partakers of the kingdom of Christ." All that are so, that is, are confirmed; for this celestial unction is done by holy prayers and the invocation of the Holy Spirit: so Zonaras upon this canon: all such who have this unction shall reign with Christ, unless by their wickedness they preclude their own possessions. This canon was put into the code of the catholic church, and makes the one hundred and fifty-second canon.

The council of Orleans affirms expressly, that he who is baptized cannot be a christian, (meaning according to the usual style of the church, a full and perfect christian,) "nisi confirmatione episcopali fuerit chrismatus," "unless he have the unction of episcopal confirmation."^f

But when the church had long disputed concerning the rebaptizing of heretics, and made canons for and against it, according as the heretics were, and all agreed that if the first baptism had been once good, it could never be repeated; yet they thought it fit that such persons should be confirmed by the bishop, all supposing confirmation to be the perfection and consummation of the less perfect baptism. Thus the first council of Arles^g decreed concerning the Arians, that if they had been baptized in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, they should not be rebaptized. "Manus tantum eis imponatur, ut accipiant Spiritum Sanctum;" that is, "Let them be confirmed, let there be imposition of hands, that they may receive the Holy Ghost." The same is decreed by the second council of Arles^h in the case of the Bonasiaci. But I also find it in a greater record, in the general councilⁱ of Constantinople; where heretics are commanded upon their conversion to be received, "secundum constitutum officium;" there was "an office appointed" for it; and it is in the Greek Euchologion, "sigillatos, primò scilicet unctos unguento chrismatis," &c. "et signantes eos dicimus, sigillum doni Spiritus Sancti." It is the form of confirmation used to this day in the Greek church.

So many fathers testifying the practice of the church, and teaching this doctrine, and so many more fathers as were assembled in six councils, all giving witness to this holy rite, and that in pursuance also of Scripture, are too great a cloud of witnesses to be despised by any man that calls himself a christian.

SECTION IV.

The Bishops were always and the only Ministers of Confirmation.

SAINT CHRYSOSTOM^k asking the reason why the Samaritans, who were baptized by Philip, could not from him and by his ministry receive the Holy Ghost, answers, "Perhaps this was done for the honour of the apostles," to distinguish the supereminent dignity which they bore in the church from all inferior ministrations: but this answer not satisfying, he adds, "Hoc donum non habebat, erat enim ex septem illis, id quod magis videtur dicendum. Unde, meâ sententiâ, hic Philippus unus ex septem erat, secundus à Stephano; ideo et baptizans Spiritum Sanctum non dabat, neque enim facultatem habebat, hoc enim donum solorum apostolorum erat:" "This gift they had not, who baptized the Samaritans, which thing is rather to be said than the other: for Philip was one of the seven, and in my opinion next to St. Stephen; therefore though he baptized, yet he gave not the Holy Ghost; for he had no power so to do, for this gift was proper only to the apostles." "Nam virtutem quidem acceperant (diaconi) faciendi signa, non autem dandi aliis Spiritum Sanctum; igitur hoc erat in apostolis singulare, unde et præcipuos, et non alios, videmus hoc facere." "The ministers that baptized had a power of doing signs and working miracles, but not of giving the Holy Spirit; therefore this gift was peculiar to the apostles, whence it comes to pass that we see the^m chiefs in the church, and no other, to do this."

St. Dionysius says,ⁿ Χρεία τοῦ ἀρχιερέως ἔσται, "There is need of a bishop to confirm the baptized," αὐτὴ γὰρ ἦν ἡ ἀρχαία συνήθεια, "for this was the ancient custom of the church:" and "this was wont to be done by the bishops, for conservation of unity in the church of Christ," said St. Ambrose;^o "a solis episcopis," "by bishops only," said St. Austin;—for "the bishops succeeded in the place and ordinary office of the apostles," said St. Jerome. And therefore in his dialogue against the Luciferians it is said, "that this observation for the honour of the priesthood did descend, that the bishops only might by imposition of hands confer the Holy Ghost; that it comes from Scripture, that it is written in the Acts of the Apostles, that it is done for the prevention of schisms; that the safety of the church depends upon it."

But the words of Pope Innocentius I. in his first epistle and third chapter, and published in the first tome of the councils, are very full to this particular. "De consignandis infantibus, manifestum est non ab alio quàm ab episcopo fieri licere: nam presbyteri, licet sint sacerdotes, pontificatûs tamen apicem non habent: hæc autem pontificibus solis deberi, ut vel consignent, vel Paracletum Spiritum tradant, non solum consuetudo ecclesiastica demonstrat, verum et illa lectio Actuum Apostolorum, quæ asserit Petrum et Johannem esse directos, qui jam baptizatis traderent Spiritum Sanctum:" "Concerning confirmation of infants, it is manifest, it is not lawful to be done by any other than by the bishop; for although the presbyters be priests, yet they have not the summity of episcopacy: but that these things are only due to bishops, is not only demonstrated by the custom of the church, but by that of the Acts of the Apostles, where Peter and John were sent to minister the Holy Ghost to them that were baptized."—Optatus^p proves Macarius to be no bishop, because he was not conversant in the episcopal office, and imposed hands on none that were baptized. "Hoc unum à majoribus fit, id est, à summis pontificibus, quod à minoribus perfici non potest," said P. Melchhiades:^q "This (of confirmation) is only done by the greater ministers, that is, by the bishops, and cannot be done by the lesser."—This was the constant practice and doctrine of the primitive church, and derived from the practice and tradition of the apostles,^r and recorded in their Acts written by St. Luke. For this is our great rule in this case, what they did in rituals and consigned to posterity is our example and our warranty: we see it done thus, and by these men, and by no others, and no otherwise, and we have no other authority, and we have no reason to go another way. The ἄνδρες ἡγούμενοι in St. Luke, the κορυφαῖοι in St. Chrysostom, the πρόεδρος in Philo, and the πρεσβύτατος, "the chief governor," in ecclesiastics, his office is τὰ μὴ γνώριμα ἐν τοῖς βίβλοις ἀναδιδάσκειν, "to teach such things as are not set down in books;" their practice is a sermon, their example in these things must be our rule, or else we must walk irregularly, and have no rule but chance and humour, empire and usurpation; and therefore much rather, when it is recorded in holy writ, must this observation be esteemed sacred and inviolable.

But how if a bishop be not to be had or not ready? St. Ambrose^s is pretended to have answered, "Apud Ægyptum presbyteri consignant, si præsens non sit episcopus," "A presbyter may consign, if the bishop be not present;" and Amalarius^t affirms, "Sylvestrum Papam, prævidentem quantum periculosum iter arriperet qui sine confirmatione maneret, quantum potuit subvenisse, et propter absentiam episcoporum, necessitate addidisse, ut à presbytero ungerentur," "that Pope Sylvester, foreseeing how dangerous a journey he takes who abides without confirmation, brought remedy as far as he could, and commanded that in the absence of bishops they should be anointed by the priest:" and therefore it is by some supposed that "factum valet, fieri non debuit," "the thing ought not to be done but in the proper and appointed way;" but when it is done, it is valid; just as in the case of baptism by a layman or woman. Nay, though some canons say it is "actio irrita," "the act is null," yet for this there is a salvo pretended; for sometimes an action is said to be "irrita" in law, which yet nevertheless is of secret and permanent value, and ought not to be done again. Thus if a priest be promoted by simony, it is said "sacerdos non est, sed inanitur tantum dicitur," "he is but vainly called a priest, for he is no priest."^u So Sixtus II. said, "that if a bishop ordain in another's diocese, the ordination is void;" and in the law it is said, "that if a bishop be consecrated without his clergy and the congregation, the consecration is null:" and yet these later and fiercer constitutions do not determine concerning the natural event of things, but of the legal and canonical approbation.

To these things I answer, that St. Ambrose's saying that "in Egypt, the presbyters consign in the bishops' absence," does not prove that they ever did confirm or impose hands on the baptized for the ministry of the Holy Spirit; because that very passage being related by St. Austin,^x the more general word of "consign" is rendered by the plainer and more particular "consecrant," "they consecrate," meaning the blessed eucharist; which was not permitted primitively to a simple priest to do in the bishop's absence without leave; only in Egypt it seems they had a general leave, and the bishop's absence was an interpretative consent. But besides this, "consignant" is best interpreted by the practice of the church, of which I shall presently give an account; they might, in the absence of the bishop, consign with oil upon the top of the head, but not in the forehead; much less impose hands, or confirm, or minister the Holy Spirit: for the case was this.

It was very early in the church, that, to represent the grace which was ministered in confirmation, the unction from above, they used oil and balsam; and so constantly used this in their confirmations, that from the ceremony it had the appellation; "sacramentum chrismatis," St. Austin^y calls it;—ἐν μύρῳ τελείωσις, so Dionysius. Now because at the baptism of the adult christians, and (by imitation of that) of infants, confirmation and baptism were usually ministered at the same time; the unction was not only used to persons newly baptized, but another unction was added as a ceremony in baptism itself, and was used immediately before baptism; and the oil was put on the top of the head, and three times was the party signed. So it was then, as we find in the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy. But besides this unction with oil in baptismal preparations, and pouring oil into the baptismal water, we find another unction after the baptism was finished. For they bring the baptized person "again to the bishop, (saith St. Dionysius,) who, signing the man with hallowed chrism, gives him the holy eucharist." This they called χρίσιν τελειωτικήν, "the perfective or consummating unction;" this was that which was used when the bishop confirmed the baptized person: "for to him who is initiated by the most holy initiation of the Divine generation, (that is, to him who hath been baptized, said Pachimeres, the paraphrast of Dionysius,) the perfective unction of chrism gives the gift of the Holy Ghost."—This is that which the Laodicean^a council calls χρίσθαι μετὰ τὸ βάπτισμα, "to be anointed after baptism." Both these unctions were intimated by Theophilus Antiochenus: Τίς δὲ ἄνθρωπος εἰσελθὼν εἰς τόνδε τον βίον, ἢ ἀθλῶν, οὐ χρίεται ἐλαίῳ; "Every man that is born into the world, and every man that is a champion, is anointed with oil:" that to baptism, this alluding to confirmation.

Now this chrism was frequently ministered immediately after baptism, in the cities where the bishop was present: but in villages and little towns where the bishop was not present, it could not be; but bishops were forced at their opportunities to go abroad and perfect what was wanting, as it was in the example of Peter and John to the Samaritans. "Non quidem abnuo hanc esse ecclesiarum consuetudinem, ut ad eos qui longè in minoribus urbibus per presbyteros et diaconos baptizati sunt, episcopus ad invocationem Sancti Spiritus manum impositurus excurrat:" "It is the custom of the church, that when persons are in lesser cities baptized by priests and deacons, the bishop uses to travel far, that he may lay hands on them for the invocation of the Holy Spirit."^b But because this could not always be done, and because many baptized persons died before such an opportunity could be had; the church took up a custom, that the bishop should consecrate the chrism, and send it to the villages and little cities distant from the metropolis, and that the priests should anoint the baptized with it. But still they kept this part of it sacred and peculiar to the bishop: 1. That no chrism should be used but what the bishop consecrated; 2. That the priests should anoint the head of the baptized, but at no hand the forehead, for that was still reserved for the bishop to do when he confirmed them. And this is evident in the epistle of Pope Innocentius the First, above quoted. "Nam presbyteris, seu extra episcopum seu præsente episcopo baptizant, chrismate baptizatos ungere licet, sed quod ab episcopo fuerit consecratum; non tamen frontem ex eodem oleo signare, quod solis debetur episcopis, cum tradunt Spiritum Paracletum." Now this the bishops did, not only to satisfy the desire of the baptized, but by this ceremony to excite the "votum confirmationis," that they who could not actually be confirmed, might at least have it "in voto" "in desire," and in ecclesiastical representation. This, as some think, was first introduced by Pope Sylvester: and this is the consignation which the priests of Egypt used in the absence of the bishop; and this became afterwards the practice in other churches.

But this was no part of the holy rite of confirmation, but a ceremony annexed to it ordinarily; from thence transmitted to baptism, first by imitation, afterwards by way of supply and in defect of the opportunities of confirmation episcopal. And therefore we find in the first Arausican council,^c in the time of Leo the First and Theodosius junior, it was decreed, "that in baptism every one should receive chrism: 'de eo autem qui in baptismate, quâcunque necessitate faciente, chrismatus non fuerit, in confirmatione sacerdos communebitur:' 'if the baptized by any intervening accident or necessity was not anointed, the bishop should be advertised of it in confirmation;' " meaning, that then it must be done. For the chrism was but a ceremony annexed, no part of either rite essential to it; but yet they thought it necessary, by reason of some opinions then prevailing in the church. But here the rites themselves are clearly distinguished; and this of confirmation was never permitted to mere presbyters. Innocentius the Third, a great canonist and of great authority, gives a full evidence in this particular: "Per frontis chrismationem manûs impositio designatur, quia per eam Spiritus Sanctus per augmentum datur et robor. Unde cum cæteras unctiones simplex sacerdos vel presbyter valeat exhibere, hanc non nisi summus sacerdos vel presbyter valeat exhibere, id est, episcopus conferre." "By anointing of the forehead the imposition of hands is designed, because by that the Holy Ghost is given for increase and strength; therefore when a single priest may give the other unctions, yet this cannot be done but by the chief priest, that is, the bishop."—And therefore to the question, What shall be done if a bishop may not be had? the same Innocentius answers, "It is safer and without danger wholly to omit it, than to have it rashly and without authority ministered by any other; 'cum umbra quædam ostendatur in opere, veritas autem non subeat in effectu;' 'for it is a mere shadow without truth or real effect,' when any one else does it but the person whom God hath appointed to this ministration." And no approved man of the church did ever say the contrary, till Richard, primate of Armagh, commenced a new opinion, from whence, Thomas of Walden says, that Wickliffe borrowed his doctrine to trouble the church in this particular.

What the doctrine of the ancient church was in the purest times, I have already, I hope, sufficiently declared; what it was afterwards, when the ceremony of chrism was as much remarked as the rite to which it ministered, we find fully declared by Rabanus Maurus:^d "Signatur baptizatus cum chrismate per sacerdotem in capitis summitate, per Pontificem verò in fronte; ut priori unctione significetur Spiritus Sancti super ipsum descensio ad habitationem Deo consecrandum; in secundâ quoque, ut ejus Spiritus Sancti septiformis gratia, cum omni plenitudine sanctitatis et scientiæ et virtutis, venire in hominem declaretur: tunc enim ipse Spiritus Sanctus post mundata et benedicta corpora atque animas liberè à Patre descendit, ut unâ cum suâ visitatione sanctificaret et illustraret; et nunc in hominem ad hoc venit, ut signaculum fidei, quod in fronte suscepit, faciat cum donis cælestibus repletum, et suâ gratiâ confortatum, intrepidè et audacter coram regibus et potestatibus hujus seculi portare, ac nomen Christi liberâ voce prædicare." "In baptism the baptized was anointed on the top of the head, in confirmation on the forehead: by that was signified that the Holy Ghost was preparing a habitation for himself; by this was declared the descent of the Holy Spirit, with his seven-fold gifts, with all fulness of knowledge and spiritual understanding." These things were signified by the appendant ceremony; but the rights were ever distinguished, and did not only signify and declare, but effect, these graces by the ministry of prayer and imposition of hands.

The ceremony of the church instituted and used as she pleased, and gave in what circumstances they would choose; and new propositions entered, and customs changed, and deputations were made; and the bishops, in whom by Christ was placed the fulness of ecclesiastical power, concredited to the bishops and deacons so much as their occasions and necessities permitted: and because in those ages and places where the external ceremony was regarded, it may be, more than the inward mystery or the rite of Divine appointment, they were apt to believe that the chrism or exterior unction, delegated to the priest's ministry after the episcopal consecration of it, might supply the want of episcopal confirmation; it came to pass that new opinions were entertained, and the regulars, the friars and the Jesuits, who were always too little friends to the episcopal power, from which they would fain have been wholly exempted, publicly taught (in England especially) that chrism ministered by them with leave from the pope did do all that which ordinarily was to be done in episcopal confirmation. For, as Tertullian complained in his time, "Quibus fuit propositum aliter docendi, eos necessitas coegit aliter disponendi instrumenta doctrinæ;" "They who had purposes of teaching new doctrines, were constrained otherwise to dispose of the instruments and rituals appertaining to their doctrines." These men, to serve ends, destroyed the article, and overthrew the ancient discipline and unity of the primitive church. But they were justly censured by the theological faculty at Paris, and the censure well defended by Hallier, one of the doctors of the Sorbonne; whither I refer the reader that is curious in little things.

But for the main: it was ever called "confirmatio episcopalis, et impositio manuum episcoporum;" which our English word well expresses, and perfectly retains the use; we know it by the common name of "bishopsing of children." I shall no further insist upon it, only I shall observe that there is a vain distinction brought into the schools and glosses of the canon law, of a minister ordinary, and extraordinary; all allowing that the bishop is appointed the ordinary minister of confirmation, but they would fain innovate, and pretend, that in some cases others may be ministers extraordinary. This device is of infinite danger to the destruction of the whole sacred order of the ministry, and disparks the enclosures, and lays all in common, and makes men supreme controllers of the orders of God, and relies upon a false principle; for in true divinity, and by the economy of the Spirit of God, there can be no minister of any Divine ordinance but he that is of Divine appointment, there can be none but the ordinary minister. I do not say that God is tied to this way; he cannot be tied but by himself: and therefore Christ gave a special commission to Ananias to baptize and to confirm St. Paul, and he gave the Spirit to Cornelius even before he was baptized, and he ordained St. Paul to be an apostle without the ministry of man. But this I say, that though God can make ministers extraordinary, yet man cannot; and they that go about to do so, usurp the power of Christ, and snatch from his hand what he never intended to part with. The apostles admitted others into a part of their care and of their power; but when they intended to employ them in any ministry, they gave them so much of their order as would enable them; but a person of lower order could never be deputed minister of actions appropriate to the higher: which is the case of confirmation, by the practice and tradition of the apostles, and by the universal practice and doctrine of the primitive catholic church, by which bishops only, the successors of the apostles, were alone the ministers of confirmation: and therefore if any man else usurp it, let them answer it; they do hurt indeed to themselves, but no benefit to others, to whom they minister shadows instead of substances.

SECTION V.

The whole Procedure or Ritual of Confirmation is by Prayer and Imposition of Hands.

THE heart and the eye are lift up to God to bring blessings from him, and so is the hand too; but this also falls upon the people, and rests there, to apply the descending blessing to the proper and prepared suscipient. God governed the people of Israel by the hand of Moses and Aaron:

— et calidæ fecere silentia turbæ
Majestate manūs:

and both under Moses and under Christ, whenever the president of religion did bless the people, he lifted up his hand over the congregation; and when he blessed a single person he laid his hand upon him. This was the rite used by Jacob and the patriarchs, by kings and prophets, by all the eminently religious in the synagogue, and by Christ himself when he blessed the children which were brought to him, and by the apostles when they blessed and confirmed the baptized converts; and whom else can the church follow? The apostles did so to the christians of Samaria, to them of Ephesus; and St. Paul describes this whole mystery by the ritual part of it, calling it “the foundation of the imposition of hands.”^e It is the solemnity of blessing, and the solemnity and application of paternal prayer. Τίτι γὰρ ἐπιτίθει χειρά; τίνα δὲ εὐλογήσει; said Clement^f of Alexandria; “Upon whom shall he lay his hands? whom shall he bless?”—“Quid enim aliud est impositio manuum, nisi oratio super hominem?” said St. Austin; “The bishop’s laying his hands on the people, what is it but the solemnity of prayer for them?” that is, a prayer made by those sacred persons who by Christ are appointed to pray for them, and to bless in his name: and so indeed are all the ministries of the church, baptism, consecration of the blessed eucharist, absolution, ordination, visitation of the sick; they are all “in genere orationis,” they are nothing but solemn and appointed “prayer” by an intrusted and a gracious person, specificated by a proper order to the end of the blessing then designed. And therefore, when St. James commanded that the sick persons should “send for the elders of the church,” he adds, “and let them pray over them:” that is, lay their hands on the sick, and pray for them; that is praying over them: it is “adumbratio dextræ,” (as Tertullian calls it,) “the right hand of him that ministers, overshadows” the person, for whom the solemn prayer is to be made.

This is the office of the rulers of the church; for they in the Divine eutaxy are made your superiors: they are indeed “your servants for Jesus’s sake,” but they “are over you in the Lord,” and therefore are from the Lord appointed to bless the people; for “without contradiction,” saith the apostle, “the less is blessed of the greater;”^g that is, God hath appointed the superiors in religion to be the great ministers of prayer, he hath made them the gracious persons, them he will hear, those he hath commanded to convey your needs to God, and God’s blessings to you, and to ask a blessing is to desire them to pray for you; them, I say, “whom God most respecteth for their piety and zeal that way, or else regardeth for that their place and calling bind them above others to do this duty, such as are natural and spiritual fathers.”^h

It is easy for profane persons to deride these things, as they do all religion which is not conveyed to them by sense or natural demonstrations: but the economy of the Spirit and “the things of God are spiritually discerned.”—“The Spirit bloweth where it listeth, and no man knows whence it comes, and whither it goes;” and the operations are discerned by faith, and received by love and by obedience. “Date mihi christianum, et intelligit quod dico;” “None but true christians understand and feel these things.” But of this we are sure, that in all the times of Moses’s law, while the synagogue was standing, and in all the days of christianity, so long as men loved religion, and walked in the Spirit, and minded the affairs of their souls, to have the prayers and the blessing of the fathers of the synagogue and the fathers of the church, was esteemed no small part of their religion, and so they went to heaven. But that which I intend to say is this, that prayer and imposition of hands were the whole procedure in the christian rites: and because this ministry was most signally performed by this ceremony, and was also by St. Paul called and noted by the name of the ceremony, “imposition of hands;” this name was retained in the christian church, and this manner of ministering confirmation was all that was in the commandment or institution.

But because, in confirmation, we receive the unction from above, that is, then we are most signally “made kings and priests unto God, to offer up spiritual sacrifices,” and to enable us to “seek the kingdom of God and the righteousness of it,” and that the giving of the Holy Spirit is in Scripture called “the unction from above;” the church of God in early ages made use of this allegory, and passed it into an external ceremony and representation of the mystery, to signify the inward grace.

^g Heb. vii. 7.

Post inscripta oleo frontis signacula, per quæ
Unguentum regale datum est, et chrisma perenne.¹

"We are consigned on the forehead with oil, and a royal unction and an eternal chrism are given to us:" so Prudentius^k gives testimony of the ministry of confirmation in his time. Τοῦτο φυλάξατε ἁσπιλον· πάντων γάρ ἐστι τοῦτο διδακτικόν, καθὼς ἀρτίως ἡκούσατε τοῦ μακαρίου Ἰωάννου λέγοντος καὶ πολλὰ περὶ τοῦτου χρίσματος φιλοσοφούντος, said St. Cyril: "Preserve this unction pure and spotless: for it teaches you all things, as you have heard the blessed St. John speaking and philosophizing many things of this holy chrism."¹ Upon this account the holy fathers used to bless and consecrate oil and balsam, that, by an external signature, they might signify the inward unction effected in confirmation. Μύρον τοῦτο οὐκ ἔστι ψιλόν, οὐδ' ὡς ἂν τις εἴποι κοινὸν κατ' ἐπικλήσιν, ἀλλὰ Χριστοῦ χάρισμα, καὶ Πνεύματος ἁγίου παρουσία, τῆς αὐτῆς θεότητος ἐνεργητικὸν γινόμενον, "This chrism is not simple or common when it is blessed, but the gift of Christ, and the presence of his Holy Spirit, as it were effecting the Divinity itself;" the body is indeed anointed with visible ointment, but is also sanctified by the holy and quickening Spirit: so St. Cyril. I find in him and in some late synods^m other pretty significations and allusions made by this ceremony of chrisms. "Nos autem pro igne visibili, qui die Pentecostes super apostolos apparuit, oleum sanctum, materiam nempe ignis ex apostolorum traditione, ad confirmandum adhibemus:" "This using of oil was instead of the baptism with fire, which Christ baptized his apostles with in Pentecost; and oil, being the most proper matter of fire, is therefore used in confirmation."

That this was the ancient ceremony is without doubt, and that the church had power to do so hath no question, and I add, it was not unreasonable; for if ever the Scripture expresses the mysteriousness of a grace conferred by an exterior ministry, (as this is, by imposition of hands,) and represents it besides in the expression and analogy of any sensible thing, that expression drawn into a ceremony will not improperly signify the grace, since the Holy Ghost did choose that for his own expression and representment. In baptism we are said to be "buried with Christ." The church does according to the analogy of that expression, when she immerses the catechumen in the font; for then she represents the same thing which the Holy Ghost would have to be represented in that sacrament: the church did but the same thing when she used chrism in this ministration. This I speak in justification of that ancient practice: but because there was no command for it, λόγος γεγραμμένος οὐκ ἔστι, said St. Basil;ⁿ "concerning chrism there is no written word," that is, of the ceremony there is not; he said it not of the wholerite of confirmation; therefore though to this we are all bound,—yet as to the anointing, the church is at liberty, and hath with sufficient authority omitted it in our ministrations.

In the liturgy of King Edward the Sixth, the bishops used the sign of the cross upon the foreheads of them that were to be confirmed. I do not find it since forbidden, or revoked by any expression or intimation, saving only that it is omitted in our later offices: and therefore it may seem to be permitted to the discretion of the bishops, but yet not to be used unless where it may be for edification, and where it may be by the consent of the church, at least by interpretation; concerning which I have nothing else to interpose, but that neither this, nor any thing else which is not of the nature and institution of the rite, ought to be done by private authority, nor ever at all but according to the apostle's rule, εὐσχημόνως καὶ κατὰ τάξιν, "whatsoever is decent, and whatsoever is according to order," that is to be done, and nothing else; for prayer and imposition of hands for the invoking and giving the Holy Spirit, are all that are in the foundation and institution.

SECTION VI.

Many great Graces and Blessings are consequent to the worthy Reception and due Ministry of Confirmation.

IT is of itself enough, when it is fully understood, what is said in the Acts of the Apostles at the first ministration of this rite; "they received the Holy Ghost;" that is, according to the expression of our blessed Saviour himself to the apostles, when he commanded them in Jerusalem to expect the verification of his glorious promise, "they were endued with virtue from on high;" that is, with strength to perform their duty: which although it is not to be understood exclusively to the other rites and ministries of the church of Divine appointment, yet it is properly and most signally true, and as it were in some sense appropriate to this. For, as Aquinas^o well discourses, the grace of Christ is not tied to the sacraments; but even this spiritual strength and virtue from on high can be had without confirmation: as without baptism remission of sins may be had; and yet we believe one baptism for the remission of sins; and one confirmation for the obtaining this virtue from on high, this strength of the Spirit. But it is so appropriate to it by promise and peculiarity of ministration, that as, without the desire of baptism, our sins are not pardoned, so without at least the desire of confirmation, we cannot receive this virtue from on high, which is appointed to descend in the ministry of the Spirit. It is true, the ministry of the holy eucharist is greatly effective to this purpose; and therefore in the ages of martyrs the bishops were careful to give the people the holy communion frequently. "Ut quos tutos esse contra adversarium volebant, munimento Dominicæ saturitatis armarent," as St. Cyprian^p with his colleagues wrote to Cornelius; "that those whom they would have to be safe against the contentions of their adversaries, they should arm them with the guards and defences of the Lord's fulness." But it is to be remembered that the Lord's supper is for the more perfect christians, and it is for the increase of the graces received formerly, and therefore it is for remission of sins, and yet is no prejudice to the necessity of baptism, whose proper work is remission of sins; and therefore neither does it make confirmation unnecessary: for it renews the work of both the precedent rites, and repairs the breaches, and adds new energy, and proceeds in the same dispensations, and is renewed often, whereas the others are but once.

Excellent therefore are the words of John Gerson,^q the famous chancellor of Paris, to this purpose: "It may be said that in one way of speaking confirmation is necessary, and in another it is not. Confirmation is not necessary, as baptism and repentance, for without these salvation cannot be had. This necessity is absolute; but there is a conditional necessity. Thus if a man would not become weak, it is necessary that he eat his meat well. And so confirmation is necessary, that the spiritual life and the health, gotten in baptism, may be preserved in strength against our spiritual enemies. For this is given for strength. Hence is that saying of Hugo de St. Victore; "What does it profit that thou art raised up by baptism, if thou art not able to stand by confirmation?" Not that baptism is not of value unto salvation without confirmation; but because he who is not confirmed, will easily fall, and too readily perish." The Spirit of God comes which way he pleases, but we are tied to use his own economy, and expect the blessings appointed by his own ministries: and because to prayer is promised we shall receive whatever we ask, we may as well omit the receiving the holy eucharist, pretending that prayer alone will procure the blessings expected in the other,—as well, I say, as omit confirmation, because we hope to be strengthened and receive virtue from on high by the use of the supper of the Lord. Let us use all the ministries of grace in their season; for "we know not which shall prosper, this or that, or whether they shall be both alike good:" this only we know, that the ministries which God appoints, are the proper seasons and opportunities of grace.

This power from on high, which is the proper blessing of confirmation, was expressed, not only in speaking with tongues and doing miracles,—for much of this they had before they received the Holy Ghost,—but it was effected in spiritual and internal strengths; they were not only enabled for the service of the church, but were endued with courage, and wisdom, and christian fortitude, and boldness, to confess the faith of Christ crucified, and unity of heart and mind, singleness of heart, and joy in God; when it was for the edification of the church, miracles were done in confirmations; and St. Bernard, in the life of Malachias, tells that St. Malchus, bishop of Lismore in Ireland, confirmed a lunatic child, and at the same time cured him: but such things as these are extra-regular and contingent. This which we speak of, is a regular ministry, and must have a regular effect.

St. Austin said that the Holy Spirit in confirmation was given "ad dilatanda ecclesiæ primordia," "for the propagating christianity in the beginnings of the church."—St. Jerome says, it was "propter honorem sacerdotii," "for the honour of the priesthood."—St. Ambrose says, it was "ad confirmationem unitatis in ecclesiâ Christi;" "for the confirmation of unity in the church of Christ."—And they all say true: but the first was by the miraculous consignations, which did accompany this ministry; and the other two were by reason that the mysteries were τὰ προτελεσθέντα ὑπὸ τοῦ ἐπισκόπου, they were appropriated to the ministry of the bishop, who is "caput unitatis," "the head," the last resort, the firmament "of unity" in the church. These effects were regular indeed, but they were incident and accidental: there are effects yet more proper, and of greater excellency.

Now if we will understand in general what excellent fruits are consequent to this dispensation, we may best receive the notice of them from the fountain itself, our blessed Saviour. "He that believes, out of his belly (as the Scripture saith)^r shall flow rivers of living waters. But this he spake of the Spirit, which they that believe on him should receive."—This is evidently spoken of the Spirit, which came down in Pentecost, which was promised to all that should believe in Christ, and which the apostles ministered by imposition of hands, the Holy Ghost himself being the expositor; and it can signify no less, but that a spring of life should be put into the heart of the confirmed, to water the plants of God; that they should become "trees," not only "planted by the water-side" (for so it was in David's time, and in all the ministry of the Old Testament); but having "a river of living water" within them, to make them "fruitful of good works," and "bringing their fruit in due season, fruits worthy of amendment of life."

1. But the principal thing is this: confirmation is the consummation and perfection, the corroboration and strength, of baptism and baptismal grace; for in baptism we undertake to do our duty, but in confirmation we receive strength to do it; in baptism others promise for us, in confirmation we undertake for ourselves, we ease our godfathers and godmothers of their burden, and take it upon our shoulders, together with the advantage of the prayers of the bishop and all the church made then in our behalf; in baptism we give up our names to Christ, but in confirmation we put our seal to the profession, and God puts his seal to the promise. It is very remarkable what St. Paul says of the beginnings of our being christians, ὁ τοῦ ἀρχῆς τοῦ

Χριστοῦ λόγος, "the word of the beginning of Christ:"^s Christ begins with us, he gives us his word and admits us, and we by others' hands are brought in, τύπος διδαχῆς εἰς ὃν παρεδόθητε, it is the "form of doctrine, unto which ye were delivered." Cajetan observes right, that this is a new and emphatical way of speaking: we are wholly immersed in our fundamentals; other things are delivered to us, but we are delivered up unto these. This is done in baptism and catechism; and what was the event of it? "Being then made free from sin, ye became the servants of righteousness."^t Your baptism was for the remission of sins there, and then ye were made free from that bondage: and what then? why then in the next place, when ye came to consummate this procedure, when the baptized was confirmed, then he became a servant of righteousness, that is, then the Holy Ghost descended upon you, and enabled you to walk in the Spirit; then the seed of God was first thrown into your hearts by a celestial influence. "Spiritus Sanctus in baptisterio plenitudinem tribuit ad innocentiam, sed in confirmatione augmentum præstat ad gratiam," said Eusebius Emissenus:^u "In baptism we are made innocent, in confirmation we receive the increase of the Spirit of grace;" in that we are regenerated unto life, in this we are strengthened unto battle. "Dono sapientiæ illuminamur, ædificamur, crudimur, instruimur, confirmamur, ut illam Sancti Spiritus vocem audire possimus, intellectum tibi dabo, et instruam te in hac vitâ quâ gradieris," said P. Melchiades;^v "We are enlightened by the gift of wisdom, we are built up, taught, instructed, and confirmed; so that we may hear that voice of the Holy Spirit, I will give unto thee an understanding heart, and teach thee in the way wherein thou shalt walk:" for so,

"It is a work of great and wonderful power, when the holy pledge of God is poured forth upon the people."—This is that power from on high, which first descended in Pentecost, and afterward was ministered by prayer and imposition of the apostolical and episcopal hands, and comes after the other gift of remission of sins. "Vides quòd non simpliciter hoc fit, sed multà opus est virtute, ut detur Spiritus Sanctus. Non enim idem est assequi remissionem peccatorum, et accipere virtutem illam," said St. Chrysostom;^z "You see that this is not easily done, but there is need of much power from on high to give the Holy Spirit; for it is not all one to obtain remission of sins, and to have received this virtue or power from above."—"Quamvis enim continuò, transituris sufficient regenerationis beneficia, victuris tamen necessaria sunt confirmationis auxilia," said Melchiades: "Although to them that die presently, the benefits of regeneration (baptismal) are sufficient, yet to them that live, the auxiliaries of confirmation are necessary."—For, according to the saying of St. Leo, in his epistle to Nicetas the bishop of Aquileia, commanding that heretics returning to the church should be confirmed with invocation of the Holy Spirit and imposition of hands, "they have only received the form of baptism 'sine sanctificationis virtute,' 'without the virtue of sanctification:'" meaning, that this is the proper effect of confirmation. For, in short, "although the newly-listed soldiers in human warfare are enrolled in the number of them that are to fight, yet they are not brought to battle till they be more trained and exercised. So although by baptism every one is ascribed into the catalogue of believers, yet he receives more strength and grace for the sustaining and overcoming the temptations of the flesh, the world, and the devil, only by imposition of the bishop's hands:"—They are words which I borrowed from a late synod at Rheims.—That is the first remark of blessing, in confirmation we receive strength to do all that which was for us undertaken in baptism: for the apostles themselves (as the holy fathers observe) were timorous in the faith until they were confirmed in Pentecost; but after the reception of the Holy Ghost they waxed valiant in the faith, and in all their spiritual combats.

2. In confirmation we receive the Holy Ghost as the earnest of our inheritance, as the seal of our salvation: Καλοῦμεν σφραγίδα, ὡς συντήρησιν καὶ τῆς δεσποτείας σημείωσιν, saith Gregory Nazianzen; "We therefore call it a seal or signature, as being a guard and custody to us, and a sign of the Lord's dominion over us."—The confirmed person is προῤῥατον ἐσφραγισμένον, "a sheep that is marked,"—which thieves do not so easily steal and carry away. To the same purpose are those words of Theodoret:^a Ἀνάμνησον σεαυτὸν τῆς ἱερᾶς μυσταγωγίας, ἐν ᾗ οἱ τελούμενοι, μετὰ τὴν ἄρνησιν τοῦ τυράννου, καὶ τὴν τοῦ βασιλέως ὁμολογίαν, οἰονεὶ σφραγίδα τινα βασιλικὴν ἔχονται τοῦ Πνευματικοῦ μύρου τῷ χρίσμα, ὡς ἐν τύπῳ τῷ μύρῳ τὴν ἀόρατον τοῦ ἁγίου Πνεύματος χάριν ὑποδεχόμενοι. "Remember that holy mystagogy, in which they who were initiated, after renouncing that tyrant," (the devil and all his works,) "and the confession of the true King," (Jesus Christ,) "have received the chrism of spiritual unction like a royal signature, by that unction, as in a shadow, perceiving the invisible grace of the most Holy Spirit."—That is, in confirmation we are sealed for the service of God and unto the day of redemption; then it is that the seal of God is had by us, "the Lord knoweth who are his."—"Quomodo verò dices, Dei sum, si notas non produxeris?" said St. Basil;^b "How can any man say, I am God's sheep, unless he produce the marks?"—Signati estis Spiritu promissionis per sanctissimum divinum Spiritum, Domini grex effecti sumus," said Theophylact: "When we are thus sealed by the most holy and divine Spirit of promise, then we are truly of the Lord's flock, and marked with his seal:" that is, when we are rightly confirmed, then he descends into our souls; and though he does not operate, it may be, presently, but as the reasonable soul works in its due time, and by the order of nature, by opportunities and new fermentations and actualities; so does the Spirit of God: when he is brought into use, when he is prayed for with love and assiduity, when he is caressed tenderly, when he is used lovingly, when we obey his motions readily, when we delight in his words greatly,—then we find it true, that the soul had a new life put into her, a principle of perpetual actions: but the tree planted by the water-side does not presently bear fruit, but “in its due season.” By this Spirit we are then sealed; that whereas God hath laid up an inheritance for us in the kingdom of heaven, and in the faith of that we must live and labour, to confirm this faith God hath given us this pledge, the Spirit of God is a witness to us, and tells us by his holy comforts, by the peace of God, and the quietness and refreshments of a good conscience, that God is our Father, that we are his sons and daughters, and shall be coheirs with Jesus in his eternal kingdom. In baptism we are made the sons of God, but we receive the witness and testimony of it in confirmation. This is ὁ Παράκλητος, the Holy Ghost, “the Comforter,” this is he whom Christ promised and did send in Pentecost, and was afterward ministered and conveyed by prayer and imposition of hands: and by this Spirit he makes the confessors bold, and the martyrs valiant, and the tempted strong, and the virgins to persevere, and widows to sing his praises and his glories. And this is that excellency which the church of God called “the Lord’s seal,” and teaches to be imprinted in confirmation: τὸ τέλειον φυλακτήριον, τὴν σφραγιδα τοῦ Κυρίου, “a perfect phylactery” or guard, even “the Lord’s seal;” so Eusebius calls it.

I will not be so curious as to enter into a discourse of the philosophy of this: but I shall say, that they who are curious in the secrets of nature, and observe external signatures in stones, plants, fruits, and shells, of which naturalists make many observations and observe strange effects, and the more internal signatures in minerals and living bodies, of which chemists discourse strange secrets, may easily, if they please, consider that it is infinitely credible, that in higher essences, even in spirits, there may be signatures proportionable, wrought more immediately and to greater purposes by a Divine hand. I only point at this, and so pass it over as, it may be, not fit for every man’s consideration.

And now if any man shall say, we see no such things as you talk of, and find the confirmed people the same after as before, no better and no wiser, not richer in gifts, not more adorned with graces, nothing more zealous for Christ’s kingdom, not more comforted with hope, or established by faith, or built up with charity; they neither speak better, nor live better: what then? Does it therefore follow that the Holy Ghost is not given in confirmation? Nothing less. For is not Christ given us in the sacrament of the Lord’s supper? Do not we receive his body and his blood? Are we not made all one with Christ, and he with us? And yet it is too true, that when we arise from that holy feast, thousands there are that find no change. But there are in this two things to be considered.

One is, that the changes which are wrought upon our souls are not, after the manner of nature, visible, and sensible, and with observation. “The kingdom of God cometh not with observation:” for it is within you, and is only discerned spiritually, and produces its effects by the method of heaven, and is first apprehended by faith, and is endeared by charity, and at last is understood by holy and kind experiences. And in this there is no more objection against confirmation than against baptism, or the Lord’s supper, or any other ministry evangelical.

The other thing is this: if we do not find the effects of the Spirit in confirmation, it is our faults. For he is received by moral instruments, and is intended only as a help to our endeavours, to our labours and our prayers, to our contentions and our mortifications, to our faith and to our hope, to our patience and to our charity. “Non adjuvari dicitur, qui nihil facit,” “He that does nothing, cannot be said to be helped.” Unless we in these instances do our part of the work, it will be no wonder if we lose his part of the co-operation and supervening blessing. He that comes under the bishop’s hands to receive the gift of the Holy Ghost, will come with holy desires and a longing soul, with an open hand and a prepared heart; he will purify the house of the Spirit for the entertainment of so Divine a guest; he will receive him with humility, and follow him with obedience, and delight him with purities: and he that does thus, let him make the objection if he can, and tell me, does he “say that Jesus is the Lord?” He cannot say this “but by the Holy Ghost.”—Does he love his brother? If he does, then “the Spirit of God abides in him.”—Is Jesus Christ formed in him? Does he live by the laws of the Spirit? Does he obey his commands? Does he attend his motions? Hath he no earnest desires to serve God? If he have not, then in vain hath he received either baptism or confirmation. But if he have, it is certain that of himself he cannot do these things: he “cannot of himself think a good thought.” Does he therefore think well? That is from the Holy Spirit of God.

To conclude this inquiry: “the Holy Ghost is promised to all men to profit withal;”^c that is plain in Scripture. Confirmation, or prayer and imposition of the bishop’s hand, is the solemnity and rite used in Scripture for the conveying of that promise, and the effect is felt in all the sanctifications and changes of the soul; and he that denies these things hath not faith, nor the true notices of religion, or the Spirit of christianity. Hear what the Scriptures yet further say in this mystery: “Now he which confirmeth or stablisheth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God: who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts.”^d Here is a description of the whole mysterious part of this rite. God is the author of the grace: the apostles and all christians are the suscipients, and receive this grace; by this grace we are adopted and incorporated into Christ: God hath anointed us; that is, he hath given us this unction from above, "he hath sealed us by his Spirit," made us his own, bored our ears through, made us free by his perpetual service, and hath done all these things in token of a greater; he hath given us his Spirit to testify to us that he will give us of his glory. These words of St. Paul, besides that they evidently contain in them the spiritual part of this ritual, are also expounded of the rite and sacramental itself by St. Chrysostom, Theodoret, and Theophylact, that I may name no more. For in this mystery, "Christos nos efficit, et misericordiam Dei nobis annunciat per Spiritum Sanctum," said St. John Damascen; ^c "he makes us his anointed ones, and by the Holy Spirit he declares his eternal mercy towards us."—"Nolite tangere Christos meos," "Touch not mine anointed ones."—For when we have this signature of the Lord upon us, the devils cannot come near to hurt us, unless we consent to their temptations, and drive the Holy Spirit of the Lord from us.

SECTION VII.

Of Preparation to Confirmation, and the Circumstances of receiving it.

If confirmation have such gracious effects, why do we confirm little children, whom in all reason we cannot suppose to be capable and receptive of such graces? It will be no answer to this, if we say, that this very question is asked concerning the baptism of infants, to which as great effects are consequent, even pardon of all our sins, and the new birth and regeneration of the soul unto Christ: for in these things the soul is wholly passive, and nothing is required of the suscipient but that he put in no bar against the grace; which because infants cannot do, they are capable of baptism; but it follows not, that therefore they are capable of confirmation, because this does suppose them such as to need new assistances, and is a new profession, and a personal undertaking, and therefore requires personal abilities, and cannot be done by others, as in the case of baptism. The aids given in confirmation are in order to our contention and our danger, our temptation and spiritual warfare; and therefore it will not seem equally reasonable to confirm children as to baptize them.

To this I answer, that, in the primitive church, confirmation was usually administered at the same time with baptism; for we find many records, that when the office of baptism was finished, and the baptized person divested of the white robe, the person was carried again to the bishop to be confirmed, as I have already shown out of ^f Dionysius and divers others. The reasons why anciently they were ministered immediately after one another is, not only because the most of them that were baptized, were of years to choose their religion, and did so, and therefore were capable of all that could be consequent to baptism, or annexed to it, or ministered with it, and therefore were also at the same time communicated as well as confirmed;—but also because the solemn baptisms were at solemn times of the year, at Easter only and Whitsuntide, and only in the cathedral or bishop's church in the chief city; whither when the catechumens came, and had the opportunity of the bishop's presence, they took the advantage "ut sacramento utroque renascentur," as St. Cyprian's expression is, "that they might be regenerated by both the mysteries," and they also had the third added, viz. the holy eucharist.

This simultaneous ministration hath occasioned some few of late to mistake confirmation for a part of baptism, but no distinct rite, or of distinct effect, save only that it gave ornament and complement or perfection to the other. But this is infinitely confuted by the very first ministry of confirmation in the world: for there was a great interval between St. Philip's baptizing and the apostle's confirming the Samaritans; where also the difference is made wider by the distinction of the minister; a deacon did one, none but an apostle and his successor a bishop could do the other: and this being of so universal a practice and doctrine in the primitive church, it is a great wonder that any learned men could suffer an error in so apparent a case. It is also clear in two other great remarks of the practice of the primitive church. The one is of them who were baptized in their sickness, the οἱ ἐν νόσῳ παραλαμβάνοντες, καὶ εἴτα ἀναστάντες, when they recovered they were commanded to address themselves to the bishop to be confirmed; which appears in the thirty-eighth canon of the council of Eliberis, and the forty-sixth canon of the council of Laodicea, which I have before cited upon other occasions: the other is, that of heretics returning to the church, who were confirmed not only long after baptism, but after their apostasy and their conversion.

For although episcopal confirmation was the enlargement of baptismal grace, and commonly administered the same day, yet it was done by interposition of distinct ceremonies, and not immediately in time. Honorius Augustodunensis ^g tells that when the baptized on the eighth day had laid aside their mitres, or proper habit used in baptism, then they were usually confirmed, or consigned with chrism in the forehead by the bishop. And when children were baptized irregularly, or besides the ordinary way, in villages and places distant from the bishop, confirmation was deferred, said Durandus. And it is certain, that this affair did not last long without variety: sometimes they ministered both together; sometimes at greater, sometimes at lesser distances; and it was left indifferent in the church to do the one or the other, or the third, according to the opportunity and the discretion of the bishop.

But afterward in the middle and descending ages it grew to be a question, not whether it were lawful or not, but which were better, to confirm infants, or to stay to their childhood or to their riper years. Aquinas, Bonaventure, and some others, say, it is best that they be confirmed in their infancy, "quia dolus non est, nec obicem ponunt," "they are then without craft, and cannot hinder" the descent of the Holy Ghost upon them. And indeed it is most agreeable with the primitive practice, that if they were baptized in infancy, they should then also be confirmed; according to that of the famous epistle of Melchisedec to the bishops of Spain: "Ita conjuncta sunt hæc duo sacramenta, ut ab invicem, nisi morte præveniente, non possint separari, et unum sine altero ritè perfici non potest." Where although he expressly affirms the rites to be two, yet unless it be in cases of necessity, they are not to be severed, and one without the other is not perfect; which, in the sense formerly mentioned, is true, and so to be understood,—that to him who is baptized and is not confirmed, something very considerable is wanting, and therefore they ought to be joined, though not immediately, yet εὐχρόως, according to reasonable occasions and accidental causes. But in this there must needs be a liberty in the church, not only for the former reasons, but also because the apostles themselves were not confirmed till after they had received the sacrament of the Lord's supper.

Others therefore say, that to confirm them of riper years is with more edification. The confession of faith is more voluntary, the election is wiser, the submission to Christ's discipline is more acceptable, and they have more need, and can make better use of their strength then derived by the Holy Spirit of God upon them: and to this purpose it is commanded in the canon law, that they who are confirmed should be "perfectæ ætatis," "of full age;" upon which the gloss^h says, "Perfectam vocat fortè duodecim annorum;" "Twelve years old was a full age, because, at those years, they might then be admitted to the lower services in the church."—But the reason intimated and implied by the canon is, because of the preparation to it; "they must come fasting, and they must make public confession of their faith."—And indeed that they should do so is matter of great edification, as also are the advantages of choice, and other preparatory abilities and dispositions above mentioned. They are matter of edification, I say, when they are done; but then the delaying of them so long before they be done, and the wanting the aids of the Holy Ghost conveyed in that ministry, are very prejudicial, and are not matter of edification.

But therefore there is a third way, which the church of England and Ireland follows, and that is, that after infancy, but yet before they understand too much of sin, and when they can competently understand the fundamentals of religion, then it is good to bring them to be confirmed, that the Spirit of God may prevent their youthful sins, and Christ by his word and by his Spirit may enter and take possession at the same time. And thus it was in the church of England long since provided and commanded by the laws of King Edgar,ⁱ cap. 15. "ut nullus ab episcopo confirmari diu nimium detrec-tarit," "that none should too long put off his being confirmed by the bishop;" that is, as is best expounded by the perpetual practice almost ever since, as soon as ever, by catechism and competent instruction, they were prepared, it should not be deferred. If it have been omitted, (as of late years it hath been too much,) as we do in baptism, so in this also, it may be taken at any age, even after they have received the Lord's supper; as I observed before in the practice and example of the apostles themselves, which in this is an abundant warrant: but still the sooner the better: I mean, after that reason begins to dawn: but ever it must be taken care of, that the parents and godfathers, the ministers and masters, see that the children be catechised and well instructed in the fundamentals of their religion.

For this is the necessary preparation to the most advantageous reception of this holy ministry. "In ecclesiis potissimum Latinis non nisi adultiore ætate pueros admitti videmus, vel hanc certè ob causam, ut parentibus, susceptoribus et ecclesiarum præfectis occasio detur pueros de fide, quam in baptismo professi sunt, diligentius instituendi et admonendi," said the excellent Cassander.^k In the Latin churches they admit children of some ripeness of age, that they may be more diligently taught and instructed in the faith. And to this sense agree St. Austin,^l Walafridus Strabo, Ruardus Lovaniensis, and Mr. Calvin.

For this was ever the practice of the primitive church, to be infinitely careful of catechising those who came and desired to be admitted to this holy rite; they used exorcisms or catechisms to prepare them to baptism and confirmation. I said exorcisms or catechisms, for they were the same thing; if the notion be new, yet I the more willingly declare it, not only to free the primitive church from the suspicion of superstition in using charms or exorcisms, (according to the modern sense of the word,) or casting of the devil out of innocent children, but also to remonstrate the perpetual practice of catechising children in the eldest and best times of the church. Thus the Greek scholiast upon Harmonopolus renders the word ἐφορκιστὰς by κατηχητὰς, the primitive "exorcist" was the "catechist:" and Balsamon upon the twenty-sixth canon of the council of Laodicea says, that to exorcise is nothing but to catechise the unbelievers, Τινὲς ἐπεχειροῦν ἑφορκίζειν, τοῦτέστι κατηχεῖν ἀπίστους, "Some undertook to exorcise, that is, (says he,) to catechise the unbelievers:" and St. Cyril, in his preface to his catechisms, speaking to the "illuminati," "Festinent (says he) pedes tui ad catecheses audiendas; exorcismos studiosè suscipe," &c. "Let your feet run hastily to hear the catechisms, studiously receive the exorcisms, although thou beest already inspired and exorcised; that is, although you have been already instructed in the mysteries, yet still proceed: for without exorcisms, (or catechisms,) the soul cannot go forward, since they are divine, and gathered out of the Scriptures." And the reason why these were called exorcisms he adds; "Because when the exorcists or catechists by the Spirit of God produce fear in your hearts, and do enkindle the spirit as in a furnace, the devil flies away, and salvation and hope of life eternal do succeed:" according to that of the evangelist^m concerning Christ; "They were astonished at his doctrine, for his word was with power:" and that of St. Lukeⁿ concerning Paul and Barnabas; "The deputy, when he saw what was done, was astonished at the doctrine of the Lord." It is the Lord's doctrine that hath the power to cast out devils and work miracles; catechisms are the best exorcisms. "Let us therefore, brethren, abide in hope, and persevere in catechisings, (saith St. Cyril,) although they be long, and produced with many words or discourses."—The same also we find in St. Gregory Nazianzen,^o and St. Austin.^p

The use that I make of this notion, is principally to be an exhortation to all of the clergy, that they take great care to catechise all their people, to bring up children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, to prepare a holy seed for the service of God, to cultivate the young plants and to dress the old ones, to take care that those who are men in the world, be not mere babes and uninstructed in Christ, and that they who are children in age, may be wise unto salvation: for by this means we shall rescue them from early temptations, when being so prepared they are so assisted by a divine ministry; we shall weaken the devil's power, by which he too often and too much prevails upon uninstructed and unconfirmed youth. For μύρον τῆς βεβαίωσης ὁμολογίας, "confirmation is the firmament of our profession;" but we profess nothing till we be catechised. Catechisings are our best preachings, and by them we shall give the best accounts of our charges, while in the behalf of Christ we make disciples, and take prepossession of infant understandings, and by his holy rite, by prayer and imposition of hands, we minister the Holy Spirit to them, and so prevent and disable the artifices of the devil; "for we are not ignorant of his devices," how he enters as soon as he can, and taking advantage of their ignorance and their passion, seats himself so strongly in their hearts and heads.

Turpius ejicitur quam non admittitur hostis;

"It is harder to cast the devil out than to keep him out." Hence it is that the youth are so corrupted in their manners, so devilish in their natures, so cursed in their conversation, so disobedient to parents, so wholly given to vanity and idleness; they learn to swear before they can pray, and to lie as soon as they can speak. It is not my sense alone, but was long since observed by Gerson^q and Gulielmus Parisiensis, "Propter cessationem confirmationis tepiditas grandior est in fidelibus, et fidei defensione;" there is a coldness and deadness in religion, and it proceeds from the neglect of confirmation rightly ministered, and after due preparations and dispositions. A little thing will fill a child's head: teach them to say their prayers, tell them the stories of the life and death of Christ, cause them to love the holy Jesus with their first love, make them afraid of a sin; let the principles which God hath planted in their very creation, the natural principles of justice and truth, of honesty and thankfulness, of simplicity and obedience, be brought into act, and habit, and confirmation, by the holy sermons of the Gospel. If the guides of souls would have their people holy, let them teach holiness to their children, and then they will (at least) have a new generation unto God, better than this wherein we now live. They who are most zealous in this particular, will with most comfort reap the fruit of their labours, and the blessings of their ministry; and by the numbers which every curate presents to his bishop fitted for confirmation, he will in proportion render an account of his stewardship with some visible felicity. And let it be remembered, that in the last rubric of the office of confirmation in our liturgy it is made into a law, that "none should be admitted to the holy communion, until such time as he could say the catechism, and be confirmed:" which was also a law and custom in the primitive church, as appears in St. Dionysius's Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, and the matter of fact is notorious. Among the Helvetians, they are forbidden to contract marriages, before they are well instructed in the catechism: and in a late synod at Bourges, the curates are commanded to threaten all that are not confirmed, that they shall never receive the Lord's supper, nor be married. And in effect the same is of force in our church: for the married persons being to receive the sacrament at their marriage, and none are to receive but those that are confirmed, the same law obtains with us as with the Helvetians or the "synodus Bituricensis."

There is another little inquiry which I am not willing to omit; but the answer will not be long, because there is not much to be said on either side. Some inquire whether the holy rite of confirmation can be ministered any more than once. St. Austin^r seems to be of opinion that it may be repeated: "Quid enim aliud est impositio manuum nisi oratio super hominem?" "Confirmation is a solemn prayer over a man;"—and if so, why it may not be reiterated can have nothing in the nature of the thing; and the Greeks do it frequently, but they have no warranty from the Scripture, nor from any of their own ancient doctors. Indeed when any did return from heresy, they confined them, as I have proved out of the first and second council of Arles, the council of Laodicea, and the second council of Seville: but upon a closer intuition of the thing, I find they did so only to such, who did not allow of confirmation in their sects, such as the Novatians and the Donatists. "Novatiani pœnitentiam à suo conventu arcent penitus, et iis qui ab ipsis tinguntur, sacrum chrismo non præbent. Quocirca qui ex hac hæresi corpori ecclesiæ conjunguntur, benedicti patres ungi jusserunt:" so Theodoret.^s For that reason only the Novatians were to be confirmed upon their conversion, because they had it not before. I find also they did confirm the converted Arians; but the reason is given in the first council of Arles, "quia propriâ lege utuntur," "they had a way of their own:" that is, as the gloss saith upon the canon "de Arianis Consecrat. dist. 4." "their baptism was not in the name of the holy Trinity;" and so their baptism being null, or at least suspected, to make all as sure as they could, they confirmed them. The same also is the case of the Bonasiaci in the second council of Arles, though they were (as some of the Arians also were) baptized in the name of the most holy Trinity; but it was a suspected matter, and therefore they confirmed them: but to such persons who had been rightly baptized and confirmed, they never did repeat it. Πνεύματος ἁγίου σφραγίδα δὴ ἀνεξάλειπτον, "The gift of the Spirit is an indelible seal," saith St. Cyril;—ἀνεπιχείρητον St. Basil calls it, it is "inviolable." They who did rebaptize, did also reconfirm. But as it was an error in St. Cyprian and the Africans to do the first, so was the second also, in case they had done it; for I find no mention expressly that they did the latter but upon the fore-mentioned accounts, and either upon supposition of the invalidity of their first pretended baptism, or their not using at all of confirmation in their heretical conventicles. But the repetition of confirmation is expressly forbidden by the council [of Tarracon,^u cap. 6. and by Pope Gregory the Second: and "sanctum chrisma collatum et altaris honor propter consecrationem (quæ per episcopos tantum exercenda et conferenda sunt) evelli non queunt," said the fathers in a council at Toledo;^x "confirmation and holy orders, which are to be given by bishops alone, can never be annulled, and therefore they can never be repeated." And this relies upon those severe words of St. Paul: having spoken of "the foundation of the doctrine of baptisms and laying on of hands," he says, "if they fall away, they can never be renewed;"^y that is, the ministry of baptism and confirmation can never be repeated. To christians that sin after these ministrations, there is only left a νήψατε, "expergiscimini," that they "arise from slumber," and stir up the graces of the Holy Ghost. Every man ought to be careful that he "do not grieve the Holy Spirit;" but if he does, yet let him not "quench" him, for that is a desperate case. Φύλαττε τὸν φυλακτικόν The Holy Spirit is the great conservative of the new life; only "keep the keeper;" take care that the Spirit of God do not depart from you: for the great ministry of the Spirit is but once; for as baptism is, so is confirmation.

I end this discourse with a plain exhortation out of St. Ambrose, upon those words of St. Paul, "He that confirmeth us with you in Christ, is God;" "Repete quia accepisti signaculum spirituale, spiritum sapientiæ et intellectûs, spiritum consilii atque virtutis, spiritum cognitionis atque pietatis, spiritum sancti timoris, et serva quod accepisti. Signavit te Deus Pater, confirmavit te Christus Dominus:" "Remember that thou (who hast been confirmed) hast received the spiritual signature: the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and strength, the spirit of knowledge and godliness, the spirit of holy fear: keep what thou hast received. The Father hath sealed thee, and Christ thy Lord hath confirmed thee, by his Divine Spirit;"—and he will never depart from thee, εἰ μὴ δι' ἔργων φανλόγηται ἡμεῖς ἐαυτοὺς ταύτης ἀποξενώσωμεν, "unless by evil works we estrange him from us."^z The same advice is given by Prudentius.

Cultor Dei, memento
Te fontis et lavacri
Rorem subisse sanctum,
Et chrismate innotatum.^a

Remember how great things ye have received, and what God hath done for you: ye are of his flock and his militia; ye are now to fight his battles, and therefore to put on his armour, and to implore his auxiliaries, and to make use of his strengths, and always to be on his side against all his and all our enemies. But he that desires grace, must not despise to make use of all the instruments of grace. For though God communicates his invisible Spirit to you, yet that he is pleased to do it by visible instruments, is more than he needs, but not more than we do need. And therefore since God descends to our infirmities, let us carefully and lovingly address ourselves to his ordinances: that as we receive remission of sins by the washing of water, and the body and blood of Christ by the ministry of consecrated symbols; so we may receive the Holy Ghost "sub ducibus christianæ militiæ," by the prayer and imposition of the bishop's hands, whom our Lord Jesus hath separated to this ministry. "For if you corroborate yourself by baptism," (they are the words of St. Gregory Nazianzen,^b) "and then take heed for the future, by the most excellent and firmest aids consigning your mind and body with the unction from above," (viz. in the holy rite of confirmation,) "with the Holy Ghost, as the children of Israel did with the aspersion on the door-posts in the night of the death of the first-born of Egypt, what (evil) shall happen to you?" (meaning, that no evil can invade you:) "and what aid shall you get? If you sit down, you shall be without fear; and if you rest, your sleep shall be sweet unto you."—But if when ye have received the Holy Spirit, you live not according to his Divine principles, you will lose him again; that is, you will lose all the blessing, though the impression does still remain, till ye turn quite apostates: "in pessimis hominibus manebit, licet ad judicium" (saith St. Austin^c); "the Holy Ghost will remain," either as a testimony of your unthankfulness unto condemnation, or else as a seal of grace, and an earnest of your inheritance of eternal glory.

A DISCOURSE

OF THE

NATURE, OFFICES, AND MEASURES OF FRIENDSHIP,

WITH RULES OF CONDUCTING IT,

IN A LETTER TO THE MOST INGENIOUS AND EXCELLENT MRS. KATHARINE PHILIPS.

MADAM,

THE wise Ben Sirach advised that we should not consult with a woman concerning her of whom she is jealous, neither with a coward in matters of war, nor with a merchant concerning exchange; and some other instances he gives of interested persons, to whom he would not have us hearken in any matter of council. For wherever the interest is secular or vicious, there the bias is not on the side of truth or reason, because these are seldom served by profit and low regards. But to consult with a friend in the matters of friendship, is like consulting with a spiritual person in religion; they who understand the secrets of religion, or the interior beauties of friendship, are the fittest to give answers in all inquiries concerning the respective subjects; because reason and experience are on the side of interest; and that which in friendship is most pleasing and most useful, is also most reasonable and most true; and a friend's fairest interest is the best measure of the conducting friendships: and therefore you who are so eminent in friendships, could also have given the best answer to your own inquiries, and you could have trusted your own reason, because it is not only greatly instructed by the direct notices of things, but also by great experience in the matter of which you now inquire.

But because I will not use any thing that shall look like an excuse, I will rather give you such an account which you can easily reprove, than by declining your commands, seem more safe in my prudence, than open and communicative in my friendship to you.

You first inquire, how far a dear and perfect friendship is authorized by the principles of christianity?

To this I answer; that the word "friendship," in the sense we commonly mean by it, is not so much as named in the New Testament; and our religion takes no notice of it. You think it strange; but read on before you spend so much as the beginning of a passion or a wonder upon it. There is mention of "friendship with the world," and it is said to be "enmity with God;" but the word is nowhere else named, or to any other purpose, in all the New Testament. It speaks of friends often; but by friends are meant our acquaintance, or our kindred, the relatives of our family, or our fortune, or our sect; something of society, or something of kindness, there is in it; a tenderness of appellation and civility, a relation made by gifts, or by duty, by services and subjection; and I think I have reason to be confident, that the word "friend" (speaking of human intercourse) is no otherwise used in the Gospels, or Epistles, or Acts of the Apostles: and the reason of it is, the word friend is of a large signification; and means all relations and societies, and whatsoever is not enemy. But by friendships, I suppose you mean the greatest love, and the greatest usefulness, and the most open communication, and the noblest sufferings, and the most exemplar faithfulness, and the severest truth, and the heartiest counsel, and the greatest union of minds, of which brave men and women are capable. But then I must tell you that christianity hath new christened it, and calls this charity. The christian knows no enemy he hath; that is, though persons may be injurious to him, and unworthy in themselves, yet he knows none whom he is not first bound to forgive, which is indeed to make them on his part to be no enemies, that is, to make that the word enemy shall not be perfectly contrary to friend, it shall not be a relative term, and signify something on each hand, a relative and a correlative; and then he knows none whom he is not bound to love and pray for, to treat kindly and justly, liberally and obligingly. Christian charity is friendship to all the world; and when friendships were the noblest things in the world, charity was little, like the sun drawn in at a chink, or his beams drawn into the centre of a burning-glass; but christian charity is friendship expanded like the face of the sun when it mounts above the eastern hills; and I was strangely pleased when I saw something of this in Cicero; for I have been so pushed at by herds and flocks of people that follow any body that whistles to them, or drives them to pasture, that I am grown afraid of any truth that seems chargeable with singularity; but therefore, I say, glad I was when I saw Lælius in Cicero discourse thus: "Amicitia ex infinitate generis humani, quam conciliavit ipsa natura, contracta res est, et adducta in angustum, ut omnis caritas, aut inter duos, aut inter paucos jungeretur." Nature hath made friendships and societies, relations and endearments; and by something or other we relate to all the world; there is enough in every man that is willing to make him become our friend: but when men contract friendships, they enclose the commons; and what nature intended should be every man's, we make proper to two or three. Friendship is like rivers and the strand of seas, and the air, common to all the world; but tyrants, and evil customs, wars, and want of love, have made them proper and peculiar. But when christianity came to renew our nature, and to restore our laws, and to increase her privileges, and to make her aptness to become religion, then it was declared that our friendships were to be as universal as our conversation; that is, actual to all with whom we converse, and potentially extended unto those with whom we did not. For he who was to treat his enemies with forgiveness and prayers, and love and beneficence, was indeed to have no enemies, and to have all friends.

So that to your question, how far a dear and perfect friendship is authorized by the principles of christianity? the answer is ready and easy. It is warranted to extend to all mankind; and the more we love, the better we are; and the greater our friendships are, the dearer we are to God. Let them be as dear, and let them be as perfect, and let them be as many, as you can; there is no danger in it; only where the restraint begins, there begins our imperfection. It is not ill that you entertain brave friendships and worthy societies: it were well if you could love and if you could benefit all mankind; for I conceive that is the sum of all friendship.

I confess this is not to be expected of us in this world; but as all our graces here are but imperfect, that is, at the best they are but tendencies to glory; so our friendships are imperfect too, and but beginnings of a celestial friendship, by which we shall love every one as much as they can be loved. But then so we must here in our proportion; and indeed that is it that can make the difference; we must be friends to all, that is, apt to do good, loving them really, and doing to them all the benefits which we can, and which they are capable of. The friendship is equal to all the world, and of itself hath no difference; but is differenced only by accidents, and by the capacity or incapacity of them that receive it. Nature and religion are the bands of friendships; excellency and usefulness are its great endearments: society and neighbourhood, that is, the possibilities and the circumstances of converse, are the determinations and actualities of it. Now when men either are unnatural or irreligious, they will not be friends: when they are neither excellent nor useful, they are not worthy to be friends; when they are strangers or unknown, they cannot be friends actually and practically; but yet, as any man hath any thing of the good, contrary to those evils, so he can have and must have his share of friendship. For thus the sun is the eye of the world; and he is indifferent to the negro, or the cold Russian; to them that dwell under the line, and them that stand near the tropics; the scalded Indian, or the poor boy that shakes at the foot of the Riphean hills. But the fluxures of the heaven and the earth, the conveniency of abode, and the approaches to the north or south respectively, change the emanations of his beams; not that they do not pass always from him, but that they are not equally received below,—but by periods and changes, by little inlets and reflections, they receive what they can. And some have only a dark day and a long night from him, snows and white cattle, a miserable life, and a perpetual harvest of catarrhs and consumptions; apoplexies and dead palsies. But some have splendid fires, and aromatic spices, rich wines, and well-digested fruits, great wit and great courage; because they dwell in his eye, and look in his face, and are the courtiers of the sun, and wait upon him in his chambers of the east. Just so is it in friendship: some are worthy, and some are necessary; some dwell hard by, and are fitted for converse: nature joins some to us, and religion combines us with others; society and accidents, parity of fortune, and equal dispositions, do actuate our friendships: which of themselves and in their prime disposition, are prepared for all mankind according as any one can receive them. We see this best exemplified by two instances and expressions of friendships and charity, viz. alms and prayers: every one that needs relief, is equally the object of our charity; but though to all mankind in equal needs we ought to be alike in charity, yet we signify this severally, and by limits and distinct measures: the poor man that is near me, he whom I meet, he whom I love, he whom I fancy, he who did me benefit, he who relates to my family,—he rather than another; because my expressions being finite and narrow, and cannot extend to all in equal significations, must be appropriate to those, whose circumstances best fit me: and yet even to all I give my alms; to all the world that needs them: I pray for all mankind; I am grieved at every sad story I hear; I am troubled when I hear of a pretty bride murdered in her bride-chamber by an ambitious and enraged rival; I shed a tear when I am told that a brave king was misunderstood, then slandered, then imprisoned, and then put to death, by evil men: and I can never read the story of the Parisian massacre, or the Sicilian vespers, but my blood curdles, and I am disordered by two or three affections. A good man is a friend to all the world; and he is not truly charitable that does not wish well and do good to all mankind in what he can. But though we must pray for all men, yet we say special litanies for brave kings, and holy prelates, and the wise guides of souls, for our brethren and relations, our wives and children.

The effect of this consideration is, that the universal friendship of which I speak, must be limited, because we are so: in those things where we stand next to immensity and infinity, as in good wishes and prayers, and a readiness to benefit all mankind, in these our friendships must not be limited: but in other things which pass under our hand and eye, our voices and our material exchanges; our hands can reach no further but to our arms' end, and our voices can but sound till the next air be quiet, and therefore they can have intercourse but within the sphere of their own activity; our needs and our conversations are served by a few, and they cannot reach to all; where they can, they must; but where it is impossible, it cannot be necessary. It must therefore follow, that our friendships to mankind may admit variety as does our conversation; and as by nature we are made sociable to all, so we are friendly; but as all cannot actually be of our society, so neither can all be admitted to a special, actual friendship. Of some intercourses all men are capable, but not of all; men can pray for one another, and abstain from doing injuries to all the world, and be desirous to do all mankind good, and love all men; now this friendship we must pay to all, because we can; but if we can do no more to all, we must show our readiness to do more good to all, by actually doing more good to all them to whom we can.

To some we can, and therefore there are nearer friendships to some than to others, according as there are natural or civil nearnesses, relations, and societies; and as I cannot express my friendships to all in equal measures and significations, that is, as I cannot do benefits to all alike, so neither am I tied to love all alike: for although there is much reason to love every man, yet there are more reasons to love some than others; and if I must love because there is reason I should, then I must love more where there is more reason; and where there is a special affection and a great readiness to do good and to delight in certain persons towards each other, there is that special charity and endearment, which philosophy calls friendship, but our religion calls love or charity. Now if the inquiry be concerning this special friendship, 1. How it can be appropriate, that is, who to be chosen to it? 2. How far it may extend, that is, with what expressions signified? 3. How conducted? The answers will depend upon such considerations which will be neither useless nor unpleasant.

1. There may be a special friendship contracted for any special excellency whatsoever: because friendships are nothing but love and society mixed together, that is, a conversing with them whom we love; now for whatsoever we can love any one, for that we can be his friend; and since every excellency is a degree of amability, every such worthiness is a just and proper motive of friendship or loving conversation. But yet in these things there is an order and proportion. Therefore,

2. A good man is the best friend, and therefore soonest to be chosen, longer to be retained; and indeed never to be parted with, unless he cease to be that for which he was chosen.

Τῶν δ' ἄλλων ἀρετῇ ποιεῦ φίλον ὅστις ἄριστος,
Μήποτε τὸν κακὸν ἄνδρα φίλον ποιῆσθαι ἐταῖρον.

Where virtue dwells, there friendships make,
But evil neighbourhoods forsake.

But although virtue alone is the worthiest cause of amability, and can weigh down any one consideration; and therefore to a man that is virtuous, every man ought to be a friend; yet I do not mean the severe and philosophical excellences of some morose persons, who are indeed wise unto themselves, and exemplar to others. By virtue here I do not mean justice and temperance, charity and devotion; for these I am to love the man; but friendship is something more than that: friendship is the nearest love and the nearest society, of which the persons are capable: now justice is a good intercourse for merchants, as all men are that buy and sell; and temperance makes a man good company, and helps to make a wise man: but a perfect friendship requires something else; these must be in him that is chosen to be my friend, but for these I do not make him my privado, that is, my special and peculiar friend: but if he be a good man, then he is properly fitted to be my correlative in the noblest combination.

And for this we have the best warrant in the world: "for a just man scarcely will a man die;" the Syriac interpreter reads it, ὑπὲρ ἀδίκου, "for an unjust man scarcely will a man die," that is, a wicked man is at no hand fit to receive the expression of the greatest friendship; but all the Greek copies that ever I saw, or read of, read it as we do; "for a righteous man" or "a just man;" that is, justice and righteousness are not the nearest endearment of friendship; but for "a good man some will even dare to die," that is, for a man that is sweetly disposed, ready to do acts of goodness and to oblige others, to do things useful and profitable; for a loving man, a beneficent, bountiful man, one who delights in doing good to his friend; such a man may have the highest friendship, he may have a friend that will die for him. And this is the meaning of Lælius, virtue may be despised, so may learning and nobility; "At una est amicitia in rebus humanis de cujus utilitate omnes consentiunt;" "Only friendship is that thing, which because all know to be useful and profitable," no man can despise; that is, χρηστότης, or ἀγαθότης, "goodness" or "beneficence" makes friendships. For if he be a good man, he will love where he is beloved; and that is the first tie of friendship.

Ἀλλήλους ἐφίλησαν ἴσω ζυγῶς.

That was the commendation of the bravest friendship in Theocritus,

They lov'd each other with a love
That did in all things equal prove.

— Ἡ ῥα τοτ' ἦσαν
Χρυσεῖοι πάλαι ἄνδρες, ὅτ' ἀντιφίλησ' ὁ φιληθεῖς.

The world was under Saturn's reign
When he that lov'd was lov'd again.

For it is impossible this nearness of friendship can be where there is not mutual love: but this is secured if I choose a good man; for he that is apt enough to begin alone, will never be behind in the relation and correspondency; and therefore I like the gentile's litany well.

Ζεὺς μοι τῶν τε φίλων δοίη τισιν, οἱ με φιλεῦσι·
Ὅλβιοι οἱ φιλέοντες, ἐπὶν ἴσον ἀντεράωνται.

Let God give friends to me for my reward,
Who shall my love with equal love regard;
Happy are they, who when they give their heart,
Find such as in exchange their own impart.

But there is more in it than this felicity amounts to. For χρηστός ἀνὴρ, "the good man" is a profitable, useful person, and that is the band of an effective friendship. For I do not think that friendships are metaphysical nothings, created for contemplation, or that men or women should stare upon each other's faces, and make dialogues of news and prettinesses, and look babies in one another's eyes. Friendship is the allay of our sorrows, the ease of our passions, the discharge of our oppressions, the sanctuary to our calamities, the counsellor of our doubts, the clarity of our minds, the emission of our thoughts, the exercise and improvement of what we meditate. And although I love my friend because he is worthy, yet he is not worthy if he can do no good; I do not speak of accidental hinderances and misfortunes, by which the bravest man may become unable to help his child; but of the natural and artificial capacities of the man. He only is fit to be chosen for a friend, who can do those offices for which friendship is excellent. For (mistake not) no man can be loved for himself; our perfections in this world cannot reach so high; it is well if we would love God at that rate; and I very much fear, that if God did us no good, we might admire his beauties, but we should have but a small proportion of love towards him; and therefore it is, that God, to endear the obedience, that is, the love of his servants, signifies what benefits he gives us, what great good things he does for us. "I am the Lord God that brought thee out of the land of Egypt:" and, "Does Job serve God for nought?" and "he that comes to God, must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder:" all his other greatnesses are objects of fear and wonder, it is his goodness that makes him lovely: and so it is in friendships. He only is fit to be chosen for a friend who can give counsel, or defend my cause, or guide me right, or relieve my need, or can and will, when I need it, do me good: only this I add: into the heaps of doing good, I will reckon, "loving me," for it is a pleasure to be beloved: but when his love signifies nothing but kissing my cheek, or talking kindly, and can go no further, it is a prostitution of the bravery of friendship to spend it upon impertinent people, who are, it may be, loads to their families, but can never ease my loads: but my friend is a worthy person when he can become to me instead of God, a guide or a support, an eye or a hand, a staff or a rule.

There must be in friendship something to distinguish it from a companion, and a countryman from a schoolfellow or a gossip, from a sweetheart or a fellow-traveller: friendship may look in at any one of these doors, but it stays not any where till it come to be the best thing in the world. And when we consider that one man is not better than another, neither towards God nor towards man, but by doing better and braver things; we shall also see, that that which is most beneficent, is also most excellent; and therefore those friendships must needs be most perfect, where the friends can be most useful. For men cannot be useful but by worthinesses in the several instances: a fool cannot be relied upon for counsel, nor a vicious person for the advantages of virtue, nor a beggar for relief, nor a stranger for conduct, nor a tattler to keep a secret, nor a pitiless person trusted with my complaint, nor a covetous man with my child's fortune, nor a false person without a witness, nor a suspicious person with a private design, nor him that I fear with the treasures of my love; but he that is wise and virtuous, rich and at hand, close and merciful, free of his money and tenacious of a secret, open and ingenuous, true and honest, is of himself an excellent man; and therefore fit to be loved; and he can do good to me in all capacities where I can need him, and therefore is fit to be a friend. I confess we are forced in our friendships to abate some of these ingredients; but full measures of friendship would have full measures of worthiness; and according as any defect is in the foundation, in the relation also there may be imperfection: and indeed I shall not blame the friendship so it be worthy, though it be not perfect; not only because friendship is charity, which cannot be perfect here, but because there is not in the world a perfect cause of perfect friendship.

If you can suspect that this discourse can suppose friendship to be mercenary, and to be defective in the greatest worthiness of it, which is to love our friend for our friend's sake, I shall easily be able to defend myself; because I speak of the election and reasons of choosing friends: after he is chosen, do as nobly as you talk, and love as purely as you dream, and let your conversation be as metaphysical as your discourse, and proceed in this method, till you be confuted by experience; yet till then, the case is otherwise when we speak of choosing one to be my friend: he is not my friend till I have chosen him, or loved him; and if any man inquires whom he shall choose, or whom he should love, I suppose it ought not to be answered, that we should love him who hath least amability, that we should choose him who hath least reason to be chosen. But if it be answered, he is to be chosen to be my friend who is most worthy in himself, not he that can do most good to me; I say, here is a distinction but no difference; for he is most worthy in himself, who can do most good; and if he can love me too, that is, if he will do me all the good he can, or that I need, then he is my friend and he deserves

it. And it is impossible from a friend to separate a will to do me good : and therefore I do not choose well, if I choose one that hath not power : for if it may consist with the nobleness of friendship, to desire that my friend be ready to do me benefit or support, it is not sense to say, it is ignoble to desire he should really do it when I need ; and if it were not for pleasure or profit, we might as well be without a friend as have him.

Among all the pleasures and profits, the sensual pleasure and the matter of money are the lowest and the least ; and therefore although they may sometimes be used in friendship, and so not wholly excluded from the consideration of him that is to choose, yet of all things they are to be the least regarded.

Ἐν τοῖς δὲ δεινοῖς, χρημάτων κρείττων φίλος.

When fortune frowns upon a man,
A friend does more than money can.

For there are, besides these, many profits and many pleasures ; and because these only are sordid, all the other are noble and fair, and the expectations of them no disparagements to the best friendships. For can any wise or good man be angry if I say, I choose this man to be my friend because he is able to give me counsel, to restrain my wanderings, to comfort me in my sorrows ; he is pleasant to me in private, and useful in public ; he will make my joys double, and divide my grief between himself and me ? For what else should I choose ? For being a fool, and useless ? for a pretty face and a smooth chin ? I confess it is possible to be a friend to one that is ignorant and pitiable, handsome and good for nothing, that eats well and drinks deep, but he cannot be a friend to me ; and I love him with a fondness or a pity, but it cannot be a noble friendship.

*Οὐκ ἐκ ποτῶν καὶ τῆς καθ' ἡμέραν τρυφῆς
Ζητοῦμεν ὃ πιστεύσωμεν τὰ τοῦ βίου,
Ἡάτιρ ; οὐ περιττὸν οἷσι τ' ἐξευρηκέναι
Ἀγαθὸν ἕκαστος, εἰν ἔχη φίλου σκίαν ;* said Menander.

By wine and mirth and every day's delight
We choose our friends, to whom, we think, we might
Our souls intrust ; but fools are they, that lend
Their bosom to the shadow of a friend.

Εἰδῶλα καὶ μνηματα φιλίας, Plutarch calls such friendships, "the idols and images of friendship." True and brave friendships are between worthy persons ; and there is in mankind no degree of worthiness, but is also a degree of usefulness, and by every thing by which a man is excellent, I may be profited : and because those are the bravest friends which can best serve the ends of friendships, either we must suppose that friendships are not the greatest comforts in the world, or else we must say, he chooses his friend best, that chooses such a one by whom he can receive the greatest comforts and assistances.

3. This being the measure of all friendships ; they all partake of excellency, according as they are fitted to this measure : a friend may be counselled well enough, though his friend be not the wisest man in the world ; and he may be pleased in his society, though he be not the best-natured man in the world ; but still it must be, that something excellent is, or is apprehended, or else it can be no worthy friendship ; because the choice is imprudent and foolish. Choose for your friend him that is wise and good, and secret and just, ingenuous and honest : and in those things which have a latitude, use your own liberty ; but in such things which consist in an indivisible point, make no abatements ; that is, you must not choose him to be your friend that is not honest and secret, just and true to a tittle ; but if he be wise at all, and useful in any degree, and as good as you can have him, you need not be ashamed to own your own friendships ; though sometimes you may be ashamed of some imperfections of your friend.

4. But if you yet inquire further, whether fancy may be an ingredient in your choice ? I answer, that fancy may minister to this as to all other actions, in which there is a liberty and variety ; and we shall find that there may be peculiarities and little partialities, a friendship improperly so called, entering upon accounts of an innocent passion and a pleased fancy ; even our blessed Saviour himself loved St. John and Lazarus by a special love, which was signified by special treatments ; and of the young man that spake well and wisely to Christ, it is affirmed, "Jesus loved him," that is, he fancied the man, and his soul had a certain cognation and similitude of temper and inclination. For in all things where there is a latitude, every faculty will endeavour to be pleased, and sometimes the meanest persons in a house have a festival : even sympathies and natural inclinations to some persons, and a conformity of humours and proportionable loves, and the beauty of the face, and a witty answer, may first strike the flint and kindle a spark, which, if it falls upon tender and compliant natures, may grow into a flame ; but this will never be maintained at the rate of friendship, unless it be fed by pure materials, by worthinesses which are the food of friendship : where these are not, men and women may be pleased with one another's company, and lie under the same roof, and make themselves companions of equal prosperities, and humour their friend ; but if you call this friendship, you give a sacred name to humour or fancy ; for there is a Platonic friendship as well as a Platonic love ; but they being but the images of more noble bodies, are but like tinsel dressings, which will show bravely by candle-light, and do excellently in a mask, but are not fit for conversation and the material intercourses of our life. These are the prettinesses of prosperity and good-natured wit ; but when we speak of friendship, which is the best thing in the world, (for it is love and beneficence, it is charity that is fitted for society,) we cannot suppose a brave pile should be built up with nothing : and they that build castles in the air, and look upon friendship as upon a fine romance, a thing that pleases the fancy, but is good for nothing else, will do when they are asleep, or when they are come to Elysium ; and for aught I know, in the mean time may be as much in love with Mandana in the Grand Cyrus, as with the infant of Spain, or any of the most perfect beauties and real excellencies of the world: and by dreaming of perfect and abstracted friendships, make them so immaterial that they perish in the handling, and become good for nothing.

But I know not whither I was going; I did only mean to say that because friendship is that by which the world is most blessed and receives most good, it ought to be chosen amongst the worthiest persons, that is, amongst those that can do greatest benefit to each other; and though in equal worthiness I may choose by my eye, or ear, that is, into the consideration of the essential I may take in also the accidental and extrinsic worthinesses; yet I ought to give every one their just value; when the internal beauties are equal, these shall help to weigh down the scale, and I will love a worthy friend that can delight me as well as profit me, rather than him who cannot delight me at all, and profit me no more; but yet I will not weigh the gayest flowers, or the wings of butterflies, against wheat; but when I am to choose wheat, I may take that which looks the brightest. I had rather see thyme and roses, marjoram and July flowers, that are fair, and sweet, and medicinal, than the prettiest tulips, that are good for nothing: and my sheep and kine are better servants than race-horses and grey-hounds: and I shall rather furnish my study with Plutarch and Cicero, with Livy and Polybius, than with Cassandra and Ibrahim Bassa: and if I do give an hour to these for divertisement or pleasure, yet I will dwell with them that can instruct me, and make me wise and eloquent, severe and useful to myself and others. I end this with the saying of Lælius in Cicero: "Amicitia non debet consequi utilitatem, sed amicitiam utilitas." When I choose my friend, I will not stay till I have received a kindness; but I will choose such a one that can do me many if I need them: but I mean such kindnesses which make me wiser, and which make me better; that is, I will, when I choose my friend, choose him that is the bravest, the worthiest, and the most excellent person: and then your first question is soon answered; To love such a person and to contract such friendships, is just so authorized by the principles of christianity, as it is warranted to love wisdom and virtue, goodness and beneficence, and all the impresses of God upon the spirits of brave men.

2. The next inquiry is, how far it may extend? that is, by what expressions it may be signified? I find that David and Jonathan loved at a strange rate; they were both good men; though it happened that Jonathan was on the obliging side: but here the expressions were, Jonathan watched for David's good; told him of his danger, and helped him to escape; took part with David's innocence against his father's malice and injustice; and beyond all this, did it to his own prejudice; and they two stood like two feet supporting one body: though Jonathan knew that David would prove like the foot of a wrestler, and would supplant him, not by any unworthy or unfriendly action, but it was from God; and he gave him his hand to set him upon his own throne.

We find his parallels in the gentile stories: young Athenodorus having divided the estate with his brother Xenon, divided it again when Xenon had spent his own share; and Lucullus would not take the consulship till his younger brother had first enjoyed it for a year; but Pollux divided with Castor his immortality; and you know who offered himself to death being pledge for his friend, and his friend by performing his word rescued him as bravely. And when we find in Scripture that "for a good man some will even dare to die;" and that Aquila and Priscilla laid their necks down for St. Paul; and the Galatians "would have given him their very eyes," that is, every thing that was most dear to them; and some others were near unto death for his sake; and that it is a precept of christian charity, "to lay down our lives for our brethren," that is, those who were combined in a cause of religion, who were united with the same hopes, and imparted to each other ready assistances, and grew dear by common sufferings; we need inquire no further for the expressions of friendships. "Greater love than this hath no man, than that he lay down his life for his friends;" and this we are obliged to do in some cases for all christians; and therefore we may do it for those who are to us, in this present and imperfect state of things, that which all the good men and women in the world shall be in heaven, that is, in the state of perfect friendships. This is the biggest; but then it includes and can suppose all the rest; and if this may be done for all, and in some cases must for any one of the multitude, we need not scruple whether we may do it for those who are better than a multitude. But as for the thing itself, it is not easily and lightly to be done; and a man must not die for humour, nor expend so great a jewel for a trifle: Μόλις ἀνεπνεύσαμεν, εἰδότες ἐπ' οὐδενὶ λυσιτελεῖ παρανάλωμα γενησόμενοι, said Philo; we will hardly die when it is for nothing, when no good, no worthy end, is served, and become a sacrifice to redeem a foot-boy. But we may not give our life to redeem another, unless, 1. The party for whom we die be a worthy and a useful person; better for the public, or better for religion, and more useful to others than myself. Thus Ribischius the German died bravely, when he became a sacrifice for his master, Maurice duke of Saxony; covering his master's body with his own, that he might escape the fury of the Turkish soldiers. "Succurram perituro, sed ut ipse non peream, nisi si futurus ero magni hominis, aut magnæ rei merces," said Seneca: "I will help a dying person if I can; but I will not die myself for him, unless by my death I save a brave man, or become the price of a great thing;" that is, I will die for a prince, for the republic, or to save an army, as David exposed himself to combat with the Philistine for the redemption of the host of Israel: and in this sense, that is true, "Præstat ut pereat unus quàm unitas," "Better that one perish than a multitude." 2. A man dies bravely when he gives his temporal life to save the soul of any single person in the christian world. It is a worthy exchange, and the glorification of that love by which Christ gave his life for every soul. Thus he that reproves an erring prince wisely and necessarily, he that affirms a fundamental truth, or stands up for the glory of the Divine attributes, though he die for it, becomes a worthy sacrifice. 3. These are duty, but it may be heroic and full of christian bravery, to give my life to rescue a noble and a brave friend, though I myself be as worthy a man as he; because the preference of him is an act of humility in me, and of friendship towards him; humility and charity making a pious difference, where art and nature have made all equal.

Some have fancied other measures of treating our friends. One sort of men say that we are to expect that our friends should value us as we value ourselves: which, if it were to be admitted, will require that we make no friendships with a proud man; and so far indeed were well; but then this proportion does exclude some humble men who are most to be valued, and the rather because they undervalue themselves.

Others say, that a friend is to value his friend as much as his friend values him; but neither is this well or safe, wise or sufficient; for it makes friendship a mere bargain, and is something like the country weddings in some places where I have been; where the bridegroom and the bride must meet in the half way, and if they fail a step, they retire and break the match: it is not good to make a reckoning in friendship; that is merchandise, or it may be gratitude, but not noble friendship; in which each part strives to outdo the other in significations of an excellent love: and amongst true friends there is no fear of losing any thing.

But that which amongst the old philosophers comes nearest to the right, is that we love our friends as we love ourselves. If they had meant it as our blessed Saviour did, of that general friendship by which we are to love all mankind, it had been perfect and well; or if they had meant it of the inward affection, or of outward justice; but because they meant it of the most excellent friendships, and of the outward significations of it, it cannot be sufficient: for a friend may and must sometimes do more for his friend than he would do for himself. Some men will perish before they will beg or petition for themselves to some certain persons; but they account it noble to do it for their friend, and they will want rather than their friend shall want; and they will be more earnest in praise or dispraise respectively for their friend than for themselves. And indeed I account that one of the greatest demonstrations of real friendship is, that a friend can really endeavour to have his friend advanced in honour, in reputation, in the opinion of wit or learning, before himself.

*Aurum et opes, et rura frequens donabit amicus:
Qui velit ingenio cedere, rarus erit.
Sed tibi tantus inest veteris respectus amici,
Carior ut mea sit quam tua fama tibi.*^a

Lands, gold, and trifles, many give or lend,
But he that stoops in fame, is a rare friend;
In friendship's orb thou art the brightest star,
Before thy fame mine thou preferrest far.

But then be pleased to think that therefore I so highly value this signification of friendship, because I so highly value humility. Humility and charity are the two greatest graces in the world; and these are the greatest ingredients which constitute friendship and express it.

But there needs no other measures of friendship, but that it may be as great as you can express it; beyond death it cannot go, to death it may, when the cause is reasonable and just, charitable and religious: and yet if there be any thing greater than to suffer death, (and pain and shame to some are more insufferable,) a true and noble friendship shrinks not at the greatest trials.

And yet there is a limit even to friendship. It must be as great as our friend fairly needs in all things where we are not tied up by a former duty, to God, to ourselves, or some pre-obliging relative. When Pollux heard somebody whisper a reproach against his brother Castor, he killed the slanderer with his fist: that was a zeal which his friendship could not warrant. "Nulla est excusatio, si amici causâ peccaveris," said Cicero;^a "No friendship can excuse a sin:" and this the braver Romans instanced in the matter of duty to their country. It is not lawful to fight on our friend's part against our prince or country; and therefore^b when Caius Blossius of Cuma, in the sedition of Gracchus, appeared against his country, when he was taken he answered, that he loved Tiberius Gracchus so dearly, that he thought fit to follow him whithersoever he led; and begged pardon upon that account: they who were his judges, were so noble, that though they knew it no fair excuse, yet for the honour of friendship they did not directly reject his motion; but put him to death because he did not follow, but led on Gracchus, and brought his friend into the snare: for so they preserved the honours of friendship on either hand, by neither suffering it to be sullied by a foul excuse, nor yet rejected in any fair pretence. A man may not be perjured for his friend. I remember to have read, in the history of the Low Countries, that Grimston and Redhead, when Bergen-op-Zoom was besieged by the Duke of Parma, acted for the interest of the Queen of England's forces a notable design; but being suspected and put for their acquittance to take the sacrament of the altar, they dissembled their persons and their interest, their design and their religion, and did for the Queen's service (as one wittily wrote to her) give not only their bodies but their souls, and so deserved a reward greater than she could pay them: I cannot say this is a thing greater than a friendship can require, for it is not great at all, but a great villany, which hath no name, and no order in worthy intercourses; and no obligation to a friend can reach as high as our duty to God: and he that does a base thing in zeal for his friend, burns the golden thread that ties their hearts together; it is a conspiracy, but no longer friendship. And when Cato lent his wife to Hortensius, and Socrates lent his to a merry Greek, they could not amongst wise persons obtain so much as the fame of being worthy friends; neither could these great names legitimate an unworthy action under the most plausible title.

It is certain that amongst friends their estates are common; that is, by whatsoever I can rescue my friend from calamity, I am to serve him, or not to call him friend; there is a great latitude in this, and it is to be restrained by no prudence, but when there is on the other side a great necessity neither vicious nor avoidable: a man may choose whether he will or no; and he does not sin in not doing it, unless he have bound himself to it: but certainly friendship is the greatest band in the world, and if we have professed a great friendship, he hath a very great obligation to do that and more; and he can no ways be disobliged but by the care of his natural relations.

I said, "friendship is the greatest band in the world;" and I had reason for it, for it is all the bands that this world hath; and there is no society, and there is no relation, that is worthy, but it is made so by the communications of friendship, and by partaking some of its excellencies. For friendship is a transcendent, and signifies as much as unity can mean; and every consent, and every pleasure, and every benefit, and every society, is the mother or the daughter of friendship. Some friendships are made by nature, some by contract, some by interest, and some by souls. And in proportion to these ways of uniting, so the friendships are greater or less, virtuous or natural, profitable or holy, or all this together. Nature makes excellent friendships, of which we observe something in social plants, growing better in each other's neighbourhood than where they stand singly: and in animals it is more notorious, whose friendships extend so far as to herd and dwell together, to play and feed, to defend and fight for one another, and to cry in absence, and to rejoice in one another's presence. But these friendships have other names less noble; they are sympathy, or they are instinct. But if to this natural friendship there be reason superadded, something will come in upon the stock of reason which will ennoble it; but because no rivers can rise higher than fountains, reason shall draw out all the dispositions which are in nature and establish them into friendships, but they cannot surmount the communications of nature: nature can make no friendships greater than her own excellencies. Nature is the way of contracting necessary friendships; that is, by nature such friendships are contracted, without which we cannot live, and be educated, or be well, or be at all.

In this scene, that of parents and children is the greatest, which indeed is begun in nature, but is actuated by society and mutual endearments. For parents love their children because they love themselves. Children being but like emissions of water, symbolical or indeed the same with the fountain; and they in their posterity see the images and instruments of a civil immortality: but if parents and children do not live together, we see their friendships and their loves are much abated, and supported only by fame and duty, by customs and religion, which to nature are but artificial pillars, and make this friendship to be complicated, and to pass from its own kind to another. That of children to their parents is not properly friendship, but gratitude, and interest, and religion; and whatever can supervene of the nature of friendship, comes in upon another account; upon society and worthiness and choice.

This relation on either hand makes great dear-nesses: but it hath special and proper significations of it, and there is a special duty incumbent on each other respectively. This friendship and social relation are not equal, and there is too much authority on one side, and too much fear on the other, to make equal friendships; and therefore, although this is one of the kinds of friendship, that is of a social and relative love and conversation; yet in the more proper use of the word, friendship does do some things which father and son do not; I instance in the free and open communicating counsels, and the evenness and pleasantness of conversation: and consequently the significations of the paternal and filial love, as they are divers in themselves and unequal, and therefore another kind of friendship than we mean in our inquiry; so they are such a duty which no other friendship can annul; because their mutual duty is bound upon them by religion long before any other friendships can be contracted; and therefore having first possession must abide for ever. The duty and love to parents must not yield to religion, much less to any new friendships; and our parents are to be preferred before the "corban," and are at no hand to be laid aside but when they engage against God: that is, in the rights which this relation and kind of friendship challenges as its propriety, it is supreme, and cannot give place to any other friendships; till the father gives his right away, and God or the laws consent to it; as in the case of marriage, emancipation, and adoption to another family; in which cases, though love and gratitude are still obliging, yet the societies and duties of relation are very much altered, which in the proper and best friendships can never be at all. But then this also is true, that the social relations of parents and children, not having in them all the capacities of a proper friendship, cannot challenge all the significations of it; that is, it is no prejudice to the duty I owe there, to pay all the dear-nesses which are due here, and to friends there are some things due which the other cannot challenge, I mean my secret and my equal conversation, and the pleasures and interests of these, and the consequents of all.

Next to this is the society and dearness of brothers and sisters: which usually is very great amongst worthy persons; but if it be considered what it is in itself, it is but very little; there is very often a likeness of natural temper, and there is a social life under the same roof, and they are commanded to love one another, and they are equals in many instances, and are endeared by conversation when it is merry and pleasant, innocent and simple, without art and without design. But brothers pass not into noble friendships upon the stock of that relation: they have fair dispositions and advantages, and are more easy and ready to ferment into the greatest dearnesses, if all things else be answerable. Nature disposes them well towards it; but in this inquiry if we ask what duty is passed upon a brother to a brother even for being so,—I answer, that religion and our parents, and God and the laws, appoint what measures they please; but nature passes but very little, and friendship less; and this we see apparently in those brothers who live asunder, and contract new relations, and dwell in other societies. There is no love, no friendship without the intercourse of conversation; friendships indeed may last longer than our abode together, but they were first contracted by it, and established by pleasure and benefit; and unless it be the best kind of friendship, (which that of brothers in that mere capacity is not,) it dies when it wants the proper nutriment and support; and to this purpose is that which was spoken by Solomon;^c “Better is a neighbour that is near, than a brother that is far off;” that is, although ordinarily brothers are first possessed of the entries and fancies of friendship, because they are of the first societies and conversations; yet when that ceases and the brother goes away, so that he does no advantage, no benefit of intercourse; the neighbour that dwells by me, with whom if I converse at all, either he is my enemy, and does and receives evil; or if we converse in worthinesses and benefit and pleasant communication, he is better in the laws and measures of friendship than my distant brother. And it is observable that “brother” is indeed a word of friendship and charity and of mutual endearment, and so is a title of the bravest society; yet in all the Scripture, there are no precepts given of any duty and comport, which brothers, that is, the descendants of the same parents, are to have one towards another in that capacity; and it is not because their nearness is such that they need none: for parents and children are nearer, and yet need tables of duty to be described; and for brothers, certainly they need it infinitely if there be any peculiar duty; Cain and Abel are the great probation of that, and you know who said,

Fratrum quoque gratia rara est:

It is not often you shall see

Two brothers live in amity.

But the scripture, which often describes the duty of parents and children, never describes the duty of brothers; except where by brethren are meant all that part of mankind, who are tied to us by any vicinity and endearment of religion or country, of profession and family, of contract or society, of love and the noblest friendships; the meaning is, that though fraternity alone be the endearment of some degrees of friendship, without choice and without excellency; yet the relation itself is not friendship, and does not naturally infer it: and that which is procured by it, is but limited and little; and though it may pass into it, as other conversations may, yet the friendship is accidental to it, and enters upon other accounts, as it does between strangers; with this only difference, that brotherhood does oftentimes assist the valuation of those excellencies, for which we entertain our friendships. Fraternity is the opportunity and preliminary disposition to friendship, and no more. For if my brother be a fool or a vicious person, the love to which nature and our first conversation dispose me, does not end in friendship, but in pity and fair provisions and assistances; which is a demonstration that brotherhood is but the inclination and address to friendship. And though I will love a worthy brother more than a worthy stranger, if the worthiness be equal, because the relation is something, and being put into the scales against an equal worthiness, must needs turn the balance, as every grain will do in an even weight; yet when the relation is all the worthiness that is pretended, it cannot stand in competition with a friend: for though a friend-brother is better than a friend-stranger, where the friend is equal, but the brother is not; yet a brother is not better than a friend: but, as Solomon's expression is, “There is a friend that is better than a brother;” and to be born of the same parents is so accidental and extrinsic to a man's pleasure, or worthiness, or spiritual advantages, that though it be very pleasing and useful that a brother should be a friend, yet it is no great addition to a friend that he also is a brother: there is something in it, but not much. But in short, the case is thus: the first beginnings of friendship serve the necessities; but choice and worthiness are the excellencies of its endearment and its bravery; and between a brother that is no friend, and a friend that is no brother, there is the same difference as between the disposition and the act or habit: a brother, if he be worthy, is the readiest and the nearest to be a friend; but till he be so, he is but the twilight of the day, and but the blossom to the fairest fruit of Paradise. A brother does not always make a friend, but a friend ever makes a brother and more: and although nature sometimes finds the tree, yet friendship engraves the image; the first relation places him in the garden, but friendship sets it in the temple, and then only it is venerable and sacred: and so is brotherhood when it hath the soul of friendship.

So that if it be asked which are most to be valued, brothers or friends; the answer is very easy, brotherhood is or may be one of the kinds of friendship, and from thence only hath its value, and therefore if it be compared with a greater friendship must give place: but then it is not to be asked which is to be preferred, a brother or a friend, but which is the better friend, Memnon or my brother? For if my brother says I ought to love him best, then he ought to love me best;^d if he does, then there is a great friendship, and he possibly is to be preferred, if he can be that friend which he pretends to be, that is, if he be equally worthy; but if he says, I must love him only because he is my brother, whether he loves me or no, he is ridiculous; and it will be a strange relation which hath no correspondent; but suppose it, and add this also, that I am equally his brother as he is mine, and then he also must love me whether I love him or no; and if he does not, he says, I must love him though he be my enemy; and I must; but I must not love my enemy, though he be my brother, more than I love my friend; and at last if he does love me for being his brother, I confess that this love deserves love again: but then I consider, that he loves me upon an incompetent reason: for he that loves me only because I am his brother, loves me for that which is no worthiness; and I must love him as much as that comes to, and for as little reason; unless this be added, that he loves me first: but whether choice and union of souls, and worthiness of manners, and greatness of understanding, and usefulness of conversation, and the benefits of counsel, and all those endearments which make our lives pleasant and our persons dear, are not better and greater reasons of love and dearness than to be born of the same flesh, I think, amongst wise persons needs no great inquiry. For fraternity is but a cognation of bodies, but friendship is a union of souls, which are confederated by more noble ligatures. My brother, if he be no more, shall have my hand to help him; but unless he be my friend too he cannot challenge my heart: and if his being my friend be the greater nearness, then friend is more than brother, and I suppose no man doubts but that David loved Jonathan far more than he loved his brother Eliab.

One inquiry more there may be in this affair, and that is, whether a friend may be more than a husband or wife; to which I answer, that it can never be reasonable or just, prudent or lawful: but the reason is, because marriage is the queen of friendships, in which there is a communication of all that can be communicated by friendship: and it being made sacred by vows and love, by bodies and souls, by interest and custom, by religion and by laws, by common counsels and common fortunes; it is the principal in the kind of friendship, and the measure of all the rest: and there is no abatement to this consideration, but that there may be some alloy in this as in other lesser friendships by the incapacity of the persons: if I have not chosen my friend wisely or fortunately, he cannot be the correlative in the best union; but then the friend lives as the soul does after death, it is in the state of separation, in which the soul strangely loves the body and longs to be reunited, but the body is a useless trunk, and can do no ministries to the soul; which therefore prays to have the body reformed and restored, and made a brave and a fit companion: so must these best friends, when one is useless or unapt to the braveries of the princely friendship, they must love ever, and pray ever, and long till the other be perfected and made fit; in this case there wants only the body, but the soul is still a relative, and must be so for ever.

A husband and a wife are the best friends, but they cannot always signify all that to each other which their friendships would; as the sun shines not upon a valley, which sends up a thick vapour to cover his face; and though his beams are eternal, yet the emission is intercepted by the intervening cloud. But however, all friendships are but parts of this; "a man must leave father and mother and cleave to his wife;" that is, "the dearest thing in nature is not comparable to the dearest thing of friendship:" and I think this is argument sufficient to prove friendship to be the greatest band in the world: add to this, that other friendships are part of this, they are marriages too; less indeed than the other, because they cannot, must not be all that endearment which the other is; yet that, being the principal, is the measure of the rest, and are all to be honoured by like dignities, and measured by the same rules, and conducted by their portion of the same laws. But as friendships are marriages of the soul, and of fortunes, and interests, and counsels; so they are brotherhoods too; and I often think of the excellencies of friendships in the words of David, who certainly was the best friend in the world; "Ecce quàm bonum et quàm jucundum fratres habitare in unum:" "It is good and it is pleasant, that brethren should live like friends;" that is, they who are any ways relative, and who are any ways social and confederate, should also dwell in unity and loving society; for that is the meaning of the word brother in Scripture; "It was my brother Jonathan," said David: such brothers contracting such friendships are the beauties of society, and the pleasure of life, and the festivity of minds; and whatsoever can be spoken of love, which is God's eldest daughter, can be said of virtuous friendships; and though Carneades made an eloquent oration at Rome against justice, yet I never saw a panegyric of malice, or ever read that any man was witty against friendship. Indeed it is probable that some men, finding themselves, by the peculiarities of friendship, excluded from the participation of those beauties of society which enamel and adorn the wise and the virtuous, might suppose themselves to have reason to speak the evil words of envy and detraction: I wonder not; for all those unhappy souls which shall find heaven's gates shut against them, will think they have reason to murmur and blaspheme: the similitude is apt enough, for that is the region of friendship, and love is the light of that glorious country, but so bright that it needs no sun: here we have fine and bright rays of that celestial flame, and though to all mankind the light of it is in some measure to be extended,—like the treasures of light dwelling in the south, yet, a little, do illustrate and beautify the north,—yet some live under the line, and the beams of friendship in that position are imminent and perpendicular.

I know but one thing more in which the communications of friendship can be restrained; and that is, in friends and enemies: "Amicus amici, amicus meus non est:" My friend's friend is not always my friend;" nor his enemy mine; for if my friend quarrel with a third person with whom he hath had no friendships, upon the account of interest; if that third person be my friend, the nobleness of our friendships despises such a quarrel; and what may be reasonable in him, would be ignoble in me: sometimes it may be otherwise, and friends may marry one another's loves and hatreds, but it is by chance, if it can be just; and therefore because it is not always right, it cannot be ever necessary.

In all things else let friendships be as high and expressive till they become a union, or that friends, like the Molionidæ, be so the same that the flames of their dead bodies make but one pyramis; no charity can be reprov'd, and such friendships which are more than shadows, are nothing else but the rays of that glorious grace drawn into one centre, and made more active by the union; and the proper significations are well represented in the old hieroglyphic, by which the ancients depicted friendship; "In the beauties and strength of a young man, bare-headed, rudely clothed, to signify its activity, and lastingness, readiness of action, and aptnesses to do service: upon the fringes of his garment was written 'Mors et vita,' as signifying that in life and death the friendship was the same: on the forehead was written 'Summer and winter,' that is, prosperous and adverse accidents and states of life: the left arm and shoulder were bare and naked down to the heart,—to which the finger pointed, and there was written 'Longè et propè;'" by all which we know that friendship does good far and near, in summer and winter, in life and death, and knows no difference of state or accident, but by the variety of her services: and therefore ask no more to what we can be obliged by friendship; for it is every thing that can be honest and prudent, useful and necessary.

For this is all the allay of this universality, we may do any thing or suffer any thing that is wise or necessary, or greatly beneficial to my friend; and that in any thing, in which I am perfect master of my person and fortunes. But I would not in bravery visit my friend when he is sick of the plague, unless I can do him good equal at least to my danger; but I will procure him physicians and prayers, all the assistances that he can receive, and that he can desire, if they be in my power: and when he is dead, I will not run into his grave and be stifled with his earth; but I will mourn for him, and perform his will, and take care of his relatives, and do for him as if he were alive; and I think that is the meaning of that hard saying of a Greek poet:

Πλὴν τούτου, παντὸς χρήματός ἐστι κύρος.

To me, though distant, let thy friendship fly;
Though men be mortal, friendships must not die:
Of all things else there's great satiety.

Of such immortal, abstracted, pure friendships indeed there is no great plenty, and to see brothers hate each other is not so rare as to see them love at this rate. The dead and the absent have but few friends, say the Spaniards; but they who are the same to their friend ἀπόπροθεν, when he is in another country, or in another world, these are they who are fit to preserve the sacred fire for eternal sacrifices, and to perpetuate the memory of those exemplar friendships of the best men, which have filled the world with history and wonder: for in no other sense but this can it be true that friendships are pure loves, regarding to do good more than to receive it. He that is a friend after death, hopes not for a recompence from his friend, and makes no bargain either for fame or love; but is rewarded with the conscience and satisfaction of doing bravely; but then this is demonstration that they choose friends best, who take persons so worthy that can and will do so. This is the profit and usefulness of friendship; and he that contracts such a noble union, must take care that his friend be such who can and will; but hopes that himself shall be first used, and put to act it. I will not have such a friendship that is good for nothing, but I hope that I shall be on the giving and assisting part: and yet if both the friends be so noble, and hope and strive to do the benefit, I cannot well say which ought to yield; and whether that friendship were braver that could be content to be unprosperous, so his friend might have the glory of assisting him, or that which desires to give assistances in the greatest measures of friendship: but he that chooses a worthy friend that himself in the days of sorrow and need might receive the advantage, hath no excuse, no pardon, unless himself be as certain to do assistances, when evil fortune shall require them:—the sum of this answer to this inquiry I give you in a pair of Greek verses.

"Ἴσον Σεῶ σὺ τοὺς φίλους τιμᾶν θέλεις
Ἐν τοῖς κακοῖς δὲ τοὺς φίλους εὐεργέτει.

Friends are to friends as lesser gods, while they Honour and service to each other pay.
But when a dark cloud comes, grudge not to lend Thy head, thy heart, thy fortune, to thy friend.

3. The last inquiry is, how friendships are to be conducted; that is, what are the duties in presence and in absence; whether the friend may not desire to enjoy his friend as well as his friendship? The answer to which in a great measure depends upon what I have said already: and if friendship be a charity in society, and is not for contemplation and noise, but for material comforts and noble treatments and usages, this is no peradventure, but that if I buy land, I may eat the fruits, and if I take a house, I may dwell in it; and if I love a worthy person, I may please myself in his society: and in this there is no exception, unless the friendship be between persons of a different sex; for then not only the interest of their religion, and the care of their honour, but the worthiness of their friendship, require that their intercourse be prudent, and free from suspicion and reproach. And if a friend is obliged to bear a calamity, so he secure the honour of his friend; it will concern him to conduct his intercourse in the lines of a virtuous prudence, so that he shall rather lose much of his own comfort, than she any thing of her honour; and in this case the noises of people are so to be regarded, that next to innocence they are the principal. But when, by caution and prudence and severe conduct, a friend hath done all that he or she can to secure fame and honourable reports; after this, their noises are to be despised; they must not fright us from our friendships, nor from her fairest intercourses; I may lawfully pluck the clusters from my own vine, though he that walks by calls me thief.

But by the way, Madam, you may see how much I differ from the morosity of those cynics, who would not admit your sex into the communities of a noble friendship. I believe some wives have been the best friends in the world; and few stories can outdo the nobleness and piety of that lady, that sucked the poisonous, purulent matter from the wound of our brave prince in the Holy Land, when an assassin had pierced him with a venomous arrow. And if it be told that women cannot retain counsel, and therefore can be no brave friends; I can best confute them by the story of Porcia, who, being fearful of the weakness of her sex, stabbed herself into the thigh to try how she could bear pain; and finding herself constant enough to that sufferance, gently chid her Brutus for not daring to trust her, since now she perceived that no torment could wrest that secret from her, which she hoped might be intrusted to her. If there were not more things to be said for your satisfaction, I could have made it disputable whether have been more illustrious in their friendships, men or women? I cannot say that women are capable of all those excellencies, by which men can oblige the world; and therefore a female friend in some cases is not so good a counselor as a wise man, and cannot so well defend my honour; nor dispose of reliefs and assistances, if she be under the power of another; but a woman can love as passionately, and converse as pleasantly, and retain a secret as faithfully, and be useful in her proper ministries; and she can die for her friend as well as the bravest Roman knight; and we find that some persons have engaged themselves as far as death upon a less interest than all this amounts to: such were the Εὐχολίματοι, as the Greeks call them; the "Devoti" of a prince or general; the Assassins amongst the Saracens; the Σολιζούνοι amongst the old Galatians: they did as much as a friend could do. And if the greatest services of a friend can be paid for by an ignoble price, we cannot grudge to virtuous and brave women that they be partners in a noble friendship, since their conversation and returns can add so many moments to the felicity of our lives: and therefore though a knife cannot enter as far as a sword, yet a knife may be more useful to some purposes, and in every thing, except it be against an enemy. A man is the best friend in trouble, but a woman may be equal to him in the days of joy: a woman can as well increase our comforts, but cannot so well lessen our sorrows; and therefore we do not carry women with us when we go to fight; but, in peaceful cities and times, virtuous women are the beauties of society and the prettinesses of friendship. And when we consider that few persons in the world have all those excellencies, by which friendship can be useful and illustrious, we may as well allow women as men to be friends; since they can have all that which can be necessary and essential to friendships, and these cannot have all by which friendships can be accidentally improved; in all, some abatements will be made; and we shall do too much honour to women if we reject them from friendships because they are not perfect: for if to friendships we admit imperfect men, because no man is perfect; he that rejects women, does find fault with them because they are not more perfect than men; which either does secretly affirm that they ought and can be perfect, or else it openly accuses men of injustice and partiality.

I hope you will pardon me that I am a little gone from my undertaking: I went aside to wait upon the women, and to do countenance to their tender virtues: I am now returned, and, if I were to do the office of a guide to uninstructed friends, would add the particulars following. Madam, you need not read them now, but when any friends come to be taught by your precept and example how to converse in the noblest conjurations, you may put these into better words and tell them,

1. That the first law of friendship is, they must neither ask of their friend what is indecent, nor grant it if themselves be asked. For it is no good office to make my friend more vicious or more a fool; I will restrain his folly, but not nurse it; I will not make my groom the officer of my lust and vanity. There are villains who sell their souls for bread, that offer sin and vanity at a price: I should be unwilling my friend should know I am vicious; but if he could be brought to minister to it, he is not worthy to be my friend: and if I could offer it to him, I do not deserve to clasp hands with a virtuous person.

2. Let no man choose him for his friend whom it shall be possible for him ever after to hate; for though the society may justly be interrupted, yet love is an immortal thing, and I will never despise him whom I could once think worthy of my love. A friend that proves not good, is rather to be suffered, than any enmities be entertained: and there are some outer offices of friendship and little drudgeries, in which the less worthy are to be employed, and it is better that he be below-stairs than quite thrown out of doors.

3. There are two things which a friend can never pardon, a treacherous blow and the revealing of a secret, because these are against the nature of friendship; they are the adulteries of it, and dissolve the union; and in the matters of friendship, which is the marriage of souls, these are the proper causes of divorce: and therefore I shall add this only, that secrecy is the chastity of friendship, and the publication of it is a prostitution and direct debauchery; but a secret, treacherous wound is a perfect and unpardonable apostasy. I remember a pretty apologue that Bromiard tells,—A fowler in a sharp frosty morning having taken many little birds for which he had long watched, began to take up his nets; and nipping the birds on the head laid them down. A young thrush, espying the tears trickling down his cheeks by reason of the extreme cold, said to her mother, that certainly the man was very merciful and compassionate that wept so bitterly over the calamity of the poor birds: but her mother told her more wisely, that she might better judge of the man's disposition by his hand than by his eye;—and if the hands do strike treacherously, he can never be admitted to friendship, who speaks fairly and weeps pitifully. Friendship is the greatest honesty and ingenuity in the world.

4. Never accuse thy friend, nor believe him that does; if thou dost, thou hast broken the skin: but he that is angry with every little fault, breaks the bones of friendship. And when we consider that in society and the accidents of every day, in which no man is constantly pleased or displeased with the same things, we shall find reason to impute the change unto ourselves; and the emanations of the sun are still glorious, when our eyes are sore: and we have no reason to be angry with an eternal light, because we have a changeable and a mortal faculty. But however, do not think thou didst contract alliance with an angel, when thou didst take thy friend into thy bosom; he may be weak as well as thou art, and thou mayest need pardon as well as he; and that man loves flattery more than friendship, who would not only have his friend, but all the contingencies of his friend, to humour him.

Μή ποτ' ἐπὶ μικρᾷ προφάσει φίλον ἀνδρ' ἀπολέσσης, Πειζόμενος χαλεπῇ, Κύρνε, διαβολῇ.
Εἴ τις ἀμαρτωλῇσι φίλων ἐπὶ πάντι χολῶτο,
Οὐ ποτ' ἂν ἀλλήλοις ἄρθμοι, οὔτε φίλοι. ΤΗΣΟΣ.

5. Give thy friend counsel wisely and charitably, but leave him to his liberty whether he will follow thee or no: and be not angry if thy counsel be rejected: for advice is no empire, and he is not my friend that will be my judge whether I will or no. Neoptolemus had never been honoured with the victory and spoils of Troy, if he had attended to the tears and counsel of Lycomedes, who being afraid to venture the young man, fain would have had him sleep at home safe in his little island. He that gives advice to his friend and exacts obedience to it, does not the kindness and ingenuity of a friend, but the office and pertness of a schoolmaster.

6. Never be a judge between thy friends in any matter where both set their hearts upon the victory: if strangers or enemies be litigants, whatever side thou favourest, thou gettest a friend; but when friends are the parties thou lovest one.

7. Never comport thyself so, as that thy friend can be afraid of thee: for then the state of the relation alters when a new and troublesome passion supervenes. “Oderunt quos metuunt.”—“Perfect love casteth out fear;” and no man is friend to a tyrant; but that friendship is tyranny where the love is changed into fear, equality into empire, society into obedience; for then all my kindness to him also will be no better than flattery.

8. When you admonish your friend, let it be without bitterness; when you chide him, let it be without reproach; when you praise him, let it be with worthy purposes, and for just causes, and in friendly measures; too much of that is flattery, too little is envy: if you do it justly, you teach him true measures;

but when others praise him, rejoice, though they praise not thee, and remember that if thou esteemest his praise to be thy disparagement, thou art envious, but neither just nor kind.

9. When all things else are equal, prefer an old friend before a new. If thou meanest to spend thy friend, and make gain of him till he weary, thou wilt esteem him as a beast of burden, the worse for his age: but if thou esteemest him by noble measures, he will be better to thee by thy being used to him, by trial and experience, by reciprocation of endearments, and an habitual worthiness. An old friend is like old wine, which when a man hath drunk, he doth not desire new, because he saith “the old is the better.” But every old friend was new once; and if he be worthy, keep the new one till he become old.

10. After all this, treat thy friend nobly, love to be with him, do to him all the worthinesses of love and fair endearment, according to thy capacity and his; bear with his infirmities till they approach towards being criminal; but never dissemble with him, never despise him, never leave him. “Give him gifts and upbraid him not,” and refuse not his kindnesses, and be sure never to despise the smallness or the impropriety of them. “Confirmatur amor beneficio accepto:” “A gift (saith Solomon) fasteneth friendships.” For as an eye that dwells long upon a star, must be refreshed with lesser beauties and strengthened with greens and looking-glasses, lest the sight become amazed with too great a splendour; so must the love of friends sometimes be refreshed with material and low caresses; lest by striving to be too Divine it become less human: it must be allowed its share of both: it is human in giving pardon and fair construction, and openness and ingenuity, and keeping secrets; it hath something that is Divine, because it is beneficent; but much because it is eternal.

POSTSCRIPT.

MADAM,

If you shall think it fit that these papers pass further than your own eye and closet, I desire they may be consigned into the hands of my worthy friend Dr. Wedderburne: for I do not only expose all my sickness to his cure, but I submit my weaknesses to his censure; being as confident to find of him charity for what is pardonable, as remedy for what is curable: but indeed, Madam, I look upon that worthy man as an idea of friendship; and if I had no other notices of friendship or conversation to instruct me than his, it were sufficient: for whatsoever I can say of friendship, I can say of his; and as all that know him reckon him amongst the best physicians, so I know him worthy to be reckoned amongst the best friends.

TO THE MOST SACRED MAJESTY OF

CHARLES II.

KING OF GREAT BRITAIN, FRANCE, AND IRELAND, DEFENDER OF THE FAITH, &c.

GREAT SIR,

THE circles of the Divine Providence turn themselves upon the affairs of the world so, that every spondyl of the wheels may mark out those virtues which we are then to exercise; and every new event in the economy of God, is God's finger to point out to us by what instances he will be served. We have been sorely smitten and for a long time; for, (that I may use the words of the prophet,) "Alas! for that day was great, so that none was like to it, it was even the time of Jacob's trouble;"^a and then, faith and patience, and all the passive graces of religion, were in their own season. But since God hath left off to smite us with an iron rod, and hath once more said unto these nations, "They shall serve the Lord their God, and David their king whom I have raised up unto them;" now our duty stands on the sunny side, it is our work to rejoice in God and in God's anointed, and to be glad, and worthily to accept of our prosperity is all our business: for so good a God we serve, that he hath made it our duty to be happy, and we cannot please him unless we be infinitely pleased ourselves. It was impossible to live without our king; but as slaves live, that is, such who are civilly dead, and persons condemned to metals; we lived to the lusts and insolency of others, but not at all to ourselves, to our own civil or religious comforts. But now our joys are mere and unmixed; for that we may do our duty and have our reward at once, God hath sent your Majesty amongst us, that we may feel the pleasures of obedience, and reap the fruits of that government which God loves and uses, which he hath constituted and adorned, which he hath restored to us by a conjugation of miracles, by the work of his hand and the light of his countenance, by changing the hearts of men, and "scattering the people that delight in war," by infatuating their counsels and breaking their cords asunder; that is, which he himself hath wrought amongst us by himself alone, and therefore will bless and will never interrupt: only we must be careful never to provoke him any more by our unthankfulness and infidel apostasy.

But now, great Sir, be pleased to give me leave in the throngs of those that rejoice to see the goodness of God to his servant Job, in imitation of them who presented him with, every man, an ear-ring of gold, and a piece of silver, or a lamb,^b to bring also my offering, the signification of my joy. For though it be but two books, which, like the widow's two mites, make up but a contemptible sum; yet because it is all I have, your Majesty may be pleased to accept: and so much the rather, because it is also an expression of that part of the duty of my calling which hath fallen to my share. For your Majesty, like the king in the gospel, hath been in a far country, and some of your citizens sent after you, and said, "Nolumus hunc regnare;"^c but God hath caused you to return and reign: and if your Majesty should by that example call us to render an account of our talents, I can only say, that amongst those many excellent persons who have greatly improved theirs, I was willing to negotiate and to labour. What fruit will from hence accrue to souls is wholly in the hands of God : but this semination and culture were much wanted in the reformed churches. For though in all things else the goodness of God hath made us to abound, and our cup to run over : yet our labours have been hitherto unemployed in the description of the rules of conscience and casuistical theology. In which because I have made some attempts, if the production be not unworthy, I am sure it is not improper to lay it at the feet of your Majesty. For your Majesty being by God appointed "custos utriusque tabulæ," since, like Moses, you are from God descended to us with the two tables of the law in your hand, and that you will best govern by the arguments and compulsory of conscience, and this alone is the greatest firmament of obedience ; whatsoever can be the measure of conscience "est res fisci," is part of your own propriety, and enters into your exchequer.

Be pleased therefore, gracious Sir, to accept this instance of my duty to God, to your Majesty, and to your great charge, the church of England. There are in it many things intended for the service, but nothing to deserve any of these great interests. Those cases that concern the power and offices of ecclesiastical superiors and supreme, were (though in another manner) long since done by the incomparable Mr. Hooker,^d and the learned Archbishop of Spalato ;^e but their labours were unhappily lost, and never saw the light. And though I cannot attain to the strength of these champions of David and guardians of the temple ; yet since their portion of work is fallen into my hand, I have heartily endeavoured to supply that loss ; though with no other event, but as charitable passengers by their little, but well-meaning, alms repair the breaches of his fortune, who was greatly undone by the war or fire. But therefore I humbly beg your Majesty's pardon in all things where my weaknesses make me to despair of your more gracious acceptance : and here I am therefore to be confident, because your mercy is, as your Majesty, this day in her exaltation, and is felt by all your subjects ; and therefore humbly to be hoped for by,

Great Sir,

Your Majesty's

Most dutiful and most obedient Subject,

JER. TAYLOR.

THE PREFACE.

THE reformation of religion in the western churches hath been so violently, so laboriously, so universally, opposed by evil spirits and evil men, by wilfulness and ignorance, by prejudice and interest, by error and partiality ; and itself also hath been done so imperfectly in some places, and so unskillfully in some others, because the thick and long-incumbent darkness had made it impossible to behold the whole light in all its splendour ; that it was found to be work enough for the ministers of religion to convince the gainsayers, to oppose their witty arts by the advantageous representment of wise truths, so to keep the people from their temptations. But since there were not found many able to do this but such which had other cures to attend, the conduct of souls in their public and private charges, and the consequent necessity of preaching and catechising, visiting the sick, and their public daily offices ; it was the less wonder that in the reformed churches there hath been so great a scarcity of books of cases of conscience : though it was not to be denied but the careless and needless neglect of receiving private confessions, hath been too great a cause of our not providing materials apt for so pious and useful a ministration. But besides this, it is certain that there was a necessity of labouring to other purposes than formerly : and this necessity was present and urgent ; and the hearts and heads of men ran to quench that fire, and left the government of the house more loosely, till they could discern whether the house would be burnt or no by the flames of contention which then brake out : only this duty was supplied by excellent preachings, by private conferences, by admonitions and answers given when some more pious and religious persons came to confessions, and as they were upon particular occasions required and invited. But for any public provisions of books of casuistical theology, we were almost wholly unprovided ; and, like the children of Israel in the days of Saul and Jonathan, we were forced to go down to the forges of the Philistines to sharpen every man his share and his coulter, his axe and his mattock. We had swords and spears of our own, enough for defence, and more than enough for disputation : but in this more necessary part of the conduct of consciences, we did receive our answers from abroad, till we found that our old needs were sometimes very ill supplied, and new necessities did every day arise.

Some of the Lutherans have indeed done something in this kind which is well; Balduinus, Bidenbachius, Dedekanus, Konig, and the abbreviator of Gerard: some essays also have been made by others; Alstedius, Amesius, Perkins, and the late eloquent and reverend bishop of Norwich. But yet our needs remain; and we cannot be well supplied out of the Roman storehouses: for though there the staple is, and very many excellent things exposed to view; yet we have found the merchants to be deceivers, and the wares too often falsified.

For, 1. If we consider what heaps of prodigious propositions and rules of conscience their doctors have given us, we shall soon perceive that there are so many boxes of poison in their repositories under the same paintings and specious titles, that as it will be impossible for every man to distinguish their ministries of health from the methods of death, so it will be unsafe for any man to venture indiscriminately. For who can safely trust that guide that teaches him, "that it is no deadly sin to steal, or privately against his will and without his knowledge to take a thing from him who is ready to give it if he were asked, but will not endure to have it taken without asking:"^a—"that it is no theft privately to take a thing that is not great, from our father:"^b—"that he who sees an innocent punished for what himself hath done, he in the mean time who did it, holding his peace, is not bound to restitution:"^c—"that he who falls into fornication if he goes to confession, may, the same day in which he did fornicate, receive the communion; that communion is manducation, and therefore requires not attention:"^d—"that he, who, being in deadly sin, receives the holy communion, commits but one sin, viz. that against the dignity of the sacrament; and that the omission of confession is no distinct sin, meaning, amongst them who believe confession to be of Divine institution?"—As bad or worse are those affirmatives and doctrines of repentance: "A dying man is not tied to be contrite for his sins; but confession and attrition are sufficient:"^e and that we may know what is meant by attrition, we are told "it is a sorrow for temporal evil, disgrace, or loss of health, sent by God as a punishment, or feared to be sent:"^f this alone is enough for salvation, if the dying man do but confess to the priest, though he have lived wickedly all his life-time. And that we need not think the matter of confession to be too great a burden, we are told, "He that examines his conscience before confession, sins if he be too diligent and careful." But as for the precept of having a contrite and a broken heart, "it binds not but in the article or danger of death: nor then, but when we cannot have the sacrament of penance."^g—To these may be added those contradictions of severity for the securing of a holy life; that "if a man purpose at the present to sin no more, though at the same time he believes he shall sin again, (that is, that he will break his purpose,) yet that purpose is good enough: that it is not very certain whether he that hath attrition, does receive grace, though he does not formally resolve to sin no more:"^h meaning, that it is probable, that it is not necessary to make any such resolution of leaving their sin; they are not certain it is so, nor certain that it is otherwise, that is, they find no commandment for these things: it may be they are counselled and advised in Scripture, but that is no great matter;ⁱ for "it is no sin not to correspond with the Divine inspirations exhorting us to counsels."—Add to these, that "to detract from our neighbour's fame before a conscientious, silent, and a good man, is no deadly sin: to dispense with our vows in a year of jubilee is valid, though the condition of obtaining that jubilee be not performed."^k—Thus men amongst them have leave to sin, and they may live in it, as long as their life lasts, without repentance: and that repentance in the sum of affairs is nothing but to call to the priest to absolve them; provided you be sorrowful for the evil you feel or fear God will send on you: but contrition, or sorrow proceeding from the love of God, is not at all necessary; "neither is it necessary that our sorrow be thought to be contrition;^l neither is it necessary that attrition should go before confession, but will serve if it be some time after; and if you confess none but venial sins, it is sufficient if you be sorrowful for one of them; and the case is the same for mortal sins formerly confessed."^m But I am ashamed of this heap of sad stories: if I should amass together what themselves have collected in their books, it would look like a libel: but who is pleased with variety of such sores, may enter into the hospitals themselves, and walk and look till he be weary.

2. But not only with the evil matter of their propositions; but we have reason to be offended with the strange manner of their answerings. I shall not need to instance in that kind of argument which is but too frequent among those who prevail more by their authority than their reason, of proving propositions by similitudes and analogies. I remember that Gregory Sayrⁿ says, that all precepts of the moral law are to be reduced to the decalogue; because as all natural things are reduced to ten predicaments, so it is expedient that all kinds of virtues and vice be reduced to the ten commandments. And Bessæus infers seven sacraments from the number of the planets, and the seven ears of full corn in Egypt, and seven water-pots changed into wine, (though they were but six,) because as the wine filled six water-pots, so the sacrament of the eucharist fills the other six, and itself makes the seventh; and that therefore peradventure the sacraments are called vessels of grace. But this I look upon as a want of better arguments in a weak cause, managed by careless and confident persons; and note it only as a fault, that the guides of consciences should speak many things, when they can prove but few.

3. That which I suppose to be of greatest consideration is, that the casuists of the Roman church take these things for resolution and answer to questions of conscience, which are spoken by an authority that is not sufficient; and they admit of canons, and the epistles of popes, for authentic warranties, which are suspicious, whether ever they were written by them to whose authority only they do pretend;—and they quote sayings of the old doctors, which are contradicted by others of equal learning and reputation, and all cited in their own canon law; and have not any sufficient means to ascertain themselves what is binding in very many cases argued in their canons, and decretal epistles, and bulls of popes. Nay, they must needs be at a loss in their conduct of consciences, especially in all inquiries and articles of faith, when they choose such foundations, which themselves know to be weak and tottering; and yet lay the greatest load upon such foundations, and tie the conscience with the hardest ligature, where it is certain they can give no security. For it is not agreed in the church of Rome, neither can they tell upon whose authority they may finally rely; they cannot tell who is the visible head of the church: for they are not sure the pope is; because a council may be superior to him, and whether it be or no, it is not resolved: and therefore either they must change their principle, and rely only upon Scriptures and right reason and universal testimonies, or give no answer to the conscience in very many cases of the greatest concernment; for by all other measures their questions are indeterminable. But the authority of man they make to be their foundation: and yet if their allegations were allowed to be good argument, it would serve them but to very few purposes, since the doctors, whose affirmative is the decision of the case, are so infinitely divided.

4. This to me, and to very many wise men, looks like a very great objection: but I find that they who are most concerned in it, account it none; for the Roman casuists profess it; and yet do not suppose that the consequent of this should be, that the case is difficult, and the men not to be relied upon, and the conscience to be otherwise informed, and that we ought to walk the more warily, but therefore the conscience is at liberty, and the question in order to practice hath no difficulty; hard in the case, but easy in the action: for by this means they entertain all interests, and comply with all persuasions, and send none away unsatisfied. For uncertain answers make with them no uncertain resolution; for they teach us, that in such cases we may follow either part: and therefore they studiously keep up this academical or rather sceptic theology, “alii aiunt, alii negant; utrumque probabile.”^o And upon this account, although with greatest severity they bind on men’s persuasions the doctrines of meats and carnal ordinances, yet they have left them loose enough when it comes to the conscience, so loose that the precept is become ridiculous: for what can it be otherwise, when they teach, “that the fast is not broken by drinking of water or wine, nay, though we eat something that our drink may not hurt us; nor the usual collation at night if it be taken in the morning; nor if the butler or the cook lick his fingers; nor if we eat eggs or milk-meats, so it be not in the holy time of Lent; nor if after dinner awhile you eat something at the entreaty of a friend; nor if you upon a reasonable cause eat before your time: in all these cases you eat and fast at the same time.”^p All these things are derivatives from the contrary opinions of some easy, gentle doctors; and the effect of this stratagem is seen in things of greater consequence. For “we are free from our vow, or from a commandment, if it be a probable opinion of the doctors that we are free;”^q and it is probable, if it be the opinion of one grave doctor: that is, in effect, plainly, if it be probable in the doctrine, it is certain in practice; and it is probable, if any one of their doctors says it.

5. And the mischief of this is further yet discernible, if we consider that they determine their greatest and most mysterious cases oftentimes by no other argument but the saying of some few of their writers. I shall give but one instance of it; but it shall be something remarkable. The question was, “Whether the pope can dispense in the law of God?”^r The inquiry is not concerning a dish of whey, but of a considerable affair; upon which the right or the wrong of many thousand consciences amongst them do depend. It is answered, “that one opinion of the catholics says, that the pope can dispense in all things of the law of God, excepting the articles of faith.”—The proof is this, so Panormitan speaks, “in cap. Propositum, de Concess. Præbend. n. 20.” citing Innocentius “in cap. cum ad Monasterium, de Statu Monachorum,” where he says, that without cause the pope cannot dispense in things of Divine right; intimating that with cause he may. And the same is the opinion of Felinus “in cap. Quæ in Eccles. de Const. n. 19 et 20.” where amongst other things he saith, that the pope, when he hath cause, can change the usual form of baptism, and make it lawful to baptize in the name of the Trinity, which he reports out of Innocentius, “cap. 1. de Baptis. in fine, num. 11.” Yea, the same Felinus is bold to affirm “in cap. 1. de Const. n. 23.” that the pope with one word can create a priest, without any other solemnity, saying, Be thou a priest; which he reports out of Innocentius “in cap. 1. Sacra Unct.” The same Felinus adds further, that the pope with his word alone can make a bishop; and he cites “Angelus in lib. 2. cap. de Crim. Sacrilegii; et in lib. 1. cap. de Sententiam passis.” The same sentence is held by Decius, “concil. 112. n. 3. in fine; et in dict. cap. Quæ in Eccles. n. 25. et seq. alias n. 44 et 45. in Novis. Allegantur etiam alii Juristæ in cap. 2. de translat. Episcopi; et in lib. Manumissiones. ff. de just. et jure; et in lib. 2. cap. de Servit.” &c.

Here is a rare way of probation: for these allegations are not only a testimonial that these catholic authors are of that opinion; but it is intended to represent, that this opinion is not against the catholic faith; that popes and great lawyers are of it; and therefore that it is safe, and it may be followed, or be let alone: but yet this is sufficient to determine the doubting conscience of a subject, or to be propounded to him as that on which he may with security and indemnity rely. The thing is affirmed by Felinus, and for this he quotes Innocentius: and the same is the opinion of Decius, and for this opinion divers other lawyers are alleged. Now when this or the like happens to be in a question of so great concernment as this, it is such a dry story, such an improbable proof, so unsatisfying an answer to the conscience, that the great determination of all those questions and practices,—which can depend upon so universal an article as this, and a warranty to do actions which, their adversaries say, are abhorrent from the law of nature and common honesty,—shall, in their final resort, rest upon the saying of one or two persons, who having boldly spoken a foolish thing, have passed without condemnation by those superiors, for whose interest they have been bold to tell so great a lie.

In conclusion, the effect of these uncertain principles and unsteady conduct of questions is this; that though by violence and force they have constrained and thrust their churches into a union of faith, like beasts into a pound, yet they have made their cases of conscience and the actions of their lives unstable as the face of the waters, and immeasurable as the dimensions of the moon; by which means their confessors shall be enabled to answer according to every man's humour, and no man shall depart sad from their penitential chairs, and themselves shall take or give leave to any thing; concerning which I refer the reader to the books and letters written by their parties of Port-Royal, and to their own weak answers and vindications.

If I were willing by accusing others to get reputation to my own, or the undertakings of any of our persuasion or communion, I could give very many instances of their injustice and partialities in determining matters and questions of justice, which concern the church and their ecclesiastical persons; as if what was just amongst the reprobates of the laity were hard measure if done to an ecclesiastic, and that there were two sorts of justice, the one for seculars, and the other for churchmen; of which their own books^s give but too many instances. I could also remark that the monks and friars are “inquires in matrimonium,” and make inquiries into matrimonial causes with an impure curiosity, and make answers sometimes with spite and envy, sometimes with licentiousness; that their distinction of sins mortal and venial hath intricately and confounded almost all the certainty and answers of moral theology; but nothing of this is fitted to my intention, which is only to make it evident that it was necessary that cases of conscience should be written over anew, and established upon better principles, and proceed in more sober and satisfying methods: nothing being more requisite than that we should all “be instructed, and thoroughly prepared to every good work;” that we should “have a conscience void of offence both towards God and towards man;” that we should be able to “separate the vile from the precious,” and know what to choose and what to avoid; that “we may have our senses exercised to discern between good and evil,” that we may not “call good evil or evil good.” For since obedience is the love of God, and to do well is the life of religion, and the end of faith is the death of sin and the life of righteousness; nothing is more necessary than that we be rightly informed in all moral notices; because in these things an error leads on to evil actions, to the choice of sin, and the express displeasure of God; otherwise than it happens in speculation and ineffective notices and school-questions.

And indeed upon this consideration I was always confident, that though the questions of the school were nice and subtle, difficult and very often good for nothing; yet that in moral theology I should have found so perfect an accord, so easy determination of questions, that it would have been harder to find out questions than answers; and the great difficulty in books of this subject would be to put the great number of inquiries into order and method. I was not deceived in the ground and reason of my conjecture; because I knew that “in promptu et facili est æternitas;” God had made the way to heaven plain and simple; and what was necessary did lie open, and the lines of duty were to be read by every eye, or heard and learned by all understandings; and therefore it is certain that all practical truths are to be found out without much contention and dispute, because justice and obedience to God in all moral conversation are natural to us, just as logic and discourse are. But when I came to look a little nearer, I found that men were willing enough to be tied up to believe the inactive propositions of the doctors, but would keep a liberty of pleasing themselves in matters of life and conversation: in the former they would easily be governed by leading men; but in the latter they would not obey God himself, and without great regret would not be confined to strictness and severity in their cases of conscience. Some would; but many would not. They that would, gave laws unto themselves, and they could easily be governed; but they that would not, were ready to trample upon their yoke, if it were not made gentle and easy for their neck. But this was the least part of the evil.

For besides this, moral theology was made a trade for the house, and an art of the schools: and as nothing is more easy than natural logic, and yet nothing harder than sophistical, so it is in moral theology; what God had made plain, men have intricately and the easy commandment is wrapped up in uneasy learning; and by the new methods, a simple and uncrafty man cannot be “wise unto salvation;” which is but small comfort to him that stands in the place of the idiot and unlearned. Sometimes a severe commandment is expounded by the sense of ease and liberty, and the liberty is established in rule; but because the rule is not true in some hundreds of cases, a conscientious man does not know how to make use of it: and if the commandment be kept close to the sense of strictness and severity, there are so many outlets and escapes found out, that few men think themselves obliged. Thus in the rule, "Spoliatur ante omnia restituendum," which is an excellent measure of conscience in many cases, and certainly can have no direct abatement in the duty, and the party obliged can only be relieved by equity in the manner of doing it; yet of this plain and easy rule, Gabrieli^{us} brings no less than threescore and ten limitations: and to make all questions of that nature and the rule of conscience infinite and indeterminable, Menochius hath seven hundred ninety and eight questions concerning "possession;"—and "who is sufficient for these things?"—There is a rule amongst the lawyers which very much relates to the conscience of those men, who are engaged in suits and sentences of law in all countries which are ruled by the civil law: "In quolibet actu requiritur citatio." Of this rule Porcius brings a hundred and sixteen ampliations, and a hundred and four-and-twenty limitations.—Maranta enumerates forty cases, in which a negative ought to be proved: and Socinus sets down eight hundred and two "fallencies," (that is the word of the law,) concerning the contestation of suits and actions at law. Many more might be reckoned even in the interpreters of the civil law, and in the measures we derive from thence. But if any man thinks it better in the canon law, which is supposed to be as great a rule of our conscience in the matter of religion as the other is of justice; I shall only say, that the very title of the canon law was "Concordantia Discordantium," a tying of contradictions together in one string; and when you begin to look into the interpreters of the "Decretum," which is the best part of the canon law, Simoncellus¹ tells that the word "decretum" hath five-and-twenty significations. So that there is a wood before your doors, and a labyrinth within the wood, and locks and bars to every door within that labyrinth; and after all, we are like to meet with unskilful guides; and yet of all things in the world, in these things an error is the most intolerable.

But thus the enemy of mankind hath prevailed upon us, while we were earnest in disputations about things less concerning: then he was watchful and busy to interweave evil and uncertain principles into our moral institutions, to entangle what was plain, to divide what was simple, to make an art of what was written in the tables of our hearts with the finger of God. When a gentleman was commending Dr. Fisher's (bishop of Rochester) great pains in the confutations of Luther's books, the wise prelate said heartily, that he wished he had spent all that time in prayer and meditation which he threw away upon such useless wranglings. For that was the wisdom of the ancients: "Antiqua sapientia nihil aliud quam faciendi et vitandi præcepit: et tunc meliores erant viri. Postquam docti prodierunt, boni desunt. Simplex enim illa et aperta virtus in obscuram et solertem scientiam versa est; docemurque disputare non vivere:" "Our forefathers taught their children what to do and what to avoid; and then men were better. But when men did strive to become learned, they did not care so much to become good; they then were taught to dispute rather than to live."² To this purpose I understand that excellent saying of Solomon; "Of making many books there is no end, and much study is a weariness of the flesh. Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter. Fear God and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man:"³—meaning, that books which serve to any other purpose, are a laborious vanity, consumptive of our time and health to no purpose: nothing else being to any purpose but such things which teach us to fear God, and how to keep his commandments. All books, and all learning, which minister to this end, partake of the goodness of the end; but that which promotes it not, is not to be regarded: and therefore the Chaldee paraphrast reads these words into an advice of making many books tending to holiness: "Fili mi, monitus esto ut facias libros sapientiæ plurimos, adeo ut non sit finis; et ut studeas verbis legis, conspiciasque defatigationem carnis:" "Make books of wisdom very many, and study in the words of the law till thou mayest see the weariness of thy flesh:" "Beata ætas quæ in vitâ hominum regenda totam disputandi rationem posuit;" "Blessed are the times in which men learn to dispute well that they may live the better."—And truly it were much to be wished that men would do so now; endeavouring to teach the ways of godliness in sincerity; to show to men the right paths of salvation; to describe the right and plain measures of simplicity, christian charity, chastity, temperance, and justice; to unwind the entanglements of art, and to strip moral theology of all its visors; to detract all the falsehoods and hypocrisies of crafty men; to confute all the false principles of evil teachers, who by uncertain and deceitful grounds teach men to walk confidently upon trap-doors and pitfalls, and preach doctrines so dangerous and false, that if their disciples would live according to the consequents of such doctrines, without doubt they must perish everlastingly.

It is a great work and too heavy for one man's shoulders; but somebody must begin; and yet no man ever would, if he can be affrighted with the consideration of any difficulty in the world. But I have laid aside all considerations of myself, and with an entire dependence upon God for help, I have begun an institution of moral theology, and established it upon such principles and instruments of probation which every man allows, and better than which we have none imparted to us. I affirm nothing but upon grounds of Scripture, or universal tradition, or right reason discernible by every disinterested person, where the questions are of great concern, and can admit of these probations: where they cannot, I take the next best; the laws of wise commonwealths and the sayings of wise men, the results of fame and the proverbs of the ancient, the precedents of holy persons and the great examples of saints. Πεπαιδευμένον γὰρ ἔστιν ἐπὶ τοσούτων τ' ἀκριβὲς ἐπιζητεῖν καθ' ἕκαστον γένος, ἐφ' ὅσον ἡ τοῦ πράγματος φύσις ἐπιδέχεται παραπλήσιον γὰρ φαίνεται, μαθηματικοῦ τε πιθανολογούντος ἀποδέχεσθαι, καὶ ῥητορικὸν ἀποδείξεις ἀπαιτεῖν.^y "He that is well instructed will require in every kind of argument and disputation no other proof or subtilty than the subject-matter will bear. For it were ridiculous for a mathematician to go about to persuade with eloquence, or an orator to pretend to demonstrations."—But moral theology is a collective body of all wisdom, whereof some things are demonstrable, and many are probable, and other things are better than their contraries; and they are to be proved accordingly, every thing in its proportion and capacity. And therefore here I make use of all the brocardics, or rules of interpreters; that is, not only what is established regularly in law, but what is concluded wise and reasonable by the best interpreters. Socinus, Duennas, Azo, Gabrielius, Damasus, and divers other great lawyers, attempted this way in the interpretation of the civil and canon law. I intermeddle not in the question, whether they did well or ill, but leave the contest as it lies between Duarenus and Balduinus, who blame them, and Wesenbech and Gribaldus, who are their confident advocates. But in the discourses of conscience, whatsoever is right reason, though taken from any faculty or science, is also of use and efficacy. Because whatever can guide the actions or discourses, or be the business or the conduct, of any man, does belong to conscience and its measures; and what is true in any science, is true in conscience.

I do not say that what is true or allowed in human laws is also true or allowed in the Divine; because though God does justly and wisely, yet men do not always so; and what is true in sciences is not always understood to be true in civil laws. "Qualis causa, talis effectus," saith the philosopher; "The cause and the effect are of the same nature."—But the lawyer says, this is not always true. For manumission, which is a cause of liberty, is of the civil law and positive institution; but liberty, which is the effect of it, is of the law of nature. Now although the philosopher understands his rule of natural causes and effects, or those causes which are artificial, but operate by the way of nature, and intends it not at all to be persuasive in matters of positive and legal institution; yet this truth and all other truths must prevail in conscience, because they are emanations from the fountain of truth; from whence nothing can derive that is not always true, and in all senses true, where they are intended to persuade or teach. But then the truths of philosophy must be used in the measures of conscience by the intentions of philosophy, and not be carried on to a disparate matter, and without cause be indifferently applied, the same words to things of another nature. There is a rule in philosophy, "Incorporalia sunt individua:" from hence Hottoman argues, Therefore dominion, heritage, "ususfructus," or "the use of a thing by him that is not the lord," are individual, because they are incorporeal.—Now this will deceive him that trusts upon it: not because what is true in one place, is not true always and every where; but because these words applied to other matters, and the words signifying other intentions, they abuse the weary hearer, but instruct not. But because the questions of conscience do relate to all matters, therefore to these all arts and sciences do minister. "Res fisci est, ubicunque natat," "Whatsoever swims upon any water, belongs to this exchequer;" that is, saith St. Austin,^z "Christianus Domini sui esse intelligit, ubicunque invenerit veritatem," "If it be truth, wheresoever it be found, the christian knows it is his Lord's goods:" and therefore I have proved and adorned some truths with the wise saying of philosophers and poets, "ut Deo serviat quicquid puer utile didici," that (according to the expression of the same saint^a) "whatsoever, being a child, I learned which can profit, may be brought in to serve and pay homage to God."—But still they are to be understood according to the sense and meaning of their proper art where they dwell. And though there is great need of skill in all those sciences from whence we derive notices in order to the conduct of conscience; and that it will be hard for any man to pretend to be master of all those things which must be used in these discourses; yet I, who will not pretend to that, have yet taken as good a course as I could to inform myself, though not in the whole system of every art in the whole circle which I have here occasionally used, yet I have been careful to understand those few things, which I have thence drawn in as auxiliaries: and lest I should yet fail, I have taken another course by way of caution and defence, that I may be right and sure in the reflex, if I had cause to doubt of any thing in the direct notice.

For I have propounded to myself general measures to be as boundaries to the determination of doubts and the answer of questions; which so long as I do deserve, my error will be very innocent, if any happens. For, 1. In hard and intricate questions I take that which is easy and intelligible, and concerning which it will be easy to judge whether it be right or wrong. 2. In odious things, and matters of burden and envy, I take that part which is least, unless there be evident reason to the contrary. 3. In favours I always choose the largest sense, when any one is bettered by that sense, and no man is the worse. 4. In things and questions relating to men, I give those answers that take away scruples, and bring peace and a quiet mind. 5. In things relating to God, I always choose to speak that thing which to him is most honourable. 6. In matters of duty, I always choose that which is most holy. 7. In doubts I choose what is safest. 8. In probabilities, I prefer that which is the more reasonable, never allowing to any one a leave of choosing that, which is confessedly the less reasonable in the whole conjunction of circumstances and relative considerations.

Upon the account of these principles I hope to serve God and the good of souls. For these being the points of my compass, which way soever I sail, I shall not suffer shipwreck: and if at any time I go about, which I have avoided as much as my infirmities will permit, yet at last, and in the whole, I arrive where I ought to be. For indeed in this whole affair I have proceeded with great fear; as knowing that he who writes cases of conscience, does in a manner give laws to all that do believe him: and no man persuades more vehemently than he that tells you, "This, God forbids;—This, God commands;" and therefore I knew that to be mistaken here was very evil, and might do much evil; but to be careless, or prejudicate, or partial, or flattering, or oppressive with severity, or unsafe with gentleness, was criminal in the cause as well as mischievous in the event: and the greatest security which I have that I have not spoken unsafely in any man's case, is, because that I have prayed much, and laboured much, that I might not at all minister to error or schism, to folly or vanity, but to the glory of God, and to the good of souls: and I have so determined every case that I have here presented, as I myself would practise, as I would account at the day of judgment, through the mercies of God in Jesus Christ, and the integrity and simplicity of my conscience: and therefore I desire that my reader will use the same caution and ingenuity before he condemns any conclusion, and consider, that as in these things it was impossible to please every man, ἐργασιν ἐν μεγάλοις πᾶσιν ἄδεῖν χαλεπόν^b so I designed to please no man but as he is a lover of truth, and a lover of his own soul.

The style that I here use, is according as it happens; sometimes plain, sometimes closer: the things which I bring are sometimes new, and sometimes old; they are difficult and they are easy; sometimes adorned with cases, and the cases specified in stories, and sometimes instead of a story I recite an apologue, and disguise a true narrative with other names, that I may not discover the person whose case I discourse of: and in all things I mind the matter; and suppose truth alone and reason and the piety of the decision to be the best ornament; and indeed sometimes the thing itself will not be handled otherwise.

Ornari res ipsa negat, contenta doceri.

I was here to speak to the understanding, not to win the affections; to convince, not to exhort: and where I had no certainty in a case, or that the parts of a question were too violently contended for, without sufficient evidence on either side, I have not been very forward to give my final sentence; but my opinion and my reason;

Per verbum forte respondent sæpe periti.^c

And yet I hope that in some cases it will be found, that though I am not fierce, positive, and decretory, yet the case itself is sufficiently declared, so that he who hath occasion to use it, may upon those accounts determine himself. For the modesty of him that teaches, is not always an argument that he is uncertain in his proposition. Τὸ νομίζω, καὶ τὸ δοκεῖν, καὶ τὰ τοιαῦτα οὐ πάντως ἐπὶ ἀμφιβόλου τάττονσιν οἱ παλαιοὶ, ἀλλὰ πολλάκις καὶ ἐπὶ τοῦ ἀληθεύειν οὕτως οὖν καὶ τὸ νομίζω ἐνταῦθα ἀντὶ τοῦ κρίνω, καὶ πιστεύω, saith Ulpian.^d When the ancients said, "I suppose, I think, It seems," they did not always mean that they were uncertain; but they sometimes intended it for a modest, but a direct affirmative: and so I do in some few cases where there is great reason on one side, and a great prejudice on the other: I give my reasons, and lay down the case, and all its allays, and leave it to prevail without my sentence by its own strength. And for this, I hope, no man will be offended at me: if he be, it is because I was not willing to offend him; but I was desirous to instruct, to comfort, to determine and to establish, him that needs.

I have studiously avoided all questions that are curious and unprofitable; such, I mean, which are only trials of wit, but neither ministers of justice nor religion. Such was that which was brought before the lawyers and all the learned men of Athens, with great noises to little purpose.—A gentleman of Ægina, dying, left three daughters;^e the one was beauteous and wanton; the second a lover of wine and gay pleasures; and the third a good spinster, and a great follower of country housewifery. He made the mother of these daughters to be his heir upon this condition, that she should divide all his estate between his daughters equally; but in such a manner, that what they received they should neither possess nor enjoy; as soon as ever they had quitted their portions, they should pay, each of them, to their mother ten thousand philippics. The mother runs to Athens, consults the lawyers and philosophers how this will should be fulfilled; but they know not, as supposing one part to cross another, and altogether to be impossible; for if the whole estate should be divided amongst them, how is it that they shall not enjoy it? and if they do not, how shall they pay their mother her assignment? The mother therefore, finding no help there, contrives it thus herself; to the pretty wanton she gives rich clothes, smooth eunuchs, soft beds, sweet perfumes, silver lavatories, and all things which, she supposed, might please her lust, and consume her portion. To the drinking girl she provides vessels of rich wines, a house well furnished, and all things fitted for expensive entertainments. But to the country housewife a good farm, ploughmen, and a great stock, many horses and some cows, some men-servants and a great many maidens, a kennel of hounds and a few swine; supposing this was no very probable way for her to thrive, but the likeliest way to do her husband's will; because the lust of the first, and thirst and debauchery of the second, and the ill-contrived stock of the third, would consume all their portions. But all this while she considered not, how, when they grew poor, she should receive her share. But at last a wiser man than was in the schools of Athens advised her thus: Give to the drunken maiden the rich garments, the jewels, and the eunuchs; and because she loves them not, she will sell them all for old wines of Chios:—to the wanton give fields and cattle, oxen and ploughs, hinds and swine; and she will quickly sell them that she may entertain her lovers:—but if you give vessels of wine to the country girl, she knows not what to do with them, and therefore will sell them to the merchant for ready money. Thus shall neither of them enjoy their portion; but by selling it, they shall be enabled to pay the money to their mother.—This was a riddle, rather than a case of law or conscience; and so are many others, which I therefore resolved to lay aside, and trouble no man's conscience or head with them; as supposing that the answer of the dull Diodorus, mentioned in the Greek epigram, is sufficient for such curiosities.

Ἡ σοί, ἡ τῶν ἐλόντι,

It is so, or it is not so; it must be done this way, or some other; the thing in question is yours, or somebody's else; but make the judge your friend, and I will warrant your cause, provided it be just; but look you to that. A slight answer to an intricate and useless question is a fit cover to such a dish; a cabbage-leaf is good enough to cover a pot of mushrooms: but I have taken a shorter way, and laid them all aside; remembering the saying of Friar John Annias to Nicolaus de Lyra; "Testimonium Dei lucidum est, nec egent literæ divinæ plicis," "The things of God are plain and easy;" and therefore I have rejected every thing that is not useful and intelligible; choosing only to make such inquiries by which we may become better, and promoted in something of our duty;

Quid sumus, et quidnam victuri gignimur, ordo

viz. that we may be taught how to know what God requires of us, "instructed to salvation, and fitted to every good work."

But now I shall desire that he who reads my book, will not expect this book to be a collective body of particular cases of conscience; for I find that they are infinite, and my life is not so; and I shall never live to write them all, or to understand them all; and if I should write some and not all, I should profit I know not whom, and do good but to a very few, and that by chance too; and it may be, that their cases, being changed by circumstances, would not be fitted by my indefinite answers. I therefore resolved upon another way; which although no man before me hath trod in writing cases of conscience, yet I cannot say it is new; for I took my pattern from Tribonianus the lawyer, who out of the laws of the old Romans collected some choice rules, which give answer to very many cases that happen. And after I had considered and tried many others, I found this most reasonable, most useful, and most comprehensive, of all matters relating to my present undertaking. For I intend here to offer to the world a general instrument of moral theology, by the rules and measures of which, the guides of souls may determine the particulars that shall be brought before them; and those who love to inquire, may also find their duty so described, that unless their duties be complicated with laws, and civil customs, and secular interests, men that are wise may guide themselves in all their proportions of conscience; but if their case be indeed involved, they need the conduct of a spiritual guide, to untie the intrigue, and state the question, and apply the respective rules to the several parts of it; for though I have set them down all in their proper places relating to their several matters, yet when a question requires the reason of many rules, it is not every hand that can apply them: men will for ever need a living guide; and a wise guide of souls will, by some of these rules, be enabled to answer most cases that shall occur.

For although I have not given answers to every doubt, yet I have told what we are to do when any doubt arises; I have conducted the doubting conscience by such rules, which in all doubts will declare her duty; and therefore if the matter of the doubt be in the reception of the sacrament of the eucharist, or in wearing clothes, or in eating, the rule is the same and applicable to every matter. I have not disputed whether sumptuary laws be actually obligatory to us in England or Ireland; but I have told by what measures we shall know concerning all laws, whether they be obligatory or no, in any place, and to every person. I have not expounded all the laws of God, but I have told by what rules they are to be expounded and understood. But because these rules have influence upon all particulars, I have, by way of instance and illustration, determined very many special cases; and I was a little curious to choose such which are the matter of our usual inquiries; and have been very studious to draw into particular scrutiny most of the principal and noblest questions of christendom, which could relate to the matter of my rule; provided that they were practical and did minister to good manners; having that of Lactantius in my mind; "Non tam de rebus humanis bene meretur, qui scientiam bene dicendi affert, quam qui pie et innocenter docet vivere:" "He best deserves of mankind, who teaches men to live well rather than to talk well:" and therefore the wiser Greeks preferred philosophers before orators: "Illi enim recte vivendi doctores sunt existimandi, quod est longe præstabilius:" "It is better to be a doctor of good life, than of eloquent or learned speaking;" for they are but few who are capable of eloquence, but to live well is the duty of all; and I have always been pleased with the saying of Jupiter to Pallas in the apologue, when he kissed her cheek for choosing the fruitful olive.

Nam quod facimus, id nisi utile est,
Stulta omnis atque inanis inde est gloria;

Unless it does good and makes us better, it is not worth the using: and therefore it hath been no small part of my labour not only to do what was necessary, but to lay aside what was useless and unfit, at least what I thought so.

In this manner by the Divine assistance I have described a rule of conscience: in the performance of which I shall make no excuses for my own infirmities, or to guard myself from the censure of the curious or the scorers. I have with all humility and simplicity desired to serve God, and to minister to his church, and I hope he will accept me: and for the rest, I have laid it all at his most holy feet, and therefore will take no further care concerning myself in it. Only I am desirous that now I have attempted to describe a general rule, they who find it defective would be pleased to make this more perfect by adding their own symbol; which is much easier than to erect that building, which needs but some addition to make it useful to all its purposes and intentions. But if any man, like a bird sitting upon a tree, shall foul the fruit and dishonour it, that it may be unfit for food, I shall be sorrowful for him that does so, and troubled, that the good which I intended to every one, should be lost to any one. But I shall have the prophet's¹ comfort, if I have done my duty in righteousness and humility: "Though I labour in vain, and spend my strength for nought, yet surely my judgment is with the Lord, and my work is with my God."

I know not whether I shall live to add matter to this form, that is, to write a particular explication of all the precepts of christian religion; which will be a full design of all special cases and questions of conscience measurable by this general rule. If I do not, I hope God will excite some other to do it; but whoever does it, he will do it with so much the more profit, by how much he does dispute the less; and I remember that Socrates and Sozomen tell, that Ælius the heretic was counted an atheist "propter cristicum loquendi et disputandi modum," because he taught no part of religion, but he mined it into questions and chopped it into Aristotle's logic. The simple and rational way of teaching God's commandments, as it is most easy, so it is most useful; and all the cases that will occur, will the most easily be answered by him, that considers and tells in what cases they bind, and in what they bind not: which is the duty of him that explicates, and may be delivered by way of plain rule and easy commentary.

But this I shall advertise; that the preachers may retrench infinite numbers of cases of conscience, if they will more earnestly preach and exhort to simplicity and love; for the want of these is the great multiplier of cases. Men do not serve God with honesty and heartiness, and they do not love him greatly; but stand upon terms with him, and study how much is lawful, how far they may go, and which is their utmost step of lawful, being afraid to do more for God and for their souls than is simply and indispensably necessary; and oftentimes they tie religion and their own lusts together, and the one entangles the other, and both are made less discernible, and less practicable. But the good man understands the things of God; not only because God's Spirit, by secret immissions of light, does properly instruct him; but because he hath a way of determining his cases of conscience which will never fail him. For if the question be put to him whether it be fit for him to give a shilling to the poor; he answers that it is not only fit, but necessary to do so much at least, and to make it sure, he will give two: and in matter of duty he takes to himself the greater share; in privileges and divisions of right, he is content with the least; and in questions of priority and dignity he always prevails by cession, and ever is superior by sitting lowest, and gets his will, first by choosing what God wills, and then what his neighbour imposes or desires. But when men have no love to God, and desire but just to save their souls, and weigh grains and scruples, and give to God no more than they must needs, they shall multiply cases of consciences to a number which no books will contain, and to a difficulty that no learning can answer.

The multiplication also of laws and ceremonies of religion does exceedingly multiply questions of practice; and there were among the Jews, by reason of their numerous rites, many more than there were at first among the christians. For we find the apostles only exhorting to humility, to piety towards parents, to obedience to magistrates, to charity and justice; and the christians who meant well understood well, and needed no books of conscience but the rule and the commandment. But when error crept in, truth became difficult and hard to be understood: and when the rituals of the church and her laws became numerous, then religion was hard to be practised: and when men set up new interests, then the laws of conscience were so many, that as the laws of the old Romans,

— verba minantia fixo

which at first were nailed in a brass plate upon a wall, became at last so numerous and filled so many volumes, that their very compendium made a large digest; so are these too many to be considered, or perfectly to be understood; and therefore either they must be cut off by simplicity and an honest heart, and contempt of the world, and our duty must look for no measures but love and the lines of the easy commandment,—or else we can have no peace and no security. But with these there is not only collateral security, but very often a direct wisdom. Because he that endeavours to keep a good conscience and hath an honest mind, besides that he will inquire after his duty sufficiently, he will be able to tell very much of it himself; for God will assist him, and cause that "his own mind shall tell him more than seven watchmen that sit in a tower;" and if he miss, he is next to an excuse, and God is ready to pardon him: and therefore in what sect of christianity soever any man is engaged, if he have an honest heart, and a good conscience, though he be in darkness, he will find his way out, or grope his way within; he shall be guided, or he shall be pardoned; God will pity him, and find some way for his remedy; and if it be necessary, will bring him out.

But however it comes to pass, yet now that the inquiries of conscience are so extremely numerous, men may be pleased to observe that theology is not every man's trade; and that it requires more wisdom and ability to take care of souls, than those men, who now-a-days run under the formidable burden of the preacher's office, can bring from the places of their education and first employment. Which thing I do not observe, that by it I might bring reputation to the office of the clergy; for God is their portion and lot, and as he hath given them work enough, so he hath given them honour enough, though the world despise them: but I speak it for their sakes who do what they ought not, and undertake what they cannot perform; and consequently do more hurt to themselves and others than possibly they imagine; which it were better they should amend, than be put to answer for it before him, who loves souls better than he loved his life, and therefore would not intrust them to the conduct of such persons, who have need to be taught the plain things of salvation, and learn to do justice and charity, and the proper things of a holy religion.

Concerning myself I shall make no request to my reader, but that he will charitably believe I mean well, and have done my best. If any man be troubled that he hath expected this nothing so long; I cannot make him other answer, but that I am afraid it is now too soon: and I bless God that I had abilities of health and leisure now at last to finish it: but I should have been much longer, if God had not, by the piety of one of his servants, provided for me a comfortable retirement and opportunity of leisure: which if I have improved to God's glory, or to the comfort and institution of any one, he and I both have our ends, and God will have his glory; and that is a good conclusion, and to that I humbly dedicate my book.

BOOK I.

OF CONSCIENCE,

THE KINDS OF IT, AND THE GENERAL RULES OF CONDUCTING THEM.

CHAPTER I.

THE RULE OF CONSCIENCE IN GENERAL.

RULE I.

Conscience is the Mind of a Man governed by a Rule, and measured by the Proportions of Good and Evil, in Order to Practice; viz. to conduct all our Relations, and all our Intercourse, between God, our Neighbours, and ourselves: that is, in all moral Actions.

1. God governs the world by several attributes and emanations from himself. The nature of things is supported by his power, the events of things are ordered by his providence, and the actions of reasonable creatures are governed by laws, and these laws are put into a man's soul or mind as into a treasury or repository: some in his very nature, some by after-actions, by education and positive sanction, by learning and custom; so that it was well said of St. Bernard;^a "Conscientia candor est lucis æternæ, et speculum sine maculâ Dei Majestatis, et imago bonitatis illius:" "Conscience is the brightness and splendour of the eternal light, a spotless mirror of the Divine Majesty, and the image of the goodness of God." It is higher which Tatianus said of conscience; Μόρον εἶναι συνείδησιν Θεόν, "Conscience is God unto us;" which saying he had from Menander, Βροτοῖς ἅπασι συνείδησις Θεός, and it had in it this truth, that God, who is every where in several manners, hath the appellative of his own attributes and effects in the several manners of his presence.

Jupiter est quodcumque vides, quocumque moveris.

LUCAN.

2. That providence which governs all the world, is nothing else but God present by his providence: and God is in our hearts by his laws: he rules in us by his substitute, our conscience. God sits there and gives us laws; and as God said to Moses,^b "I have made thee a god to Pharaoh," that is, to give him laws, and to minister in the execution of those laws, and to inflict angry sentences upon him; so hath God done to us. He hath given us conscience to be in God's stead to us, to give us laws, and to exact obedience to those laws, to punish them that prevaricate, and to reward the obedient. And therefore conscience is called οἰκεῖος φύλαξ, ἔνοικος Θεός, ἐπίτοπος δαίμων, "the household guardian," "the domestic god," "the spirit or angel of the place:"

^a Lib. de Interior. Domo.

and when we call God to witness, we only mean, that our conscience is right, and that God and God's vicar, our conscience, knows it. So Lactantius;^c "Meminerit Deum se habere testem, id est, ut ego arbitror, mentem suam, quâ nihil homini dedit Deus ipse divinius." "Let him remember that he hath God for his witness, that is, as I suppose, his mind; than which God hath given to man nothing that is more divine."—In sum, it is the image of God: and as in the mysterious Trinity, we adore the will, memory, and understanding,—and theology contemplates three persons in the analogies, proportions, and correspondences of them; so in this also we see plainly that conscience is that likeness of God, in which he was pleased to make man. For although conscience be primarily founded in the understanding, as it is the lawgiver and dictator: and the rule and dominion of conscience "fundatur in intellectu," "is established in the understanding part;" yet it is also memory, when it accuses or excuses, when it makes joyful and sorrowful; and there is in it some mixture of will, as I shall discourse in the sequel; so that conscience is a result of all, of understanding, will, and memory.

3. But these high and great expressions are better in the spirit than in the letter; they have in them something of institution, and something of design, they tell us that conscience is a guard and a guide, a rule and a law set over us by God, and they are spoken to make us afraid to sin against our conscience, because by so doing we sin against God; he having put a double bridle upon us, society and solitude, that is, company and ourselves, or rather, God and man; it being now impossible for us to sin in any circumstances, but we shall have a reprover: ἵνα μήτε μόνῳσις ἐπεγείρη σε πρὸς τὸ μὴ πρέπον, μήτε κοινωνία εὐαποδόγητόν σοι ποιήσῃ τῇν ἁμαρτίαν, as Hierocles¹ said well: that neither company may give countenance or excuse to sin, or solitariness may give confidence or warranty; for as we are ashamed to sin in company, so we ought to fear our conscience, which is God's watchman and intelligencer.

4. To which purpose it was soberly spoken of Tertullian,^d "conscientia optima testis Divinitatis;" "Our conscience is the best argument in the world to prove there is a God:" for conscience is God's deputy; and the inferior must suppose a superior; and God and our conscience are like relative terms, it not being imaginable why some persons in some cases should be amazed and troubled in their minds for their having done a secret turpitude, or cruelty; but that conscience is present with a message from God, and the men feel inward causes of fear, when they are secure from without: that is, they are forced to fear God, when they are safe from men. And it is impossible that any man should be an atheist, if he have any conscience: and for this reason it is there have been so few atheists in the world, because it is so hard for men to lose their conscience wholly.

5. Quest. Some dispute whether it be possible or no for any man to be totally without conscience.

Tertullian's sentence in this article is this: "Potest obumbrari, quia non est Deus: extingui non potest, quia à Deo est:" "It is not God, and therefore may be clouded: but it is from God, and therefore cannot be destroyed."—But I know a man may wholly lose the use of his reason; some men are mad, and some are natural fools, and some are sots, and stupid; such men as these lose their conscience as they lose their reason: and as some madmen may have a fancy that there is no sun, so some fools may say there is no God; and as they can believe that,—so they can lose their conscience, and believe this. But as he that hath reason or his eyes, cannot deny but there is such a thing as the sun, so neither can he that hath conscience, deny there is a God. For as the sun is present by his light which we see daily, so is God by our conscience which we feel continually: we feel one as certainly as the other.

6. (1.) But it is to be observed, that conscience is sometimes taken for the practical intellective faculty; so we say, The law of nature, and the fear of God, are written in the conscience of every man.

(2.) Sometimes it is taken for the habitual persuasion and belief of the principles written there; so we say, He is a good man, and makes conscience of his ways. And thus we also say, and it is true, that a wicked person is of a profligate and "lost" conscience;" he "hath no conscience" in him. That is, he hath lost the habit, or that usual persuasion and recourse to conscience, by which good men govern their actions.

(3.) Or the word conscience is used effectively, for any single operation and action of conscience: so we speak of particulars, "I make a conscience of taking up arms in this cause." Of the first and last acceptance of the word "conscience" there is no doubt; for the last may, and the first can never, be lost: but for the second, it may be lost more or less, as any other habit can: though this with more difficulty than any thing else, because it is founded so immediately in nature, and is so exercised in all the actions and intercourses of our life, and is so assisted by the grace of God, that it is next to impossible to lose the habit entirely; and that faculty that shall to eternal ages do the offices which are the last, and such as suppose some preceding actions, I mean, to torment and afflict them for not having obeyed the former acts of dictate and command, cannot be supposed to die in the principle, when it shall be eternal in the emanation; for the worm shall never die.

For, that men do things against their conscience, is no otherwise than as they do things against their reason; but a man may as well cease to be a man, as to be wholly without conscience. For the drunkard will be sober, and his conscience will be awake next morning: this is a perpetual pulse, and though it may be interrupted, yet if the man be alive, it will beat before he dies; and so long as we believe a God, so long our conscience will at least teach us, if it does not also smite us: but as God sometimes lets a man go on in sin and does not punish him, so does conscience; but in this case, unless the man be smitten and awakened before he dies, both God and the conscience reserve their wrath to be inflicted in hell. It is one and the same thing, God's wrath, and an evil guilty conscience; for by the same hand by which God gives his law, by the same he punishes them that transgress the law. God gave the old law by the ministry of angels; and when the people broke it, "he sent evil angels among them;"^e now God gives us a law in our consciences, and there he hath established the penalty; this is the "worm that never dies;" let it be trod upon never so much here, it will turn again. It cannot die here, and it shall be alive for ever.

^c Lib. 6. de Vero Cultu. cap. 21.

^d Lib. de Testimon. Animæ.

But by explicating the parts of the rule, we shall the best understand the nature, use, and offices of conscience.

Conscience is the Mind of a Man.

7. When God sent the blessed Jesus into the world to perfect all righteousness, and to teach the world all his Father's will, it was said, and done, "I will give my laws in your hearts, and in your minds will I write them;"^f that is, "you shall be governed by the law of natural and essential equity and reason, by that law which is put into every man's nature: and besides this, whatsoever else shall be superinduced, shall be written in your minds by the Spirit, who shall write all the laws of christianity in the tables of your consciences. He shall make you to understand them, to perceive their relish, to remember them because you love them, and because you need them, and cannot be happy without them: he shall call them to your mind, and inspire new arguments and inducements to their observation, and make it all as natural to us, as what we were born with."

8. Our mind being thus furnished with a holy rule, and conducted by a Divine guide, is called "conscience;" and is the same thing which in Scripture is sometimes called "the heart;" there being in the Hebrew tongue no proper word for conscience, but instead of it they use the word לֵב ^{לֵב} "the heart;"^g "Oftentimes also thine own heart knoweth," that is, thy conscience knoweth, "that thou thyself hast cursed others," so in the New Testament; "Beloved, if our hearts condemn us not, then have we peace towards God,"^h viz. if in our own consciences we are not condemned. Sometimes it is called "spirit,"ⁱ the third ingredient of the constitution of a christian; the spirit, distinct from soul and body. For as our body shall be spiritual in the resurrection, therefore because all its offices shall entirely minister to the spirit, and converse with spirits, so may that part of the soul,—which is wholly furnished, taught, and conducted by the spirit of grace, and whose work it is wholly to serve the spirit,—by a just proportion of reason be called the spirit. This is that which is affirmed by St. Paul; "The word of God is sharper than a two-edged sword, dividing the soul and the spirit;"^k that is, the soul is the spirit separated by the word of God, instructed by it, and, by relation to it, is called the spirit. And this is the sense of Origen;^l "Testimonio sane conscientiae uti apostolus dicit eos, qui descriptam continent in cordibus legem," &c. "The apostle says, that they use the testimony of conscience, who have the law written in their hearts. Hence it is necessary to inquire what that is which the apostle calls conscience, whether it be any other substance than the heart or soul. For of this it is other where said that it reprehends, but is not reprehended, and that it judges a man, but itself is judged of no man: as John saith, 'If our conscience condemn us not, then have we confidence towards God.' And again, St. Paul himself saith in another place, 'Our glorying is this, even the testimony of our conscience;' because therefore I see so great a liberty of it, that in good things it is always glad and rejoices, but in evil things it is not reproved, but reproves and corrects the soul itself to which it does adhere; I do suppose that this is the very spirit, which by the apostle is said to be with the soul, as a pedagogue and social governor, that it may admonish the soul of better things, and chastise her for her faults, and reprove her: because, 'no man knows the things of a man but the spirit of a man which is in him;' and that is the spirit of our conscience, concerning which, he saith, 'that spirit gives testimony to our spirit.'—So far Origen.

9. Thus, conscience is the mind, and God "writing his laws in our minds," is, informing our conscience, and furnishing it with laws, and rules, and measures, and it is called by St. Paul, νόμος τοῦ νοῦς, "the law of the mind;"^m and though it is once made a distinct thing from the mind, (as in those words,ⁿ "their minds and consciences are defiled,") yet it happens in this word as in divers others, that it is sometimes taken largely, sometimes specifically and more determinately: the mind is all the whole understanding part, it is the memory; so Peter "called to mind" the word that Jesus spake,^o that is, he remembered it. It is the signification or meaning, the purpose or resolution; "No man knoweth the mind of the spirit, but the spirit."^p It is the discursive or reasoning part; "Mary cast in her mind what manner of salutation this should be."^q It is the assenting and determining part; "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind:"^r and it is also taken for conscience, or that treasure of rules which are in order to practice. And therefore, when St. Paul intended to express the anger of God punishing evil men with evil consciences and false persuasions, in order to criminal actions, and evil worshippings, he said, "God gave them over, εἰς νοῦν ἀδόκιμον, to a reprobate mind,"^s that is, to a conscience evil persuaded, furnished with false practical principles; but the return to holiness, and the improvement of a holy conscience, is called "a being renewed in the spirit of our mind,"^t ἀνακαίνωσις τοῦ νοῦς, "the renovation of the mind."^u

10. Now there are two ways by which God reigns in the mind of a man; 1. Faith; and, 2. Conscience. Faith contains all the treasures of Divine knowledge and speculation. Conscience is the treasury of Divine commandments and rules in practical things. Faith tells us why; conscience tells us what we are to do. Faith is the measure of our persuasions; conscience is the measure of our actions. And as faith is a gift of God, so is conscience; that is, as the understanding of a man is taught by the Spirit of God in Scripture, what to believe, how to distinguish truth from errors; so is the conscience instructed to distinguish good and evil, how to please God, how to do justice and charity to our neighbour, and how to treat ourselves; so that when the revelations of Christ and the commandments of God are fully recorded in our minds, then we are "perfectly instructed to every good work."

Governed by a Rule.

11. St. Bernard^x comparing the conscience to a house, says it stands upon seven pillars. 1. Good will. 2. Memory of God's benefits. 3. A clean heart. 4. A free spirit. 5. A right soul. 6. A devout mind. 7. An enlightened reason. These indeed are, some of them, the fruits and effects, some of them are the annexes and appendages, of a good conscience, but not the foundations or pillars upon which conscience is built. For as for

1. Good Will,—

12. Conscience relies not at all upon the will directly. For though a conscience is good or bad, pure or impure; and so the doctors of mystic theology divide and handle it; yet a conscience is not made so by the will, formally, but by the understanding. For that is a good conscience, which is rightly taught in the word of life; that is impure and defiled, which hath entertained evil and ungodly principles; such is theirs, who follow false lights, evil teachers, men of corrupt minds. For the conscience is a judge and a guide, a monitor and a witness, which are the offices of the knowing, not of the choosing faculty. "Spiritum, correctorem, et pædagogum animæ," so Origen^y calls it; "the instructor of the soul, the spirit, the corrector."—"Naturale judicatorium," or "naturalis vis judicandi," so St. Basil; "the natural power of judging, or nature's judgment-seat."—"Lucem intellectus nostri," so Damascen calls it; "the light of our understanding." The conscience does accuse or excuse a man before God, which the will cannot. If it could, we should all stand upright at doomsday, or at least those would be acquitted, who fain would do well, but miss, who do the things they love not, and love those they do not; that is, "they who strive to enter in, but shall not be able." But to accuse or excuse is the office of a faculty which can neither will nor choose, that is, of the conscience, which is properly a record, a book, and a judgment-seat.

13. But I said, conscience relies not upon the will directly; yet it cannot be denied, but the will hath force upon the conscience collaterally and indirectly. For the evil will perverts the understanding, and makes it believe false principles: "deceiving and being deceived" is the lot of false prophets; and they that are "given over to believe a lie," will live in a lie, and do actions relative to that false doctrine, which evil manners first persuaded and introduced. For although it cannot be, that heretics should sin in the article against the actual light of their consciences, because he that wittingly and willingly sins against a known truth, is not properly a heretic but a blasphemer, and sins against the Holy Ghost; and he that sees a heretic run to the stake or to the gallows, or the Donatist kill himself, or the Circumcellian break his own neck, with as much confidence to bear witness to his heresy, as any of the blessed martyrs to give testimony to christianity itself, cannot but think he heartily believes what so willingly he dies for; yet either heretics do sin voluntarily, and so distinguish from simple errors; or else they are the same thing, and either every simple error is damnable, or no heresy. It must therefore be observed, that

14. The will of man is the cause of its actions either mediately or immediately. Some are the next products of our will; such are pride, ambition, prejudice, and these blind the understanding, and make an evil and a corrupted conscience, making it an incompetent judge of truth and error, good and evil. So that the corruption of conscience in a heretic is voluntary in the principle, but miserable and involuntary in the product; it may proceed from the will efficiently, but it is formally a depravation of the understanding.

15. And therefore our wills also must be humble, and apt, and desirous to learn, and willing to obey. "Obedite et intelligetis;" By humility and obedience we shall be best instructed. Not that by this means the conscience shall receive direct aids, but because by this means it will be left in its own aptnesses and dispositions, and when it is not hindered, the word of God will enter and dwell upon the conscience. And in this sense it is that some say that "Conscience is the inclination and propension of the will corresponding to practical knowledge." Will and conscience are like the "cognati sensus," the touch and the taste; or the teeth and the ears, affected and assisted by some common objects, whose effect is united in matter and some real events, and distinguished by their formalities, or metaphysical beings.

2. Memory of God's Benefits,

16. Is indeed a good engagement to make us dutiful, and so may incline the will; but it hath no other force upon the conscience but that it reminds us of a special obligation to thankfulness, which is a new and proper tie of duty: but it works only by a principle that is already in the conscience, viz. that we are specially obliged to our gracious Lord; and the obedience that is due to God as our Lord, doubles upon us by love and zeal, when we remember him to be our bountiful Patron, and our gracious Father.

^x De Interior. Domo, cap. 7.

^y Ubi supra. In Psal. xlviii.

3. A clean Heart,

17. May be an effect and emanation from a holy conscience; but conscience in itself may be either good or bad, or it may be good when the heart is not clean, as it is in all the worst men who actually sin against conscience, doing that which conscience forbids them. In these men the principles are holy, the instruction perfect, the law remaining, the persuasions uncanceled; but against all this torrent, there is a whirlwind of passions, and filthy resolutions, and wilfulness, which corrupt the heart, while as yet the head is uncorrupted in the direct rules of conscience. But yet sometimes a clean conscience and a clean heart are the same; and a good conscience is taken for holiness: so St. Paul^z uses the word, "holding faith and a good conscience, which some having put away have made shipwreck;" ὅτι τὴν θεόθεν ἤκουσαν συνείδησιν ἀπιστίᾳ κατεμίαναν,—so Clemens Alexandrinus explicates the place, "they have by infidelity polluted their divine and holy conscience:" but St. Paul seems to argue otherwise, and that they, laying aside a good conscience, fell into infidelity: their hearts and conscience were first corrupted, and then they turned heretics. But this sense of a good conscience is that, which in mystic divinity is more properly handled, in which sense also it is sometimes used in law. "Idem est conscientia quod vir bonus intrinsece," said Ungarellus^a out of Baldus;^b and from thence Aretine^c gathered this conclusion, that "if any thing be committed to the conscience of any one, they must stand to his determination, "et ab eâ appellari non potest;" "there lies no appeal," "Quia vir bonus, pro quo sumitur conscientia, non potest mentiri et falsum dicere vel judicare;" "A good man, for whom the word conscience is used, cannot lie, or give a false judgment or testimony." Of this sort of conscience it is said by Ben Sirach,^d "Bonam substantiam habet, cui non est peccatum in conscientia:" "It is a man's wealth to have no sin in our conscience."—But in our present and future discourses, the word conscience is understood in the philosophical sense, not in the mystical, that is, not for the conscience as it is invested with the accidents of good or bad, but as it abstracts from both, but is capable of either.

4. A free Spirit,

18. Is the blessing and effect of an obedient will to a well-instructed conscience, and more properly and peculiarly to the grace of chastity, to honesty and simplicity; a slavish, timorous, a childish and trifling spirit, being the punishment inflicted upon David, before he repented of his fact with Bathsheba. But there is also a freedom which is properly the privilege, or the affection of conscience, and is of great usefulness to all its nobler operations; and that is, a being clear from prejudice and prepossession, a pursuing of truths with holy purposes, and inquiring after them with a single eye, not infected with any sickness or unreasonableness. This is the same thing with that which he distinctly calls, 5. "a right soul." To this is appendant also, that the conscience cannot be constrained, it is of itself "a free spirit," and is subject to no commands, but those of reason and religion. God only is the Lord of our conscience, and the conscience is not to subject itself any more to the empire of sin, to the law of Moses, to a servile spirit, but to the laws of God alone, and the obedience of Jesus, willingly, cheerfully, and in all instances, whether the commandment be conveyed by the Holy Jesus, or by his vicegerents. But of this I shall afterwards give particular accounts.

6. A devout Mind,

19. May procure more light to the conscience, and assistances from the Spirit of wisdom, in cases of difficulty, and is a good remedy against a doubting and a scrupulous conscience; but this is but indirect, and by the intermission of other more immediate and proper intercourses.

But the last is perfectly the foundation of conscience.

7. An enlightened Reason.

20. To which if we add what St. Bernard before calls a "right soul," that is, an honest heart, full of simplicity and hearty attention, and ready assent, we have all that by which the conscience is informed and reformed, instructed and preserved, in its just measures, strengths, and relations. For the rule of conscience is all that notice of things and rules, by which God would have good and evil to be measured, that is, the will of God communicated to us by any means, by reason, and by enlightening, that is, natural and instructed. So that conscience is νοῦς φυσικὸς, and θεοδιδάκτος, it is principled by creation, and it is instructed or illuminated in the regeneration. For God being the fountain of all good, and good being nothing but a conformity to him or to his will, what measures he makes, are to limit us. No man can make measures of good and evil, any more than he can make the good itself. Men sometimes give the instance in which the good is measured; but the measure itself is the will of God. For therefore it is good to obey human laws, because it is God's will we should; and although the man makes the law to which we are to give obedience, yet that is not the rule. The rule is the commandment of God, for by it obedience is made a duty.

Measured by the Proportions of Good and Evil.

21. That is, of that which God hath declared to be good or evil respectively, the conscience is to be informed. God hath taken care that his laws shall be published to all his subjects, he hath written them where they must needs read them, not in tables of stone or phylacteries on the forehead, but in a secret table; the conscience or mind of a man is the φυλακτήριον, the preserver of the court-rolls of heaven. But I added this clause to the former of "a rule," because the express line of God's rule is not the adequate measure of conscience: but there are analogies and proportions, and commensurations of things with things, which make the measure full and equal. For he does not always keep a good conscience who keeps only the words of a Divine law, but the proportions also and the reasons of it, the similitudes and correspondences in like instances, are the measures of conscience.

22. The whole measure and rule of conscience is, the law of God, or God's will, signified to us by nature, or revelation; and by the several manners and times and parts of its communication it hath obtained several names: the law of nature,—the consent of nations,—right reason,—the decalogue,—the sermon of Christ,—the canons of the apostles,—the laws ecclesiastical and civil of princes and governors,—fame, or the public reputation of things, expressed by proverbs and other instances and measures of public honesty. This is Κανὼν τοῦ καλοῦ, τὸ γ' αἰσχρὸν μαζών.

So Euripides calls it, all the rule that teaches us good or evil. These being the full measures of right and wrong, of lawful and unlawful, will be the rule of conscience, and the subject of the present books.

In order to Practice.

23. In this, conscience differs from knowledge, which is in order to speculation, and ineffective notices. And it differs from faith, because although faith is also in order to practice, yet not directly and immediately: it is a collection of propositions, the belief of which makes it necessary to live well, and reasonable, and chosen. But before the propositions of faith pass into action, they must be transmitted through another principle, and that is conscience. That Jesus Christ is the Son of God, and our Lord, and our Master, is a proposition of faith, and from thence, if we pass on to practice, we first take in another proposition; "If he be our Lord, where is his fear?"—and this is a sentence, or virtual proposition, of conscience. And from hence we may understand the full meaning of the word "conscience." Συνείδησις, and "conscientia," and so our English word conscience, have in them science or knowledge: the seat of it is the understanding, the act of it is knowing, but there must be a knowing of more together.

24. Hugo de St. Victore says, that "conscientia est cordis scientia," "conscience is the knowledge of the heart." It is so, but certainly this was not the ἔνθυμον and "original" of the word. But there is truth in the following period. "Cor nescit et alia. Quando autem se nescit, appellatur conscientia; quando, præter se, alia nescit, appellatur scientia." "knowledge hath for its object any thing without; but when the heart knows itself, then it is conscience."—So it is used in authors sacred and profane. "Nihil mihi conscius sum," saith St. Paul; "I know nothing by myself;"—"ut alios lateas; tute tibi conscius eris:" and

—hic murus athenus esto,
Nil conscire sibi.

So Cicero to Marcus Rutilius uses it; "Cum et mihi conscius essem, quanti te facerem;" "When I myself was conscious to myself, how much I did value thee." But this acception of the word conscience is true, but not full and adequate; for it only signifies conscience as it is a witness, not as a guide. Therefore it is more reasonable which Aquinas and the schoolmen generally use: that conscience is a conjunction of the universal practical law with the particular moral action: and so it is "scientia cum rebus facti," and then it takes in that which is called συντήρησις, or the general "repository" of moral principles or measures of good, and the particular cases as reduced to practice. Such as was the case of St. Peter, when he denied his Lord: he knew that he ought not to have done it, and his conscience being sufficiently taught his duty to his Lord, he also knew that he had done it, and then there followed a remorse, a biting, or gnawing of his spirit, grief, and shame; and a consequent weeping: when all these acts meet together, it is the full process of conscience.

(1.) The συντήρησις or the first act of conscience, St. Jerome calls "scintillam conscientiaë," "the spark" or fire put into the heart of man.

(2.) The συνείδησις, which is specifically called "conscience" of the deed done, is the bringing fuel to this fire.

(3.) And when they are thus laid together, they will either shine or burn, acquit or condemn. But this complication of acts is conscience. The first is science, practical science; but annex the second, or it and the third, and then it is conscience. When David's heart smote him, that is, upon his adultery and murder, his conscience thus discoursed: "Adultery and murder are high violations of the Divine law, they provoke God to anger, without whom I cannot live, whose anger is worse than death." This is practical knowledge, or the principles of conscience; but the following acts made it up into conscience. For he remembered that he had betrayed Uriah and humbled Bathsheba, and then he begs of God for pardon; standing condemned in his own breast, he hopes to be forgiven by God's sentence. But the whole process of conscience is in two practical syllogisms, in which the method is ever this. The συντήρησις or "repository" of practical principles begins, and where that leaves, the conscience or the witness and judge of moral actions begins, like Jacob laying hold upon his elder brother's heel. The first is this:

Whatsoever is injurious ought not to be done:

But to commit adultery is injurious:

Therefore it ought not to be done:

This is the rule of conscience, or the first act of conscience as it is a rule and a guide, and is taken for the συντήρησις, or practical "repository." But when an action is done or about to be done, conscience takes the conclusion of the former syllogism, and applies it to her particular case.

Adultery ought not to be done :

This action I go about, or which I have done, is adultery :

Therefore it ought not to be done, or to have been done.

This is the full proceeding of this court; after which many consequent solemnities and actions do pass, of sentence, and preparatory torments and execution.

25. But this I am to admonish, that although this which I have thus defined, is the proper and full sense of the word "conscience" according to art and proper acceptation, yet in Scripture^e it is used indifferently for an act of conscience, or any of its parts, and does not always signify in its latitude and integrity, but yet it all tends to the same signification; and though the name be given to the faculty, to the habit, to the act, to the object, to the effect, to every emanation from the mind in things practical, yet still it supposes the same thing: viz. that conscience is the guide of all our moral actions; and by giving the name to so many acts and parts and effluxes from it, it warrants the definition of it, when it is united in its own proper and integral constitution.

To conduct all our Relations and Intercourses between God, our Neighbours, and ourselves: that is, in all moral Actions.

26. This the final cause of conscience: and by this it is distinguished from prudence, which is also a practical knowledge, and reduced to particular and circumstantiate actions. But, 1. Prudence consists in the things of the world, or relative to the world; conscience in the things of God, or relating to him. 2. Prudence is about affairs as they are of advantage or disadvantage: conscience is employed about them, as they are honest or dishonest. 3. Prudence regards the circumstances of actions, whether moral or civil: conscience only regards moral actions in their substance or essential proprieties. 4. Prudence intends to do actions dexterously and prosperously; conscience is to conduct them justly and according to the commandment. 5. There are many actions in which prudence is not at all concerned, as being wholly indifferent to this or that for matter of advantage; but there is no action but must pass under the file and censure of conscience; for if we can suppose any action in all its circumstances to be wholly indifferent to good or bad; yet none is so to lawful or unlawful, the very indifferent being therefore lawful because it is indifferent, and therefore to be considered by conscience, either actually or habitually: for in this sense even our natural actions, in their time and place, are also moral; and where they are not primarily moral, yet they come under conscience, as being permitted, and innocent; but wherever they are relative to another person, they put on some degrees of morality, and are of proper cognizance in this court.

Qui didicit, patriæ quid debeat, et quid amicis;
Quo sit amore parens, quo frater amandus et hospes;
Quid sit conscripti, quid judicis officium; quæ
Partes in bellum missi ducis: ille profecto
Reddere personæ scit convenientia cuique.^f

That is the full effect of conscience, to conduct all our relations, all our moral actions.

RULE II.

The Duty and Offices of Conscience are to dictate, and to testify or bear Witness; to accuse or excuse; to loose or bind.

THE first and last are the direct acts and offices of conscience: the other are reflex or consequent actions, but direct offices. The first act, which is

To dictate,

Is that which divines call the συντήρησις, or the "phylactery," the keeper of the records of the laws, and by it we are taught our duty; God having written it in our hearts by nature and by the Spirit, leaves it there, ever placed before the eye of conscience, as St. Bernard calls it, to be read and used for directions in all cases of dispute of question or action: this is that which St. Paul^g calls "the work of the law written in our hearts;" and therefore it is, that to sin against our conscience is so totally inexcusable, and according to the degree of that violence which is done against the conscience, puts on degrees. For conscience dictates whatsoever it is persuaded of, and will not suffer a man to do otherwise than it suggests and tells us:

Αἱ γὰρ πῶς αὐτόν με μόνος καὶ θυμὸς ἀνείη

said Achilles of Hector when he was violently angry with him: "I would my conscience would give me leave to eat thy very flesh."

2. Its universal dictates are ever the most certain, and those are the first principles of justice and religion; and whatsoever else can be infallibly and immediately inferred from thence, are her dictates also, but not primely and directly, but transmitted by the hands of reason. The same reason also there is in clear revelation. For whatsoever is put into the conscience immediately by God, is placed there to the same purpose, and with the same efficiency and persuasion, as is all that which is natural. And the conscience properly dictates nothing else, but prime natural reason, and immediate revelation; whatsoever comes after these two, is reached forth to us by two hands, one whereof alone is ministered by conscience. The reason is this: because all that law by which God governs us, is written in our hearts, put there by God immediately, that is, antecedently to all our actions; because it is that by which all our actions are to be guided, even our discouragements and arguings are to be guided by conscience, if the argument be moral: now the ways by which God speaks to us immediately, are only nature and the Spirit: nature is that principle which taught all men from the beginning until now; all that prime practical reason which is perfective of human nature, and in which all mankind agrees. Either the perfections, or the renovations, or the superadditions to this are taught us by the Holy Spirit, and all this being written in the conscience by the finger of God, is brought forth upon all occasions of action: and whatsoever is done against any thing so placed, is directly and violently against the conscience: but when from thence reason spins a longer thread, and draws it out from the clue of natural principles or express revelation, that also returns upon the conscience, and is placed there as light upon a wall, but not as the stones that are there: but yet whatever is done against that light, is also against conscience, but not so as the other. Just as it is in nature and accident. To eat poison and filthiness is against every man's health and stomach; but if by an ἰδιοσυγκρασία, "a propriety of temper," or an evil habit, or accidental inordination, wine or fish makes a man sick, then these are against his nature too, but not so as poison is, or stones. Whatever comes in the conscience primarily, or consequently, right or wrong, is brought forth upon occasion of action, and is part of her dictate: but as a man speaks some things of his own knowledge, some things by hearsay; so does conscience; some things she tells from God and herself, some things from reason and herself, or other accidental notices: those and these do integrate and complete her sermons, but they have several influence and obligation according to their proper efficiency. But of this I shall give full accounts in the second book.

To testify.

3. Conscience bears witness of our actions; so St. Paul,^h "their conscience bearing witness;" and in this sense, conscience is a practical memory. For as the practical knowledge or notices subjected in the understanding, makes the understanding to be conscience; so the actions of our life, recorded in the memory and brought forth to practical judgments, change the memory also into conscience. Τοῦ γὰρ γένους τῶν ἀνθρώπων ταύτῃ διαφέροντος τῶν ἄλλων ζώων, ἥ μόνους αὐτοῖς μέτεστι νοῦ καὶ λογισμοῦ· φανερόν, ὥς οὐκ ἀνείκος παρατρέχειν αὐτοὺς τὴν προειρημένην διαφορὰν, καθάπερ ἐπὶ τῶν ἄλλων ζώων· ἀλλ' ἐπισημαίνεσθαι τὰ γινόμενα, καὶ δυσαρσεῖσθαι τοῖς παροῦσι. "Man differing from brute beasts by the use of reason, it is not likely he should be a stranger to his own actions as the beasts are: but that the evil which is done, should be recalled to their mind with the signification of some displeasure." So Polybiusⁱ discourses of the reason and the manner of conscience.

4. Every knowing faculty is the seat of conscience; and the same faculty, when it is furnished with speculative notions, retains its natural and proper name of understanding, or memory; but as the same is instructed with notices in order to judgments practical, so it takes the christian name of conscience. The volitive or choosing faculty cannot, but the intellectual may. And this is that book, which at doomsday shall be brought forth and laid open to all the world. The memory, changed into conscience, preserves the notices of some things, and shall be reminded of others, and shall do that work entirely and perfectly, which now it does imperfectly and by parts, according to the words of St. Paul,^k "then shall we know as we are known;" that is, as God knows us now, so then shall we see and know ourselves. "Nullum theatrum virtuti conscientia majus,"^l shall then be highly verified. Our conscience will be the great scene or theatre, upon which shall be represented all our actions good and bad. It is God's book, the book of life or death. According to the words of St. Bernard,^m "Ex his, quæ scripta erunt in libris nostris, judicabimur; et ideo scribi debent secundum exemplar libri vitæ, et si sic scripti non sunt, saltem corrigendi sunt." "We shall be judged by that which is written in our own books" (the books of conscience); "and therefore they ought to be written according to the copy of the book of life; and if they be not so written, yet they ought to be so corrected."

5. Consequently to these the conscience does

Accuse or Excuse.

So St. Paulⁿ joins them as consequent to the former; "their conscience bearing witness, and their thoughts in the mean time accusing or excusing one another."—"Si optimorum consiliorum atque factorum testis in omni vitâ nobis conscientia fuerit, sine ullo metu summâ cum honestate vivemus:"^o "If our conscience be the witness that in our life we do good deeds, and follow sober counsels, we shall live in great honesty and without fear."—Δικαστὴν Θεὸς ἐπέστησε τὸν δικαιοτάτον ἅμα καὶ οἰκειότατον, τὸ συνειδὸς αὐτὸ, καὶ τὸν ὀρθὸν λόγον, said Hierocles; "God hath constituted a most righteous and domestic judge, the conscience and right reason:" Καὶ αὐτὸν ἑαυτῷ, ὃν πάντων μάλιστα αἰδεῖσθαι προεπαιδεύθημεν, "Every man ought most of all to fear himself, because it is impossible but we should know what we have done amiss; and it concerns us also to make righteous judgment, for we cannot escape ourselves."—Μηδέποτε μηδὲν αἰσχρὸν ποιήσας ἔλπιζε λήσειν· καὶ γὰρ ἂν τοὺς ἄλλους λάθῃς, σεαυτῷ γε συνειδήσεις, said Isocrates: "Etsi à cæteris silentium est, tamen ipse sibimet conscius est posse se merito increpari," so Apuleius renders it. "Though others hold their peace, yet there is one within that will not."

Nec facile est placidam ac pacatam degere vitam,

It is hard to be concealed from God and man too, and although we think ourselves safe for a while, yet we have something within that tells us, οὐκ ἔστι λάθρα τι ποιοῦντα, he that does any thing is espied, and cannot do it privately. "Quicum in tenebris?" was the old proverb: "Who was with you in the dark?"—And therefore it was that Epicurus affirmed it to be impossible for a man to be concealed always. Upon the mistake of which he was accused by Plutarch and others, to have supposed it lawful to do any injustice secretly; whereas his design was to obstruct that gate of iniquity, and to make men believe that even that sin which was committed most secretly, would some time or other be discovered and brought to punishment; all which is to be done by the extra-regular events of providence, and the certain accusations and discoveries of conscience.

6. For conscience is the looking-glass of the soul, so it was called by Periphanes in Plautus;^p

Non oris causâ modo homines æquum fuit
Sibi habere speculum, ubi os contemplarent suum;
Sed, qui perspicere possent cor, sapientiæ,
Igitur perspicere ut possint cordis copiam.
Ubi id inspexissent, cogitarent postea,
Vitam ut vixissent olim in adolescentiâ.

And a man looking into his conscience, instructed with the word of God, its proper rule, is by St. James^q compared to "a man beholding his natural face in a glass;" and that the apostle describes conscience in that similitude, is to be gathered from the word ἐμφυτον λόγον, "verbum insitum," "the ingrafted word," the word of God written in our hearts,—which whoso looks on, and compares his actions with his rule, may see what he is: but he that neglects this word and follows not this rule, did indeed see his face, but hath forgotten what manner of man he was, that is, what he was framed in the works of the new creation, when he was newly formed and "created unto righteousness and true holiness."

7. This accusation and watchfulness, and vocal, clamorous guards of conscience, are in perpetual attendance, and though they may sleep, yet they are quickly awakened, and make the evil man restless. Τοὺς ἀδικοῦντας καὶ παρανομοῦντας ἀθλίως καὶ περιφόβως ζῆν τὸν πάντα χρόνον, ὅτι κἂν λαθεῖν δύνανται, πίστιν περὶ τοῦ λαθεῖν λαβεῖν ἀδύνατόν ἐστι· ὁθεν ὁ τοῦ μέλλοντος αἰὲ φόβος ἐγκείμενος οὐκ ἔῃ χαίρειν, οὔτε θάρρῆν ἐπὶ τοῖς παροῦσι, said Epicurus; which is very well rendered by Seneca, "Ideo non prodest latere latentibus, quia latendi etiam si felicitatem habent, fiduciam non habent:" "They that live unjustly, always live miserably and fearfully; because although their crime be secret, yet they cannot be confident that it shall be so:" meaning, that because their conscience does accuse them, they perceive they are discovered, and pervious to an eye, which what effect it will have in the publication of the crime here and hereafter, is not matter of knowledge, but cannot choose but be matter of fear for ever.

If any chance makes the fact private, yet no providence or watchfulness can give security, because within there dwells a principle of fear that can never die, till repentance kills it. And therefore Chilon in Laertius said upon this account, that "loss is rather to be chosen than filthy gain; because that loss brings sorrow but once, but injustice brings a perpetual fear and pain."

The wife that lies by his side, knows not at what the guilty man looks pale, but something that is within the bosom knows; and no pompousness of condition can secure the man, and no witty cruelty can equal the torment. For that also, although it be not directly the office of conscience, yet it is the act and effect of conscience; when itself is injured, it will never let any thing else be quiet.

To loose or bind,

8. Is the reflex act of conscience. Upon viewing the records, or the συντήρησις, the legislative part of conscience, it binds to duty; upon viewing the act, it binds to punishment, or consigns to comfort; and in both regards it is called by Origen, "affectuum corrector, atque animæ pædagogus," "the corrector of the affections, and the teacher of the soul."—Which kind of similitude Epictetus, in Stobæus, followed also; "Parentes pueros nos pædago tradiderunt, qui ubique observaret ne læderemur; Deus autem clam viros insitæ conscientie custodiendos tradidit; quæ quidem custodia nequam contemnenda est;" "As our parents have delivered us to a guardian, who did watch lest we did or suffered mischief; so hath God committed us to the custody of our conscience that is planted within us: and this custody is at no hand to be neglected."

9. The binding to duty is so an effect of conscience, that it cannot be separated from it; but the binding to punishment is an act of conscience also as it is a judge, and is intended to affright a sinner, and to punish him: but it is such a punishment as is the beginning of hell-torments, and unless the wound be cured, will never end till eternity itself shall go into a grave.

His disease was nothing but an evil conscience; he had done vile things, and had an amazed spirit that distracted him, and so he died. "Curas ultrices" Virgil calls the wounds of an evil conscience, "revengeing cares."—"Nihil est miserius quam animus hominis conscius," said he in the comedy;^s "Nothing is more miserable than an evil conscience:" and the being pained with it is called τῷ συνειδότηι ἀπάγχεσθαι, "to be choked or strangled" with an evil conscience, by St. Chrysostom, who, in his twenty-second homily upon the first epistle to the Corinthians, speaks much and excellently to the same purpose: and there are some that fancy this was the cause of Judas's death; the horrors of his conscience were such, that his spirits were confounded, and restless, and uneasy; and striving to go from their prison, stopped at the gates of emanation, and stifled him. It did that, or as bad; it either choked him, or brought him to a halter, as it hath done many besides him. And although I may truly say, as he did,

Non mihi si linguæ centum ———
Omnia penarum percurrere nomina possem,

No tongue is able to express the evils which are felt by a troubled conscience, or a wounded spirit; yet the heads of them are visible and notorious to all men.

10. (1.) The first is that which Nazianzen calls τὰς ἐν αὐτοῖς τοῖς δεινοῖς ἐξαγορεύσεις, "accusations and vexings of a man when he is in misery;" then when he needs most comfort, he shall by his evil conscience be most disquieted. A sickness awakes a dull sleeping conscience, and when it is awakened it will make that the man shall not sleep. So Antiochus^t when his lieutenant Lysias was beaten by the Jews, he fell sick with grief, and then his conscience upbraided him; "but now" (said he) "I remember the evils that I did at Jerusalem; 'quia invenerunt me mala ista' (so the Latin Bible reads it); 'because these evils now have found me out.'" For when a man is prosperous, it is easy for him to stop the mouth of conscience, to bribe or to abuse it, to fill it with noise, and to divert it with business, to outvie it with temporal gaities, or to be flattered into weak opinions and sentences: but when a man is smitten of God, and divested of all the outsides and hypocrisies of sin, and that conscience is disentangled from its fetters and foolish pretensions, then it speaks its own sense, it ever speaks loudest when the man is poor, or sick, or miserable. This was well explicated by St. Ambrose; "Dum sumus in quâdam delinquendi libidine, nebulis quibusdam conscientię mens obducitur, ne videat eorum, quæ concupiscit, deformitatem; sed cum omnis nebula transierit, gravia tormenta exercentur in quodam male conscii secretario." "A man is sometimes so surprised with the false fires and glarings of temptation, that he cannot see the secret turpitude and deformity. But when the cloud and veil are off, then comes the tormentor from within:"

— acuntque metum mortalibus ægris,
Si quando lethum horrificum morbosque Deum Rex
Molitur, meritas aut bello territat urbes. Æneid. 12.

Then the calamity swells, and conscience increases the trouble, when God sends war, or sickness, or death. It was Saul's case: when he lost that fatal battle in which the ark was taken, he called to the Amalekite, "Sta super me et interfice me," "Fall upon me and slay me;" "Quoniam tenent me angustię," "I am in a great strait."—He was indeed; for his son was slain, and his army routed, and his enemies were round about: but then conscience stepped in, and told him of the evil that he had done in causing fourscore of the Lord's priests to be slain; and therefore Abulensis reads the words thus, "Fall upon me and slay me," "Quoniam tenent me oræ vestimenti sacerdotalis," "I am entangled in the fringes of the priests' garments."—"Videbatur sibi Saul, quod propinquus morti videret sacerdotes Dei accusantes eum in judicio coram Deo:" "He thought he saw the priests of the Lord accusing him before God."—And this hath been an old opinion of the world, that, in the days of their calamity, wicked persons are accused by those whom they have injured. Not much unlike to which is that of Plato, describing the torments of wicked souls: Βοῶσι καὶ καλοῦσιν, οἱ μὲν οὓς ἀπέκτειναν, οἱ δὲ, οὓς ὕβρισαν καλέσαντες ὃ ἱκετεύουσι τοὺς ἡδίκημένους δοῦναι σφισι συγγνώμην, "They roar and cry out; some calling on them whom they killed, some on those they have calumniated; and calling they pray them whom they have injured, to give them pardon." Then every bush is a wild beast, and every shadow is a ghost, and every glow-worm is a dead man's candle, and every lantern is a spirit.

— pallidumque visa

When Nero was distressed, he saw his mother's taper, and grew pale with it.

11. (2.) The second effect is shame, which conscience never fails to inflict secretly, there being a secret turpitude and baseness in sin, which cannot be better expressed than by its opposition and contradiction to conscience. Conscience, when it is right, makes a man bold; "Qui ambulat simpliciter, ambulat confidenter;" "He that walks honestly, walks confidently," because he hath innocence and he hath reason on his side. But he that sins, sins against reason, in which the honour and the nobleness of a man does consist; and therefore shame must needs come in the destitution of them. For as by reason men naturally rule, so when they are fallen from it, unless by some accidental courages they be supported, they fall into the state of slaves and sneaking people. And upon this account it was that Plato said, "Si scirem Deos mihi condonatueros, et homines ignoratueros, adhuc peccare erubescerem propter solam peccati turpitudinem:" "If I were sure God would pardon me, and men would not know my sin, yet I should be ashamed to sin, because of its essential baseness."—The mistresses of our vile affections are so ugly we cannot endure to kiss them but through a veil, either the veil of excuse, or pretence, or darkness; something to hide their ugliness; and yet even these also are so thin that the filthiness and shame are not hid. "Bona conscientia turbam advocat, mala autem in solitudine anxia atque sollicita est," said Seneca. An evil conscience is ashamed of light, and afraid of darkness; and therefore nothing can secure it. But being ashamed before judges, and assemblies, it flies from them into solitudes; and when it is there, the shame is changed into fear, and therefore from thence it runs abroad into societies of merry criminals, and drinking sanctuaries; which is nothing but a shutting the eyes, and hiding the head, while the body is exposed to a more certain danger. It cannot be avoided: it was and is and will eternally be true, "Perjurii poena divina exitium; humana dedecus esto."^u Which St. Paul perfectly renders, "the things whereof ye are now ashamed; the end of these things is death."^x Death is the punishment which God inflicts, and shame is that which comes from man.

12. (3.) There is another effect which cannot be well told by him that feels it, or by him that sees it, what it is; because it is a thing without limit and without order. It is a distraction of mind, indeterminate, divided thoughts, flying every thing, and pursuing nothing. It was the case of Nebuchadnezzar, οἱ διαλογισμοὶ αὐτοῦ διετάρασσον αὐτόν, "his thoughts troubled him." "Varios vultus, disparilesque sensus,"^y like the sophisters who in their pursuit of vain-glory displeased the people, and were hissed from their pulpits; nothing could amaze them more; they were troubled like men of a disturbed conscience. The reason is, they are fallen into an evil condition, which they did not expect; they are abused in their hopes, they are fallen into a sad state of things, but they know not what it is, nor where they are, nor whither it will bear them, nor how to get out of it. This indeed is commonly the first part of the great evil; shame goes along with the sin, in the very acting it, but as soon as it is acted, then begins this confusion; they thought of nothing but pleasure before; but as soon as they have finished, then they begin to taste the wormwood and coloquintida: "perfecto demum scelere, magnitudo ejus intellecta est," said Tacitus.^z While they were doing it, they thought it little, or they thought it none, because their fancy and their passion ruled; but when that is satisfied and burst with a filthy plethora, then they understood how great their sin is, but are distracted in their thoughts, for they understand not how great their calamity shall be.

Occultum quatiente animo tortore flagellum. JUVEN.

the secret tormentor shakes the mind, and dissolves it into indiscrimination and confusion. The man is like one taken in a lie, or surprised in a shameful act of lust, or theft; at first he knows not what to say, or think, or do, and his spirits huddle together, and fain would go somewhere, but they know not whither, and do something, but they know not what.

13. This confusion and first amazement of the conscience in some vile natures, and baser persons, proceeds to impudence, and hardness of face.

—— frontemque à crimine sumunt.

When they are discovered, they rub their foreheads hard, and consider it cannot be worse, and therefore in their way they make the best of it; that is, they will not submit to the judgment of conscience, nor suffer her infliction, but take the fortune of the banditti, or of an outlaw, rather than by the rule of subjects suffer the penalty of the law, and the severity of the judge. But conscience hath no hand in this, and whatsoever of this nature happens, it is in despite of conscience; and if it proceeds upon that method, it goes on to obstinacy, hardness of heart, a resolution never to repent, a hatred of God, and reprobation. For if conscience be permitted to do its work, this confusion, when it comes to be stated, and that the man hath time to consider it, passes on to fear; and that is properly the next effect.

14. (4.) An evil or a guilty conscience is disposed for fear; shame and fear cannot be far asunder:

"Ἐνθα δέος, ἐνταῦθα κ' αἰδώς."—EPICHRM.

Sin makes us ashamed before men, and afraid of God: an evil conscience makes man a coward, timorous as a child in a church-porch at midnight; it makes the strongest men to tremble like the keepers of the house of an old man's tabernacle.

"Ὁ συνιστορῶν αὐτῷ τι, κἄν ἢ φρασύτατος, Ἢ σύνεσις αὐτόν δειλότατον εἶναι ποιεῖ, said Menander. No strength of body, no confidence of spirit, is a defensative against an evil conscience, which will intimidate the courage of the most perfect warrior.

Qui terret, plus iste timet: sors ista tyrannis
Convenit: invadeant claris, fortesque trucidant, Muniti gladiis vivant septique venenis,
Ancipites habeant arces, trepidique minentur.

So Claudian^a describes the state of tyrants and injurious persons; "they do evil and fear worse, they oppress brave men, and are afraid of mean fellows; they are encompassed with swords, and dwell amongst poisons, they have towers with back-doors and many outlets; and they threaten much, but themselves are most afraid." We read of Belshazzar, his knees beat against each other upon the arrest made on him by the hand on the wall, which wrote the sentence of God in a strange character, because he would not read the writing in his conscience. This fear is very great and very lasting, even in this world: and is rarely well described by Lucretius:

Cerberus et Furiae ——

Sed metus in vitâ poenarum pro malefactis
Est insignibus insignis; scelèrisque lucla

Verbera, carnufices, robur, pix, lamina, tedæ;
Quæ tamen et si absunt, et mens sibi conscia factis,
Præmetuens, adhibet stimulos, torretque flagellis.

Which description of the evil and intolerable pains and fears of conscience is exceeded by the author of the Wisdom of Solomon,^b "Indisciplinatæ animæ erraverunt." That is the ground of their misery; "The souls were refractory to discipline, and have erred. They oppress the holy nation."—The effect was, "they became prisoners of darkness, and fettered with the bands of a long night; 'fugitivi perpetuæ providentiæ jacuerunt,' 'they became outlaws from the Divine providence.' And while they supposed to lie hid in their secret sins, they were scattered under a dark veil of forgetfulness; 'paventes horrendè, et cum admiratione nimîâ perturbati,' 'they did fear horribly, and were disturbed with a wonderful amazement.' For neither might the corner that held them keep them from fear, but a sound descending did trouble them; 'et personæ tristes apparentes pavorem illis præstabant,' 'sad apparitions did affright them:' a fire appeared to them very formidable; 'et timore percussi ejus quæ non videbatur facie;' 'they were affrighted with the apprehensions of what they saw not:'" and all the way in that excellent description, there is nothing but fear and affrightment, horrid amazement and confusion; "pleni timore," and "tremebundi peribant," "full of fear, and they perished trembling;" and then follows the philosophy and rational account of all this. "Frequenter enim præoccupant pessima, redarguente conscientia." "When their conscience reproves them, they are possessed with fearful expectations." For wickedness condemned by her own witness is very timorous: "Cum enim sit timida nequitia, dat testimonium condemnata:" "Conscience gives witness and gives sentence: and when wickedness is condemned, it is full of affrightment." For fear is "præsumptionis adjutorium," the allay of confidence and presumption, and the promoter of its own apprehensions, and betrays the succours that reason yields. For indeed in this case, no reason can dispute a man out of his misery, for there is nothing left to comfort the conscience, so long as it is divested of its innocence. The prophet Jeremy^c instances this in the case of Pashur, who oppressed the prophets of the Lord, putting them in prison, and forbidding them to preach in the name of the Lord: "Thy name shall be no more called 'Pashur,' but 'Magor Missabib,' that is 'fear round about;' for I will make thee a terror unto thyself."

15. This fear of its own nature is apt to increase; for indeed it may be infinite.

Nec videt interea, quis terminus esse malorum
Possit, nec quæ sit pœnarum denique finis;
Atque eadem metuit magis, hæc ne in morte gravescant:
Hinc Acherusia fit stultorum denique vita. LUCRET.

He that fears in this case, knows not the greatness and measure of the evil which he fears; it may arrive to infinite, and it may be any thing, and it may be every thing:—and therefore there is,

16. (5.) An appendant perpetuity and restlessness; a man of an evil conscience is never at quiet. "Impietas enim malum infinitum est, quod nunquam extinguere potest," said Philo:^d he is put to so many shifts to excuse his crime before men, and cannot excuse it to God or to himself, and then he is forced to use arts of forgetfulness, that he may not remember his sorrow; he runs to weakness for excuse, and to sin for a comfort, and to the methods and paths of hell for sanctuary, and rolls himself in his uneasy chains of fire, and changes from side to side upon his gridiron, till the flesh drop from the bones on every side. This is the poet's vulture,

Immortale jecur tundens, sæcundaque pœnis
Viscera, rimaturque epulis, habitatque sub alto
Pectore; nec fibris requies datur ulla renatis. VIRG.

It gnaws perpetually, and consumes not, being like the fire of hell, it does never devour, but torments for ever.

17. (6.) This fear and torment, which are inflicted by conscience, do not only increase at our death, but after death is the beginning of hell. For these are the fire of hell; ὁδυνῶμαι ἐν τῇ φλογὶ ταύτῃ, "I am tormented in this flame;" so said Dives, when he was in torments; that is, he had the torments of an evil conscience, for hell itself is not to be opened till the day of judgment; but the sharpest pain is usually expressed by fire, and particularly the troubles of mind are so signified. "Urit animum meum;" "This burns," that is, this exceedingly troubles, "my mind;"—and "Uro hominem" in the comedy, I vex him sufficiently, "I burn him;"—"Loris non ureris," "Thou art not tormented with scourging."

Pœna autem vehemens, et multo sævior illis,
Quos et Cæditius gravis invenit et Rhadamanthus, Nocte dieque suum gestare in pectore testem. JUVEN.

This is a part of hell-fire, the smoke of it ascends night and day; and it is a preparatory to the horrible sentence of doomsday, as the being tormented in prison is, to the day of condemnation and execution. The conscience in the state of separation does accuse perpetually, and with an insupportable amazement fears the revelation of the day of the Lord.

Et cum fateri furia jusserit verum,
Crogente clamet conscientia, scripsi. MARTIAL.

"The fury within will compel him to confess," and then he is prepared for the horrible sentence; as they who upon the rack accuse themselves, and then they are carried to execution. Menippus, in Lucian,^e says that the souls of them that are dead, are accused by the shadows of their bodies. Αὐταὶ ταῖνυν, ἐπειδὴν ἀποθάνωμεν, κατηγοροῦσι τε καὶ καταμαρτυροῦσι, καὶ διελέγχουσι τὰ πεπραγμένα ἡμῶν παρὰ τὸν βίον and these he says are ἀξιόπιστοι, "worthy of belief," because they are always present, and never parted from their bodies; meaning, that a man's conscience, which is inseparable as a shadow, is a strong accuser and a perfect witness; and this will never leave them till it carries them to hell; and then the fear is changed into despair, and indignation, and hatred of God, and eternal blasphemy. This is the full progress of an evil conscience, in its acts of binding.

18. Quest. But if it be inquired by what instrument conscience does thus torment a man, and take vengeance of him for his sins, whether it hath a proper efficiency in itself, and that it gives torment, as it understands, by an exercise of some natural power; or whether it be by an act of God inflicting it, or by opinion and fancy, by being persuaded of some future events which shall be certainly consequent to the sin, or by religion and belief, or lastly by deception and mere illusion, and upon being affrighted with bugbears?—I answer,

19. That it does or may afflict a man by all these. For its nature is to be inquisitive and busy, querulous and complaining; and to do so is as natural to it, as for a man to be grieved when any thing troubles him. But because men have a thousand little arts to stifle the voice of conscience, or at least that themselves may not hear it; God oftentimes awakens a man by a sudden dash of thunder and lightning, and makes the conscience sick and troublesome; just as upon other accidents a man is made sad, or hardened, or impudent, or foolish, or restless: and sometimes every dream, or sad story that the man hath heard, the flying of birds, and the hissing of serpents, or the fall of waters, or the beating of a watch, or the noise of a cricket, or a superstitious tale, is suffered to do the man a mischief and to increase his fear.

Ergo exercentur pœnis, veterumque malorum
Supplicia expendunt.——VIRG.

This the poets and priests expressed by their Adrastea, Nemesis, Minos, Æacus, and Rhadamanth: not that these things were real,

——neque sunt usquam, neque possunt esse, profectò, said one of them; but yet to their pains and fears they gave names, and they put on persons; and a fantastic cause may have a real event, and therefore must come from some further principle; and if an evil man be affrighted with a meteor or a bird, by the chattering of swallows, (like the young Greek in Plutarch,) or by his own shadow, (as Orestes was,) it is no sign that the fear is vain, but that God is the author of conscience,—and will, beyond the powers of nature and the arts of concealment, set up a tribunal, and a gibbet, and a rack, in the court of conscience. And therefore we find this evil threatened by God to fall upon sinners. “They that are left alive of you in the land of your captivity, I will send fainting in their hearts, in the land of their enemy, and the sound of a leaf shall chase them:”^f and again; “The Lord shall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind, and thy life shall hang in doubt before thee, and thou shalt fear day and night, and shalt have no assurance of thy life:”^g and this very fear ends in death itself; it is a mortal fear sometimes; for when the prophet Isaiah^h had told concerning Jerusalem, “Thy slain men are not slain with the sword, nor dead in battle:” to the inquiry of those who ask, How then were they slain? the answer is made by a learned gloss upon the place; “Homines hi expectato adventu hostis, velut transfossi, exanimantur metu:” “They were dead with fear, slain with the affrightments of their own conscience, as if they were transfixed by the spear of their enemies.”—“Quid ergo nos à diis immortalibus divinitus expectemus, nisi irrationibus finem faciamus,” said Q. Metellus in A. Gellius:ⁱ There is no avoiding punishment unless we will avoid sin; since even a shadow as well as substances may become a Nemesis, when it is let loose by God, and conducted by conscience.

^g Deut. xxviii. 65.

20. But the great instrument of bringing this to pass is that certainty of persuasion which is natural in all men, and is taught to all men, and is in the sanction of all laws expressly affirmed by God, that evil shall be to them that do evil;

Θεὸς ἀτίζων τις βροτῶν, δώσει δίκην, ÆSCHYL.

“He that dishonours God, shall not escape punishment:” both in this life, and after this life: for so they reckoned, that adulterers, rebels, and traitors, should be kept in prisons in fearful expectation of horrid pains;

Quique ob adulterium cæsi, quique arma secuti
Impia, nec veriti dominorum fallere dextas, Inclusi pœnam expectant——— VIRG.

all this is our conscience, which, in this kind of actions and events, is nothing but the certain expectation and fear of the Divine vengeance.

21. Quest. But then why is the conscience more afraid in some sins than in others, since in sins of the greatest malignity we find great difference of fear and apprehension, when because they are of extreme malignity, there can be no difference in their demerit?

22. I answer, Although all sins be damnable, yet not only in the several degrees of sin, but in the highest of all there is great difference: partly proceeding from the Divine threatenings, partly from fame and opinion, partly from other causes.

For, (1.) There are some sins which are called “peccata clamantia,” “crying sins;” that is, such which cry aloud for vengeance; such which God not only hath specially threatened with horrid plagues, but such which do seldom escape vengeance in this life, but for their particular mischief are hedged about with thorns, lest by their frequency they become intolerable. Such are sacrilege, oppression of widows and orphans, murder, sodomy, and the like. Now if any man falls into any of these crimes, he sees an angel with a sword drawn stand before him; he remembers the angry words of God, and calls to mind that so few have escaped a severe judgment here, that God’s anger did converse with men, and was clothed with our circumstances, and walked around about us; and less than all this is enough to scare an evil conscience.

^k Senec. Octav. Act. 3.

But, (2.) There are some certain defensatives and natural guards which God hath placed in men against some sins; such as are, a natural abhorrence against unnatural lusts: a natural pity against murder and oppression: the double hedge of sacredness and religion against sacrilege. He therefore that commits any of these sins, does so much violence to those defensatives, which were placed either in or upon his heart, that such an act is a natural disease, and vexes the conscience, not only by a moral but by a natural instrument.

(3.) There are in these crying sins, certain accidents and appendages of horror, which are apt to amaze a man's mind: as in murder there is the circumstance and state of death, which when a man sees, and sees alone, and sees that himself hath acted, it must needs affright him; since naturally most men abhor to be alone with a dead corpse. So also in oppression of widows, a man meets with so many sad spectacles, and hears so many groans, and clamorous complaints, such importunities, and such prayers, and such fearful cursings, and perpetual weepings, that if a man were to use any artifice to trouble a man's spirit, he could not dress his scene with more advantage.

(4.) Fame hath a great influence into this effect, and there cannot easily be a great shame amongst men, but there must be a great fear of vengeance from God; and the shame does but antedate the Divine anger, and the man feels himself entering into it, when he is enwrapped within the other. A man committing a foul sin, which hath a special dishonour and singular disreputation among men, is like a wolf espied amongst the sheep: the outcry and noises among the shepherds make him fly for his life, when he hears a vengeance coming. And besides in this case, it is a great matter that he perceives all the world hates him for his crime, and that which every one decries, must needs be very hateful and formidable; and prepared for trouble.

(5.) It cannot be denied, but opinion also hath some hand in this affair; and some men are affrighted from their cradle in some instances, and permitted or connived at in others; and the fears of childhood are not shaken from the conscience in old age: as we see the persuasions of childhood in moral actions are permanent, so are the fear and hope which were the sanction and establishment of those persuasions. Education, and society, and country customs, and states of life, and the religion or sect of the man's professing, have influence into their portions of this effect.

23. The consequent of this discourse is this;—that we cannot take any direct account of the greatness or horror of a sin by the affrightment of conscience. For it is with the affrightments of conscience as it is in temporal judgments; sometimes they come not at all, and when they do, they come irregularly; and when they do not, the man does not escape. But in some sins God does strike more frequently than in others, and in some sins men usually are more affrighted than in others. The outward judgment and the inward fear are intended to be deleteries of sin, and instruments of repentance; but as some great sins escape the rod of God in this life, so are such sinners oftentimes free from great affrightments. But as he who is not smitten of God, yet knows that he is always liable to God's anger, and if he repents not, it will certainly fall upon him hereafter; so it is in conscience: he that fears not, hath never the less cause to fear, but oftentimes a greater, and therefore is to suspect and alter his condition, as being of a deep and secret danger: and he that does fear, must alter his condition, as being highly troublesome. But in both cases, conscience does the work of a monitor and a judge. In some cases conscience is like an eloquent and a fair-spoken judge, which declaims not against the criminal, but condemns him justly: in others, the judge is more angry, and affrights the prisoner more, but the event is the same. For in those sins where the conscience affrights, and in those in which she affrights not, supposing the sins equal but of differing natures, there is no other difference, but that conscience is a clock,—which in one man strikes aloud and gives warning, and in another the hand points silently to the figure, but strikes not; but by this he may as surely see what the other hears, viz. that his hours pass away, and death hastens, and after death comes judgment.

24. But by the measures of binding, we may judge of the loosing, or absolution, which is part of the judgment of conscience, and this is the greatest pleasure in the world;

Μόνον δὲ τοῦτο φασ' ἀμιλλᾶσθαι βίῳ,
Γνώμην οὐκαὶ ἀν κάγαθὴν, ὅτ' ὁ παρῇ. EURIPID.

A good conscience¹ is the most certain, clearest, and undisturbed felicity. "Lectulus respersus floribus bona est conscientia, bonis relecta operibus." No bed so soft, no flowers so sweet, so florid, and delicious, as a good conscience, in which springs all that is delectable, all that may sustain and recreate our spirits.—"Nullâ re tam lætari solco quam officiorum meorum conscientia." "I am pleased in nothing so much as in the remembrances and conscience of my duty," said Cicero. Upon this pillow and on this bed, Christ slept soundly in a storm,—and St. Peter in prison so fast, that the brightness of an angel could not awake him, or make him to rise up without a blow on the side. This refreshed the sorrows of Hezekiah when he was smitten with the plague, and not only brought pleasure for what was past, and so doubled the good of it, but it also added something to the number of his years,

Vivere bis vitâ posse priore frui;

Ampliat ætatis spatium sibi vir bonus. MARTIAL.

And this made Paul and Silas sing in prison and in an earthquake; and that I may sum up all the good things in the world, I borrow the expression of St. Bernard, "Bona conscientia non solum sufficit ad solatium sed etiam ad coronam." It is here a perpetual comfort, it will be hereafter an eternal crown.

¹ 2 Cor. i. 12.

25. This very thing Epicurus observed wisely, and in his great design for pleasure, commended justice as the surest instrument to procure it. So Antiphon: "Conscium esse sibi in vitâ nullius criminis, multum voluptatis parit:" and Cato in Cicero: "Conscientia bene actæ vitæ multorumque benefactorum recordatio jucundissima est." Nothing is a greater pleasure than a good conscience: for there is peace and no disturbance; καρπὸς μέγιστος ἀταραξία: "quietness is the best fruit;" and that grows only upon the tree in the midst of Paradise, upon the stock of a holy heart or conscience. Only care is to be taken, that boldness be not mistaken for peace, and hardness of heart for a good conscience. It is easy to observe the difference, and no man can be innocently abused in this affair. Peace is the fruit of a holy conscience. But no man can say, "I am at peace, therefore I have a holy conscience." But, "I have lived innocently," or "I walk carefully with my God, and I have examined my conscience severely, and that accuses me not; therefore this peace is a holy peace, and no illusion." A man may argue thus: "I am in health, and therefore the sleep I take is natural and healthful." But not thus: "I am heavy to sleep, therefore I am in health;" for his dulness may be a lethargy. A man may be quiet, because he inquires not, or because he understands not, or because he cares not, or because he is abused in the notices of his condition. But the true peace of conscience is thus to be discerned.

Signs of true Peace.

(1.) Peace of conscience is a rest after a severe inquiry. When Hezekiah was upon his death-bed as he supposed, he examined his state of life, and found it had been innocent in the great lines and periods of it; and he was justly confident.

(2.) Peace of conscience can never be in wicked persons, of notorious evil lives. It is a fruit of holiness; and therefore what quietness soever is in persons of evil lives, it is to be attributed to any other cause, rather than innocence; and therefore is to be called any thing rather than just peace. "The adulterous woman eateth and wipeth her mouth, and saith, I have done no wickedness."^m And Pilate "washed his hands," when he was dipping them in the most innocent, the best and purest blood of the world. But St. Paul had peace, because he really had "fought a good fight." And it is but a fond way to ask a sign how to discern when the sun shines. If the sun shines we may easily perceive it, and then the beams we see are the sun-beams; but it is not a sure argument to say, I see a light, therefore the sun shines; for he may espy only a tallow-candle, or a glow-worm.

(3.) That rest which is only in the days of prosperity, is not a just and a holy peace, but that which is in the days of sorrow and affliction.ⁿ The noise and madness of wine, the transportations of prosperity, the forgetfulness of riches, and the voice of flatterers, outery conscience, and put it to silence; and there is no reason to commend a woman's silence and modesty, when her mouth is stopped. But in the days of sorrow, then conscience is vocal, and her muffler is off;

——Invigilant animo, scelerisque patrati
Supplicium exercent curæ: tunc plurima versat Pessimus in dubiis augur timor——^o and then a man naturally searches every where for comfort; and if his heart then condemns him not, it is great odds but it is a holy peace.

(4.) Peace of mind is not to be used as a sign that God hath pardoned our sins, but is only of use in questions of particular fact. "What evils have I done? what good have I done?" The peace that comes after this examination, is holy and good. But if I have peace in these particulars, then have I peace towards God also, as to these particulars; but whether I have pardon for other sins which I have committed, is another consideration, and is always more uncertain. But even here also a peace of conscience is a blessing that is given to all holy penitents more or less, at some time or other, according as their repentance proceeds, and their hope is exercised: but it is not to be judged of by sense, and ease, but by its proper causes: it never comes but after fear, and labour, and prayers, and watchfulness, and assiduity: and then what succeeds is a blessing, and a fair indication of a bigger.

(5.) True peace of conscience is always joined with a holy fear; a fear to offend, and a fear of the Divine displeasure for what we have offended; and the reason is, because all peace that is so allayed, is a peace after inquiry, a peace obtained by just instruments, relying upon proper grounds: it is rational, and holy, and humble; neither carelessness nor presumption is in it.

(6.) True peace of conscience relies not upon popular noises, and is not a sleep procured by the tongues of flatterers, or opinions of men, but is a peace from within, relying upon God and its own just measures. It is an excellent discourse which Seneca hath: "Est aliquando gratus, qui ingratus videtur, quæ mala interpret opinio in contrarium deducit. Hic quid aliud sequitur, quam ipsam conscientiam quæ etiam obruta delectat, quæ concioni ac famæ reclamationat, et in se omnia reponit, et quum ingentem ex alterâ parte turbam contra sententiam asperit, non numerat suffragia, sed unâ sententiâ vincit:" "Some men are thankful, who yet seem unthankful, being wronged by evil interpretation. But such a man, what else does he follow but his conscience, which pleases him, though it be overborne with slander; and when she sees a multitude of men that think otherwise, she regards not, nor reckons suffrages by the poll, but is victorious by her single sentence."^p But the excellency and great effect of this peace he afterwards describes; "Si vero bonam fidem perfidiæ supplicii affici videt, non descendit è fastigio, sed supra pœnam suam consistit.—Habeo, inquit, quod volui, quod petii. Non pœnitet, nec pœnitebit, nec ullâ iniquitate me eò fortuna perducet, ut hanc vocem audiam, Quid mihi volui? quid mihi nunc prodest bona voluntas? Prodest et in equulo, prodest et in igne. Qui si singulis membris admoveatur, et paulatim unum corpus circumeat; licet ipsum corpus plenum bonâ conscientiâ stillet: placebit illi ignis, per quem bona fides collucebit." "A good conscience loses nothing of its confidence and peace for all the tortures of the world. The rack, the fire, shall not make it to repent and say, What have I purchased? But its excellency and integrity shall be resplendent in the very flames."—And this is the meaning of the proverb used by the Levantines, "Heaven and hell are seated in the heart of man." As his conscience is, so he is happy, or extremely miserable. "What other men say of us, is no more than what other men dream of us," said St. Gregory Nazianzen;^q it is our conscience that accuses or condemns to all real events and purposes.

26. And now all this is nothing but a persuasion partly natural, partly habitual, of this proposition which all the nations, and all the men in the world, have always entertained as the band of all their religion, and private transactions of justice and decency.—"Deum remuneratorem esse," that "God is a just rewarder" of all actions. I sum up the premises in the words of the orator: "Magna vis est conscientiæ, judices, et magna in utramque partem: ut neque timeant qui nihil commiserint; et pœnam semper ante oculos versari putent, qui peccarint."^r On either side conscience is mighty and powerful, to secure the innocent, and to afflict the criminal.

27. But beyond these offices now described conscience does sometimes only counsel a thing to be done; that is, according to its instruction, so it ministers to holiness. If God hath put a law into our minds, conscience will force obedience, or make us to suffer for our obedience; but if a proposition, tending to holiness and its advantages, be intrusted to the conduct of conscience, then it presses it by all its proper inducements, by which it was laid up there, and leaves the spirit of a man to his liberty; but if it be not followed, it upbraids our weaknesses, and chides our follies, and reproves our despising holy degrees, and greater excellencies of glory laid up for loving and willing spirits. Such as is that of Clemens Alexandrinus,^s in the matter of an evangelical counsel; Οὐχ ἀμαρτάνει μὲν κατὰ διαθήκην· οὐ γὰρ κεκώλυνται πρὸς τοῦ νόμου· οὐ πληροῖ δὲ τῆς κατὰ τὸ εὐαγγέλιον πολιτείας, κατ' ἐπίτασιν, τελειότητα, "He that does so and so, sins not; for he is not forbidden by the law of the gospel; but yet he falls short of the perfection, that is designed and propounded to voluntary and obedient persons." To sum up this:

28. When St. Paul had reproved the endless genealogies of the Gnostics and Platonists, making circles of the same things, or of divers whose difference they understood not: as intelligence, fear, majesty, wisdom, magnificence, mercy, victory, kingdom, foundation, God, and such unintelligible stuff which would make fools stare and wise men at a loss; he subjoins a short, but a more discernible genealogy, and conjugation of things to our purpose: "The end of the commandment is love out of a pure heart, and a good conscience, and faith unfeigned:"^t that is, out of an unfeigned faith proceeds a good conscience; that is, abstinence from sin;—and from thence comes purity of heart, or a separation from the trifling regards of the world, and all affections to sin; and these all end in charity: that is, in peace, in joy, and the fruition and love of God, in unions and contemplations in the bosom of eternity. So that faith is the first mover in the understanding part, and the next is conscience; and they both purify the heart from false persuasions, and evil affections: and then they join to the production of love and of felicity.

Thus far are the nature and offices of conscience: it will concern us next, to consider by what general measures we are to treat our conscience, that it may be useful to us in all the intentions of it, and in the designs of God.

RULE III.

Be careful that Prejudice or Passion, Fancy and Affection, Error or Illusion, be not mistaken for Conscience.

I. NOTHING is more usual, than to pretend conscience to all the actions of men which are public, and whose nature cannot be concealed. If arms be taken up in a violent war; inquire of both sides, why they engage on that part respectively; they answer, because of their conscience. Ask a schismatic why he refuses to join in the communion of the church; he tells you, it is against his conscience:—and the disobedient refuse to submit to laws; and they also, in many cases, pretend conscience. Nay, some men suspect their brother of a crime, and are persuaded, as they say, in conscience that he did it: and their conscience tells them that Titius did steal their goods, or that Caia is an adulteress. And so suspicion, and jealousy, and disobedience, and rebellion, are become conscience; in which there is neither knowledge, nor revelation, nor truth, nor charity, nor reason, nor religion. "Quod volumus, sanctum est," was the proverb of Sichonius and the Donatists.

Nemo suæ mentis motus non æstimat æquos,
Quodque volunt homines, se bene velle putant.^u

Every man's way seems right in his own eyes; and what they think is not against conscience, they think or pretend to think, it is an effect of conscience; and so their fond persuasions and fancies are made sacred, and conscience is pretended, and themselves and every man else is abused. But in these cases and the like, men have found a sweetness in it to serve their ends upon religion, and because conscience is the religious understanding, or the mind of a man as it stands dressed in and for religion, they think that some sacredness or authority passes upon their passion or design, if they call it conscience.

2. But by this rule it is intended that we should observe the strict measures of conscience. For an illusion may make a conscience, that is, may oblige by its directive and compulsive power. Conscience is like a king, whose power and authority are regular, whatsoever counsel he follows. And although he may command fond things, being abused by flatterers, or misinformation, yet the commandment issues from a just authority, and therefore equally passes into a law: so it is in conscience. If error or passion dictates, the king is misinformed, but the inferiors are bound to obey: and we may no more disobey our conscience commanding of evil things, than we may disobey our king enjoining things imprudent and inconvenient. But therefore this rule gives caution to observe the information and inducement, and if we can discern the abuse, then the evil is avoided. For this governor "conscience" is tied to laws, askings are to the laws of God and nations, to justice and charity; and a man's conscience cannot be malicious: his will may; but if the error be discovered, the conscience, that is, the practical understanding, cannot. For it is impossible for a man to believe what himself finds to be an error: and when we perceive our conscience to be misguided, the deception is at an end. And therefore to make up this rule complete, we ought to be strict and united to our rule: for by that only we can be guided, and by the proportions to it we can discern right and wrong, when we walk safely, and when we walk by false fires. Concerning which, besides the direct survey of the rule and action, and the comparing each other, we may, in cases of doubt and suspicion, be helped by the following measures.

Advices for the Practice of the former Rule.

3. (1.) We are to suspect our conscience to be misinformed, when we are not willing to inquire into the particulars. He that searches, desires to find, and so far takes the right course: for truth can never hurt a man, though it may prejudice his vice, and his affected folly. In the inquiries after truth, every man should have a traveller's indifference, wholly careless whether this or that be the right way, so he may find it. For we are not to choose the way because it looks fair, but because it leads surely. And to this purpose, the most hearty and particular inquest is most prudent and effective. But we are afraid of truth when we will not inquire, that is, when the truth is against our interest or passion, our lust or folly, that is, seemingly against us, in the present indisposition of our affairs.

4. (2.) He that resolves upon the conclusion before the premises, inquiring into particulars to confirm his opinion at a venture, not to shake it if it be false, or to establish it only in case it be true, unless he be defended by chance, is sure to mistake, or at least can never be sure whether he does or no.

This is to be understood in all cases to be so, unless the particular unknown be secured by a general that is known. He that believes Christ's advocation and intercession for us in heaven upon the stock of scripture, cannot be prejudiced by this rule, although, in the inquiries of probation and arguments of the doctrine, he resolve to believe nothing that shall make against his conclusion; because he is ascertained by a proposition that cannot fail him. The reason of this exception is this, because in all discourses which are not perfectly demonstrative, there is one lame supporter, which must be helped out by the better leg; and the weaker part does its office well enough, if it can bring us to a place where we may rest ourselves and rely. He that cannot choose for himself, hath chosen well enough, if he can choose one that can choose for him; and when he hath, he may prudently rely upon such a person in all particulars, where he himself cannot judge, and the other can, or he thinks he can, and cannot well know the contrary. It is easier to judge of the general lines of duty, than of minutes and particulars: and travellers that are not well skilled in all the little turnings of the ways, may confidently rely upon a guide whom they choose out of the natives of the place; and if he understands the coast of the country, he may well harden his face against any vile person, that goes about wittily to persuade him he must go the contrary way, though he cannot answer his arguments to the contrary. A man may prudently and piously hold a conclusion, which he cannot defend against a witty adversary, if he have one strong hold upon which he may rely for the whole question; because he derives his conclusion from the best ground he hath, and takes the wisest course he can, and uses the best means he can get, and chooses the safest ways that are in his power. No man is bound to do better than his best.

5. (3.) Illusion cannot be distinguished from conscience, if, in our search, we take a wrong course and use incompetent instruments. He that will choose to follow the multitude which easily errs, rather than the wise guides of souls; and a man that is his partner in the question, rather than him that is disinterested; and them that speak by chance, rather than them who have studied the question: and a man of another profession, rather than him whose office and employment it is to answer,—hath no reason to be confident he shall be well instructed. John Nider^x tells an apologue well enough to this purpose:—Two brethren travelling together, whereof one was esteemed wise, and the other little better than a fool, came to a place where the way parted. The foolish brother espying one of them to be fair and pleasant, and the other dirty and uneven, would needs go that way, though his wiser brother told him, that in all reason that must needs be the wrong way; but he followed his own eyes, not his brother's reason: and his brother being more kind than wise, though against his reason, followed his foolish brother; they went on till they fell into the hands of thieves, who robbed them and imprisoned them, till they could redeem themselves with a sum of money. These brothers accuse each other before the king as author of each other's evil. The wiser complained that his brother would not obey him, though he was known to be wiser, and spake reason. The other complained of him for following him that was a fool, affirming, that he would have returned back, if he had seen his wise brother confident, and to have followed his own reason. The king condemned them both; the fool, because he did not follow the direction of the wise,—and the wise, because he did follow the wilfulness of the fool. So will God deal with us at the day of judgment in the scrutinies of conscience. If appetite refuses to follow reason, and reason does not refuse to follow appetite, they have both of them taken incompetent courses, and shall perish together. It was wisely said of Brutus^y to Cicero, "Malo tuum iudicium, quàm ex alterâ parte omnium istorum. Tu enim à certo sensu et vero iudicas de nobis; quod isti ne faciant, summâ malevolentia et livore impediuntur." "I prefer thy judgment singly, before all theirs, because thou judgest by intuition of the thing; they cannot do that, being hindered by envy and ill-will."—The particulars of reducing this advice to practice in all special cases, I shall afterwards enumerate; for the present I say this only, that a man may consent to an evil authority, and rest in a false persuasion, and be conducted by an abused conscience, so long as the legislative reason is not conjoined to the judge conscience, that is, while by unapt instruments we suffer our persuasions to be determined.

6. (4.) That determination is to be suspected, that does apparently serve an interest, and but obscurely serve a pious end:

Utile quod nobis, do tibi consilium:^z

When that appears, and nothing else appears, the resolution or counsel is to be considered warily before it be pursued. It is a great allay to the confidence of the bold talkers in the church of Rome, and hinders their gain and market of proselytes from among the wise and pious very much,—that most of their propositions, for which they contend so earnestly against the other parts of Christendom, do evidently serve the ends of covetousness and ambition, of power and riches, and therefore stand vehemently suspected of design and art, rather than of piety or truth of the article, or designs upon heaven. I instance in the pope's power over princes and all the world; his power of dispensation; the exemption of the clergy from jurisdiction of secular princes; the doctrine of purgatory and indulgences, by which once the friars were set a work to raise a portion for a lady, the niece of Pope Leo X.; the doctrine of transubstantiation, by the effects and consequence of which, the priests are made greater than angels, and next to God; and so is also that heap of doctrines, by the particulars of which the ecclesiastical power is far advanced beyond the authority of any warrant from Scripture, and is made highly instrumental for procuring absolute obedience to the papacy. In these things every man with half an eye can see the temporal advantage; but how piety and truth shall thrive in the mean while, no eye hath yet been so illuminate as to perceive. It was the advice of Ben Sirach,^a "Consult not with a woman touching her of whom she is jealous; neither with a coward in matters of war; nor with a merchant concerning exchange; nor with a buyer of selling; nor with an envious man of thankfulness; nor with an unmerciful man touching kindness; nor with the slothful for any work; nor with the hireling for a year of finishing work; nor with an idle servant of much business; hearken not unto these in any matter of counsel." These will counsel by their interest, not for thy advantage.

But it is possible that both truth and interest may be conjoined; and when a priest preaches to the people the necessity of paying tithes, where they are by law appointed, or when a poor man pleads for charity, or a man in debt urges the excellency of forgetfulness; the truth which they discourse of, cannot be prejudiced by their proper concerns. For if the proposition serves the end in religion, in providing for their personal necessities, their need makes the instances still the more religious, and the things may otherwise be proved. But when the end of piety is obscure, or the truth of the proposition is uncertain, then observe the bias; and if the man's zeal be bigger than the certainty of the proposition, it is to be estimated by the interest, and to be used accordingly.

But this is not to prejudice him that gives the counsel: for although the counsel is to be suspected, yet the man is not, unless by some other indications he betray himself. For he may be heartily and innocently persuaded of the thing he counsels, and the more easily and aptly believe that, against which himself did less watch, because he quickly perceived it could not be against himself.

Add to this, the counsel is the less to be suspected, if it be asked, than if it be offered. But this is a consideration of prudence, not of conscience directly.

7. (5.) If the proposition serve or maintain a vice, or lessen a virtue, it is certainly not conscience, but error and abuse; because no truth of God can serve God's enemy directly, or by its own force and persuasion. But this is to be understood only in case the answer does directly minister to sin, not if it does so only accidentally. Q. Furius is married to Valeria; but she being fierce and imperious, quarrelsome and loud, and he peevish and fretful, turns her away that he might have peace and live in patience. But being admonished by Hortensius the orator, to take her again,—he asked counsel of the priests, and they advised him to receive her. He answers, that then he cannot live innocently, but in a perpetual state of temptation, in which he daily falls. The priest replies, that it is his own fault; let him learn patience, and prudence; for his fault in this instance is no warranty, to make him neglect a duty in another; and he answered rightly. If he had counselled him to drink intemperately to make him forget his sorrow, or to break her bones to make her silent, or to keep company with harlots to vex her into compliance, his counsel had ministered directly to sin, and might not be received.

8. (6.) Besides the evidence of the thing, and a direct conformity to the rule, to be judged by every sober person, or by himself in his wits, there is ordinarily no other collateral assurance, but an honest hearty endeavour in our proportion, to make as wise inquiries as we can, and to get the best helps which are to be had by us, and to obey the best we do make use of. To which (because a deception may tacitly creep upon our very simplicity) if we add a hearty prayer, we shall certainly be guided through the labyrinth, and secured against ourselves, and our own secret follies. This is the counsel of the son of Sirach;^b "Above all this, pray to the Most High, that he will direct thy way in truth."

RULE IV.

The Conscience of a vicious Man is an evil Judge, and an imperfect Rule.

1. THAT I mean the superior and inferior part of conscience, is therefore plain, because the rule notes how the acts of conscience may be made invalid, both as it is a ruler, and as it is a judge. But, according to the several offices, this truth hath some variety.

2. (1.) The superior part of conscience, or the συντήρησις, repository of practical principles, (which for use and brevity's sake, I shall call the phylactery,) or the keeper of records: that is, that part which contains in it all the natural and reasonable principles of good actions, (such as are, God is to be worshipped,—Do to others as they should do to thee,—The pledge is to be restored,—By doing harm to others thou must not procure thy own good, and the like,) is always a certain and regular judge in the prime principles of reason and religion, so long as a man is in his wits, and hath the natural use of reason. For those things which are first imprinted, which are universal principles, which are consented to by all men without a teacher, those which Aristotle calls κοινὰς ἐννοίας, those are always the last removed, and never without the greatest violence and perturbation in the world. But it is possible for a man to forget his name and his nature: a lycanthropy made Nebuchadnezzar to do so, and a fever made a learned Greek do so: but so long as a man's reason is whole, not destroyed by its proper disease; that is, so long as a man hath the use of reason, and can and will discourse, so long his conscience will teach him the general precepts of duty; for they are imprinted in his nature, and there is nothing natural to the soul, if reason be not; and no reason is, unless its first principles be, and those first principles are most provided for, which are the most perfective of a man, and necessary to his well-being, and those are such which concern the intercourse between God and man, and between men in the first and greatest lines of their society. The very opening of this chain is sufficient proof; it is not necessary to intricate it by offering more testimony.

^b Eccles. xxxvii. 15.

3. (2.) But then these general principles are either to be considered as they are habitually incumbent on the mind, or as actually applied to practice. In the former sense they can never be totally extinguished, for they are natural, and will return whenever a man ceases from suffering his greatest violence; and those violences, which are so destructive of nature, as this must be that makes a man forget his being, will fall off upon every accident and change. "Difficile est personam diu sustinere." But then when these principles come to be applied to practice, a strong vice and a malicious heart can draw a veil over them, that they shall not then appear to disorder the sensual resolution. A short madness, and a violent passion, or a fit of drunkenness, can make a man securely sin by incogitancy, even when the action is in the manner of a universal principle. No man can be brought to that pass, as to believe that God ought not to be honoured; but supposing there is a God, it is unavoidable that this God must be honoured: but a transient and unnatural violence intervening in a particular case, suspends the application of that principle, and makes the man not to consider his rule; and there he omits to worship and honour this God in many particulars to which the principle is applicable. But this discourse is coincident with that question, whether conscience may be totally lost? of which I have already given accounts.^c That and this will give light to each other.

4. (3.) But further, there are also some principles which are indeed naturally known, that is, by principles of natural reason: but because they are not the immediate principles of our creation and proper being, they have the same truth, and the same seat, and the same certainty; but not the same prime evidence, and connaturality to the soul; and therefore these may be lost, or obscured to all purposes of usefulness, and their contradictories may be admitted into the rule of conscience. Of this nature, I reckon, that fornication, violent and crafty contracts, with many arts of deception, and overreaching our brother, theft, incest in some kinds, drunkenness, and the like, are to be avoided. For concerning these, it is certain that some whole nations have so abused their conscience by evil manners, that the law in their mind hath been cancelled, and these things have passed for lawful. And to this day, that duels may be fought by private persons, and authority, is a thing so practised by a whole sort of men, that it is believed: and the practice, and the belief of the lawfulness of it, are interchangeably daughter and mother to each other. These are such of whom the apostle speaks,^d they are "given over to believe a lie," they are delivered "to a reprobate mind." And this often happens, and particularly in those cases wherein one sin is inferred by another naturally, or morally, or by withdrawing of the Divine grace.

5. (4.) Wherever the superior or the ruling part of conscience is an imperfect rule; in the same cases the inferior is an evil judge, that is, acquits the criminal, or condemns the innocent, calling good evil, and evil good : which is to be understood when the persuasion of the erring conscience is permanent and hearty, not sudden, and by the rapid violence of a passion; for in this case the conscience condemns as soon as that is acted, to which, before the action, it was cozened and betrayed : but it proceeds only in abiding and lasting errors. And this is the cause why so many orders of persons continue in a course of sin with delight, and uninterrupted pleasure, thinking rebellion to be a just defence, sacrilege a lawful title ; while other men, that are otherwise and justly persuaded, wonder at their peace, and hate their practices. Our blessed Lord foretold concerning the persecutors of the church, that they should “think they did God good service.” But such men have an evil portion, they sing in the fire, and go dancing to their graves, and sleep on till they be awakened in hell. And on the other side, this is because of superstition, and scruples, and sometimes of despairing and unreasonable fears, when the conscience is abused by thinking that to be sin, which is none.

^c In rule 1. numb. 5. et seq.

^d Rom. i. 28.

RULE V.

All Consciences are to walk by the same Rule ; and that which is just to one, is so to all, in the like Circumstances.

1. If all men were governed by the same laws, and had the same interest, and the same degrees of understanding, they would perceive the truth of this conclusion. But men are infinitely differenced by their own acts and relations, by their understandings and proper economy, by their superinduced differences and orders, by interest and mistake, by ignorance and malice, by sects and deceptions. And this makes that two men may be damned for doing two contradictories : as a Jew may perish for not keeping of his sabbath, and a christian for keeping it ; an iconoclast for breaking images, and another for worshipping them : for eating, and for not eating ; for receiving the holy communion, and for not receiving it ; for coming to church, or staying at home.

2. But this variety is not directly of God’s making, but of man’s. God commands us to walk by the same rule, and to this end, τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν, “to be of the same mind ;” and this is ἀκρίβεια συνειδήσεως, “the exactness of our conscience ;” which precept were impossible to be observed, if there were not one rule, and this rule also very easy. For some men have but a small portion of reason and discretion, and they cannot help it ; and yet the precept is incumbent upon them all alike ; and therefore as the rule is one, so it is plain and easy, and written in every man’s heart ; and as every man’s reason is the same thing, so is every man’s conscience ; and this comes to be altered, just as that.

3. Neither is the unity of the rule prejudiced by the infinite difference of cases. For as a river, springing from the mountains of the east, is tempted by the levels of the ground and the uneasiness of its passage, to make some turns backward towards its head, even while it intends westward ; so are the cases of conscience branched out into instances, sometimes of contrary proceedings, which are to be determined to cross effects, but still upon the same account. For in all things of the world the obligation is uniform, and it is of the same persuasion.

The case is this :

4. Autolycus robbed the gardens of Trebonius, and asked him forgiveness, and had it. But when Trebonius was chosen consul, and Autolycus robbed him again, and was taken by others, and as a thief brought before him, he asked forgiveness again ; but Trebonius condemned him to the galleys : for he who being a private man was bound to forgive a repenting trespasser, being a magistrate was bound not to forgive him ; and both these were upon the same account. A man may forgive an injury done to himself, because it is his own right, and he may alone meddle in it ; but an injury done to the commonwealth, she only could forgive, not her minister. So,

5. He that fasted upon a Saturday in Ionia or Smyrna, was a schismatic ; and so was he who did not fast at Milan or Rome upon the same day, both upon the same reason :

Cum fueris Romæ, Romano vivito more ;
Cum fueris alibi, vivito sicut ibi ;

because he was to conform to the custom of Smyrna, as well as to that of Milan, in the respective diocesses.

6. To kill a man, in some cases, defiles a land ; in others, it cleanses it, and puts away blood from the people ; and it was plain in the case of circumcision. St. Paul did it, and did it not ; both because he ought, and because he ought not ; and all upon the same account and law of charity. And therefore all inquiries, and all contentions, and questions, should be relations to the rule, and be tried by nothing but a plain measure of justice and religion, and not stand or fall by relations to separate propositions and distinct regards. For that is one and easy ; these are infinite, uncertain, and contradictory. Τοῦτ’ ἔστι τὸ αἷτιον ἀνθρώποις πάντων τῶν κακῶν τὸ τὰς προλήψεις τὰς κοιὰς μὴ δύνασθαι ἐφαρμόζειν ταῖς ἐπὶ μέρος. “It is a very great cause of mischief not to be able to deduce general propositions, and fit them to particular cases,” said Arrianus.^e But because all men cannot, therefore there will be an eternal necessity of spiritual guides, whose employment, and the business of their life, must be to make themselves able “respondere de jure,” “to answer in matters of law,” and they also must be truly informed in the matters of fact.

RULE VI.

In Conscience, that which is first, is truest, easiest, and most useful.

1. THERE are some practices, which, at the first sight, and by the very name and nature of the things themselves, seem as directly unreasonable and against a commandment, as any other thing of the foulest reproach; and yet, object the sin to the owners, and they will tell so many fine stories, and struggle, and distinguish, and state the question in a new manner, and chop it into fragments, and disguise the whole affair, that they do not only content and believe themselves, but also lessen the confidence of the adversary, and make a plain rule an uneasy lesson. I instance in the question of images, the making of some of which, and the worshipping of any, does at the first sight as plainly dash against the second commandment, as adultery does against the sixth. But if you examine the practice of the Roman church, and estimate them by the more wary determination of the article in Trent, and weigh it by the distinctions and laborious devices of its patrons, and believe their pretences and shows, it must needs be that you will abate something of the reproof; and yet all the while the worship of images goes forward: and if you lay the commandment over-against the devices and distinctions, it will not be easy to tell what the commandment does mean; and yet because it was given to the meanest understandings, and was fitted for them, either the conscience is left without a clear rule, or that sense is to be followed which stands nearest the light, that which is next to the natural and proper sense of the words. For it is certain God put no disguises upon his own commandments, and the words are meant plainly and heartily; and the further you remove from their first sense, the more you have lost the purpose of your rule. In matters of conscience, that is the best sense which every wise man takes in, before he hath sullied his understanding with the disguises of sophisters and interested persons; for then they speak without prejudice and art, that is, so as they should speak, who intend to guide wise men, and all men.

2. But this is to be understood otherwise, when the first sense of the words hath, in its letter, a prejudice open and easy to be seen; such as is that of "putting out the right eye," or "cutting off the hand." The face is a vizer and a metaphor, and the heart of it only is the commandment, and that is to be understood by the measures of this rule; that is, the prime and most natural signification is the best, that which is of nearest correspondency to the metaphor and the design of the speaker, and the occasion and matter of discourse.

3. But in all things where the precept is given in the proper style of laws, and the veil is off, and the words are plain, he that takes the first sense is the likeliest to be well guided. If a war be commenced between a king and his people, he that is willing to read his duty, may see it in the words of Christ and of three apostles, and it is easy to know our duty; but when we are engaged against our prince, it is certain we are hugely put to it to make it lawful, and when our conscience must struggle for its rule, it is not so well as when it takes that which lies easy before us. Truth is easy, error is intricate and hard. If none but witty men could understand their duty, the ignorant and idiot could not be saved; but in the event of things it will be found that this man's conscience was better guided while simplicity held the taper, than by all the false fires of art, and witty distinctions. "Qui ambulat simplicitèr, ambulat confidentèr," saith Solomon. It is safer to walk upon plain ground, than with tricks and devices to dance upon the ropes.

RULE VII.

Conscience by its several Habitues and Relations or Tendencies towards its proper Object, is divided into several Kinds.

1. CONSCIENCE in respect of its information, or as it relates to its object, taken materially, and in the nature of the thing, is either true or false, right or wrong; true when it is rightly informed, and proceeds justly; false when it is deceived. Between these, as participating of either extreme, stands the probable conscience; which if we consider as it relates to its object, is sometimes right and sometimes wrong, and so may be reduced to either, according as it is in the event of things. For in two contradictories which are both probable, as if one be, both are; if one part be true, the other is false; and the conscience of the several men holding the opposite parts, must be so too, that is, right and wrong, deceived and not deceived, respectively. The division then of conscience, in respect of its object, is tripartite.

2. For in all questions, if notice can be certainly had, he that gets the notice, hath a true conscience; he that misses it, hath a false or erring conscience. But if the notices that can be had, be uncertain, imperfectly revealed, or weakly transmitted, or understood by halves, or not well represented; because the understanding cannot be sure, the conscience can be but probable. But according as the understanding is fortunate, or the man wise and diligent, and honest enough to take the right side of the probability, so the conscience takes its place in the extreme, and is reduced to right or wrong accordingly.

3. But to be right or wrong, is wholly extrinsical to the formal obligation of conscience, as it is a judge and a guide, and to the consequent duty of the man. For an erring conscience binds as much as the right conscience, directly and immediately, and collaterally more; that is, the man who hath an erring conscience, is tied to more and other duties, than he that is in the right. The conscience binds because it is heartily persuaded, not because it is truly informed; not because it is right, but because it thinks so.

4. It does indeed concern the duty of conscience, and its felicity, to see that it be rightly instructed, but as to the consequence of the action, it is all one; this must follow whatsoever goes before. And therefore, although it concerns the man, as much as his felicity and all his hopes come to, to take care that his conscience be not abused in the matter of duty; yet a right and a wrong conscience are not made distinct guides and different judges. Since therefore we are to consider and treat of conscience, as it is the guide of our actions, and judge of our persons, we are to take it in other aspects, than by a direct face towards its object; the relation to which alone, cannot diversify its kind, so much as to become a universal rule to us in all cases and emergencies.

5. Now because intellectual habits, employed about the same general object, have no way to make them of different natures, but by their formal tendencies, and different manners of being affected with the same object; we are, in order to the perfect division and assignation of the kinds of conscience, to consider the right conscience, either as it is sure, or as it is only confident, but not sure. For an erring conscience and the unerring are the same judge, and the same guide, as to the authority and persuasion, and as to the effect upon the person; but yet they differ infinitely in their rule; and the persons under their conduct differ as much in their state and condition. But our conscience is not a good guide unless we be truly informed, and know it. For if we be truly informed, and know it not, it is an uncertain and an imperfect guide. But if we be confident and yet deceived, the uncertainty and hesitation are taken off, but we are still very miserable. For we are like an erring traveller, who being out of the way, and thinking himself right, spurs his horse and runs full speed: he that comes behind, is nearer to his journey's end.

6. That therefore is the first kind of conscience, the right, sure conscience; and this alone is fit to be our guide; but this alone is not our judge.

7. (2.) Opposite to this is the confident or erring conscience; that is, such which indeed is misinformed, but yet assents to its object with the same confidence as does the right and sure; but yet upon differing grounds, motives, and inducements: which because they are always criminal, although the assent is peremptory and confident, yet the deception is voluntary and vicious in its cause; and therefore the present confidence cannot warrant the action, it only makes the sinner bold. So that these two differ in their manner of entering into the assent; the one entering by the door, the other by the breaches of the wall: good will and bad, virtue and vice, duty and sin, keeping the several keys of the persuasion and consent.

8. This erring conscience I therefore affirm to be always voluntary and vicious in its principle, because all God's laws are plain in all matter of necessary duty: and when all men are to be guided, learned and unlearned, the rule is plain and easy, because it is necessary it should be so. But therefore if there happen any invincible ignorance, or involuntary deception, it is there where the rule is not plain; and then the matter is but probable, and then the conscience is according. And this makes the third kind of conscience, in respect of the different manner of being affected with the object.

9. (3.) The probable conscience is made by that manner of assent to the object, which is indeed without fear, but not without imperfection. The thing itself is of that nature, that it cannot properly make faith or certainty of adherence; and the understanding considers it as it is represented without any prejudice or prepossession; and then the thing must be believed as it deserves, and no more: but because it does not deserve a full assent, it hath but an imperfect one; but it is perfect enough in its kind, that is, it is as much as it ought to be, as much as the thing deserves. These are all the kinds of conscience that are perfect.

10. (4.) But sometimes the state and acts of conscience are imperfect; as the vision of an evil eye, or the motion of a broken arm, or the act of an imperfect or abused understanding: so the conscience in some cases is carried to its object but with an imperfect assent, and operates with a lame and deficient principle: and the causes of it are the vicious or abused affections, accidents or incidents to the conscience. Sometimes it happens, that the arguments of both the sides in a question seem so indifferent, that the conscience being affrighted and abused by fear and weakness, dares not determine, and consequently dares not do any thing; and if it be constrained to act, it is determined from without, not by itself, but by accidents and persuasion, by importunity or force, by interest or fear: and whatever the ingredient be, yet when it does act, it acts with fear, because it reflects upon itself, and considers it hath no warrant, and therefore whatever it does becomes a sin. This is the calamity of a doubting conscience. This doubting does not always proceed from the equality of the parts of the question, but sometimes wholly from want of knowing any thing of it: as if we were put to declare whether there were more men or women in the world? Whether the number of the stars were even or odd? Sometimes from inconsideration, sometimes from surprise, sometimes from confusion and disease; but from what principle soever it be, there is always some fear in it. This conscience can neither be a good guide, nor a good judge: we cannot do any thing by its conduct, nor be judged by it; for all that can be done before or after it, is not by it, but by the suppletories of the perfect conscience.

11. (5.) A less degree of this evil, is that which by the masters of moral theology is called the scrupulous conscience, which is not a distinct kind of conscience, as is usually supposed, but differs from the doubting conscience only in the degrees of the evil. The doubt is less, and the fear is not so violent as to make it unlawful to do any thing: something of the doubt is taken off, and the man can proceed to action without sin, but not without trouble; he is uneasy and timorous, even when he is most innocent; and the causes of this are not only portions of the same weaknesses which cause the doubting conscience; but sometimes superstition, and melancholy, and pusillanimity, and mean opinions of God, are ingredients into this imperfect assent: and in such cases, although the scrupulous man may act without sin, and produce his part of the determination, yet his scruple is not innocent, but sometimes criminal, but always calamitous. This is like a mote in the eye, but a doubt is like a beam.

12. This conscience may be a right guide, but dares not be a judge: it is like a guide in the dark, that knows the way, but fears every bush; and because he may err, thinks he does. The effect of this imperfection is nothing but a heartless and uncomfortable proceeding in our duty, and what else the devil can make of it, by heightening the evil and abusing the man, who sits upon a sure foundation, but dares not trust it; he cannot rely upon that, which yet he cannot disbelieve.

13. (6.) There are some other affections of conscience, and accidental appendages; but because they do not vary the manner of its being affected with its proper object, they cannot diversify conscience into several kinds, as it is a guide and judge of human actions. But because they have no direct influence upon our souls, and relate not to duty, but are to be conducted by rules of the other kinds, I shall here only enumerate their kinds, and permit to preachers to discourse of their natures and collateral obligations to duty, of their remedies and assistances, their advantages and disadvantages respectively. These also are five: 1. The tender conscience. 2. The hardened or obdurate. 3. The quiet. 4. The restless or disturbed. 5. And lastly, The perverse conscience. Concerning which, I shall at present say this only: that the two first are seated principally in the will, but have a mixture of conscience, as docibility hath of understanding. The two next are seated in the fancy, or the affections, and are not properly placed in conscience, any more than love, or desire, but yet from conscience they have their birth. And for the last, it is a heap of irregular principles, and irregular defects, and is the same in conscience, as deformity is in the body, or peevishness in the affections.

CHAPTER II.

OF THE RIGHT OR SURE CONSCIENCE.

RULE I.

A right Conscience is that which guides our Actions by right and proportioned Means to a right End.

THE end is, God's glory, or any honest purpose of justice or religion, charity or civil conversation. Whatsoever is good for us or our neighbours in any sense perfective of our being as God purposed it, all that is our end. The means ought to be such as are apt instruments to procure it. If a man intends to live a severe life, and to attend religion, his end is just and fair, and so far his conscience is right: but if his conscience suggest to him, that he to obtain his end should erect colleges of women; and in the midst of feasts, and songs, and society, he should preach the melancholy lectures of the cross, it is not right; because the end is reached at by a contrary hand. But when it tells him, that to obtain continence he must fast and pray, watch diligently, and observe prudently, labour and read, and deny his appetite in its daily attempts upon him, then it is a right conscience. For a right conscience is nothing but right reason reduced to practice, and conducting moral actions. Now all that right reason can be defined by, is the propounding a good end, and good means to that end.

RULE II.

In a right Conscience, the practical Judgment, that is, the last Determination to an Action, ought to be sure and evident.

1. This is plain in all the great lines of duty, in actions determinable by the prime principles of natural reason, or Divine revelation; but it is true also in all actions conducted by a right and perfect science. This relies upon all that account on which it is forbidden to do actions of danger, or doubt, lest we perish in the danger:—which are to be handled in their proper place. But for the present we are to observe, that in the question of actions, whose rule is not notorious and primely evident, there is or may be a double judgment.

2. The first judges the thing probable by reason of the differing opinions of men wise and pious; but in this there is a fear or suspicion of the contrary, and therefore in the direct act nothing is certain. But there is also, secondly, a reflex act of judgment; which upon consideration that it is certain that a probable action may lawfully be done, or else, that that which is but probable in the nature of the thing (so far as we perceive it) may yet, by the superadding of some circumstances, and prudential considerations, or by equity or necessity, become more than probable in the particular; although, I say, the conscience be uncertain in the direct act, yet it may be certain, right, and determined, in the reflex and second act of judgment; and if it be, it is innocent and safe, it is that which we call the right, sure conscience.

3. For in moral things there cannot ordinarily be a demonstrative or mathematical certainty: and in morality we call that certain, that is a thing to be followed and chosen, which oftentimes is but very highly probable; and many things do not attain that degree; and therefore because it is very often impossible, it is certainly not necessary that the direct judgment should be sure and evident in all cases. Το μὲν γὰρ ἐπιστητὸν, ἀποδεικτὸν τέχνη δὲ καὶ φρόνησις τυγχάνουσιν οὔσαι περὶ τὰ ἐνδεχόμενα ἄλλως εἶχει, " Science is of those things which can be demonstrated; but prudence, [and conscience,] of things which are thus, or may be otherwise."^a—But if it be not supplied in the reflex and second act of judgment, so that the conscience be either certain in the object, or in the act, the whole progress is a danger, and the product is criminal; the conscience is doubtful, and the action is a sin.

4. It is in this as is usually taught concerning the Divine knowledge of things contingent; which although they are in their own nature fallible and contingent, yet are known certainly and infallibly by God, and according to the nature of the things, even beyond what they are in their natural, proper, and next causes: and there is a rare and secret expression of Christ's incarnation used by St. Paul, "in whom dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily," that is, the manner is contrary to the thing; the Godhead that is wholly incorporeal dwells in him corporally. After the like manner of signification is the present certainty I speak of. If it be not certain in the object, it must be certain in the faculty, that is, at least it must be a certain persuasion, though of an uncertain article: and we must be certain and fully persuaded, that the thing may be done by us lawfully, though whether the thing itself be lawful is at most but highly probable.

5. So that in effect it comes but to this; The knowledge that is here required, is but the fulness of persuasion, which is and ought to be in a right conscience: Οἶδα καὶ πείπειμαι, "I know and am persuaded in the Lord Jesus:" so St. Paul.^b—Our knowledge here, which is but in part, must yet be a full confidence for the matters of duty. The conclusions then are these:

1. There must be a certainty of adherence in the actions of a right conscience.

2. It must also, for the matter of it too, at least be on the right side of the probability.

The conscience must be confident, and it must also have reason enough so to be; or at least, so much as can secure the confidence from illusion; although possibly the confidence may be greater than the evidence, and the conclusion bigger than the premises. Thus the good simple man, that, about the time of the Nicene council, confuted the stubborn and subtle philosopher by a confident saying over his creed: and the holy and innocent idiot, or plain easy people of the laity, that cannot prove christianity by any demonstrations, but by that of a holy life, and obedience unto death; they believe it so, that they put all their hopes upon it, and will most willingly prove it again by dying for it, if God shall call them. This is one of the excellencies of faith; and in all cases where the mercies of God have conducted the man into the right, it is not subject to illusion. But for that particular, I mean, that we be in the right, we are to take all that care which God hath put into our power:—of which I have already said something, and shall give fuller accounts in its proper place.

RULE III.

1. THIS rule is intended against those whose understanding is right in the proposition, and yet declines in the application; it is true in "thesi," but not in "hypothesi;" it is not true when it comes to be their case: and so it is in all that sin against their conscience, and use little arts to evade the clamour of the sin. They are right in the rule, and crooked in the measuring; whose folly is apparent in this, because they deny in particular, what they affirm in the general; and it is true in all, but not in some. David was redargued wittily by Nathan upon this account; he laid the case in a remote scene;—Titius, or Sempronius, a certain rich man, I know not who, somebody or other, robbed the poor man of his ewe lamb. Therefore said David, "He shall die, whoever he be."—"Yea, but you are the man:"—what then? shall he die still? This is a new arrest; it could not be denied, his own mouth had already given the sentence.

2. And this is a usual but a most effective art to make the conscience right in the particular, by propounding the case separate from its own circumstances; and then to remove it to its own place is no hard matter. It was an ingenious device of Erasistratus the physician, of which Appian tells:^c—When young Antiochus almost died for love of Stratonica his father Seleucus's wife, the physician told the passionate and indulgent father, that his son was sick of a disease, which he had indeed discovered, but found it also to be incurable. Seleucus with sorrow asking what it was, Erasistratus answered, "He loves my wife." But then the old king's hopes began to revive, and he turned wooer in the behalf of his son, begging of the physician, who was his counsellor and his friend, for pity's sake, for friendship and humanity, to give his wife in exchange or redemption for the young king's life. Erasistratus replied, "Sir, you ask a thing too unreasonable and great; and though you are his father, yourself would not do it, if it were your own case; and therefore why should I?" When Seleucus swore by all his country gods that he would do it as willingly as he would live; Erasistratus drew the curtain of the device, and applied it to him, by telling, that the cure of his son depended upon his giving the queen Stratonica to him, which he did; and afterwards made it as lawful as he could, by a law postnate to that insolent example, and confirmed it by military suffrages.

3. In all cases we are to consider the rule, not the relation; the law, not the person: for if it be one thing in the proposition, and another in the assumption, it must be false in one place or the other; and then the conscience is but an ill guide, and an ill judge.

4. This rule is not to extend to the exception of particular cases; nor to take away privileges, pardons, equity. For that which is fast in the proposition, may become loose in the particular by many intervening causes, of which I am to give account in its due place. For the present, this is certain, that whatsoever particular is of the same account with the general, not separate, or let loose by that hand which first bound it, is to be estimated as the general. But this rule is to go further also.

^a Aristot. Ethic. lib. 6. cap. 6.

^b Rom. xiv. 14.

^c De Bellis Syriacis.

5. For hitherto, I have called the act of particular conscience directing to a single and circumstantiate action, by the name of practical judgment; and the general dictate of the συντήρησις, or phylactery, or upper conscience, teaching the kinds of good actions, by the name of "speculative judgment." But the rule also is true, and so to be understood, when practical and speculative are taken in their first and proper sense. If in philosophy we discourse that the true God, being a spirit without shape or figure, cannot be represented by an image; although this be only a speculation, and demonstrable in natural philosophy, and no rule of conscience; yet when conscience is to make a judgment concerning the picturing of God the Father, it must not determine practically against that speculation. "That an idol is nothing," is demonstrable in metaphysics; and therefore that we are to make nothing of it, is a practical truth: and although the first proposition be not directly placed in the upper region of conscience, but is one of the prime metaphysical propositions, not properly theological, according to those words of St. Paul,^d "Concerning things sacrificed to idols, we know ὅτι πάντες γινώσκουν ἔχουμεν, 'that we all have knowledge;' and we know that an idol is nothing in the world;" meaning, that this knowledge needs no revelation to attest it; we by our own reason and principles of demonstration know that; yet, the lower, or particular practical conscience, must never determine against that extrinsical, and therefore, as to conscience, accidental measure.

6. For whatsoever is true in one science, is true also in another; and when we have wisely speculated concerning the dimensions of bodies, their circumscriptions, the acts of sense, the certainty of their healthful perceptions, the commensuration of a place and a body; we must not esteem these to be unconcerning propositions, if ever we come to use them in divinity: and therefore we must not worship that which our senses tell us to be a thing below worship: nor believe that infinite which we see measured; nor esteem that greater than the heavens, which, I see and feel, goes into my mouth. If philosophy gives a skin, divinity does not flay it off: and truth cannot be contrary to truth: and God would not in nature teach us any thing to misguide us in the regions of grace.

7. The caution for conducting this proposition is only this: that we be as sure of our speculation, as of any other rule which we ordinarily follow; and that we do not take vain philosophy for true speculations. He that guides his conscience by a principle of Zeno's philosophy, because he hath been bred in the Stoical sect, and resolves to understand his religion to the sense of his master's theorems, does ill. The christian religion suffered much prejudice at first by the weak disputings of the Greeks; and they would not admit a religion against the academy, or the cynics, or the Athenian schools; and the christian schools drew some of their articles through the limbees of Plato's philosophy, and to this day the relish remains upon some of them. And Baronius^e complains of Origen, that, "In Paganorum commentis enutritus, eaque propagare in animo habens, divinas se utique Scripturas interpretari simulavit: ut hoc modo nefariam doctrinam suam sacrarum literarum monumentis malignè admiscens, Paganicum et Manichaicum errorem suum atque Arrianam vesaniam induceret." He mingled the gentile philosophy with christian religion, and by analogy to that, expounded this, and how many disciples he had, all the world knows. Nay, not only from the doctrine, but from the practices and rites of the pagan religion, many christians did derive their rites, and they in time gave authority and birth to some doctrines.—"Vigilias anniversarias habes apud Suetonium. Lustralem aquam, aspersionem sepulcrorum, lumina in iisdem parare, Sabbato lucernam accendere, cereos in populum distribuere."^f The staff, the ring, the mitre, and many other customs, some good, some only tolerable, the christians took from the gentiles; and what effect it might have, and what influence it hath had, in some doctrines, is too notorious to dissemble. Thomas Aquinas did a little change the scene, and blended Aristotle so with school divinity, that something of the purity was lost, while much of our religion was exacted and conducted by the rules of a mistaken philosophy. But if their speculations had been right, christianity would at first have entered without reproof, as being the most reasonable religion of the world, and most consonant to the wisest and most sublime speculations; and it would also have continued pure, if it had been still drawn from the fountains of our Saviour, through the limbees of the evangelists and apostles, without the mixture of the salt waters of that philosophy, which every physician and witty man now-a-days thinks he hath reason and observation enough easily to reprove. But men have resolved to verify their sect rather than the truth; but if of this particular we be careful, we must then also verify every speculation in all things, where it can relate to practice, and is not altered by circumstances.

8. As an appendage, and for the fuller explication of this rule, it is a worthy inquiry which is by some men made, concerning the use of our reason in our religion. For some men, finding reason to be that guide which God hath given us, and concreated with us, know that religion which is superinduced, and comes after it, cannot prejudice that noblest part of this creation. But then, because some articles which are said to be of faith, cannot be made to appear consonant to their reason, they stick to this, and let that go. Here is a just cause of complaint. But therefore others say, that reason is a good guide in things reasonable and human, but our reason is blind in things Divine, and therefore is of little or no use in religion. Here we are to believe, not to dispute. There are on both sides fair pretences, which when we have examined, we may find what part of truth each side aims at, and join them both in practice. They that speak against reason, speak thus.

9. (1.) There is to every state and to every part of man given a proportionable light to guide him in that way, where he ought and is appointed to walk. In the darkneses of this world, and in the actions of common life, the sun and moon in their proper seasons are to give us light: in the actions of human intercourse, and the notions tending to it, reason is our eye, and to it are notices proportioned, drawn from nature and experience, even from all the principles with which our rational faculties usually do converse. But because a man is designed to the knowledge of God, and of things spiritual, there must spring a new light from heaven, and he must have new capacities, and new illuminations; that is, new eyes, and a new light: for here the eye of reason is too weak, and the natural man is not capable of the things of the Spirit, because they are spiritually discerned. Faith is the eye, and the Holy Spirit gives the light, and the word of God is the lantern, and the spiritual not the rational man can perceive the things of God. "Secreta Dei, Deo meo, et filiis domûs ejus." "God and God's secret ones only know God's secrets."

10. (2.) And therefore we find in Holy Scripture that to obey God, and to love him, is the way to understand the mysteries of the kingdom. "Obedite et intelligetis:" "If ye will obey, then shall ye understand:" and it was a rare saying of our blessed Saviour, and is of great use and confidence to all who inquire after the truth of God, in the midst of these sad divisions of christendom,—“If any man will do his will, he shall know whether the doctrine be of God or no.”^a It is not fineness of discourse, nor the sharpness of arguments, nor the witty rencounters of disputing men, that can penetrate into the mysteries of faith: the poor humble man that prays, and inquires simply, and listens attentively, and sucks in greedily, and obeys diligently, he is the man that shall know the mind of the Spirit; and therefore St. Paul observes that the sermons of the cross were “foolishness to the Greeks;” and consequently, by way of upbraiding, he inquires,^b “Where is the wise man, where is the scribe, where is the disputer of the world? God hath made the wisdom of the world foolishness;” that is, “God hath confounded reason, that faith may come in her place.”

11. (3.) For there are some things in our religion so mysterious, that they are above all our reason; and well may we admire, but cannot understand them: and therefore the Spirit of God is sent into the world to bring our understanding into the obedience of Christ; we must obey and not inquire, and every proud thought¹ must be submitted to him, who is the wisdom of the Father, who hath, in the Holy Scriptures, taught us all his Father's will.

12. (4.) And therefore, as to this nothing can be added from the stock of nature or principles of natural reason, so if it did need a supply, reason could ill do it. For the object of our faith must be certain and infallible; but no man's reason is so; and therefore to put new wine into broken bottles is no gain, or real advantage; and although right reason is not to be gainsaid, yet what is right reason is so uncertain, that in the midst of all disputes, every man pretends to it, but who hath it no man can tell, and therefore it cannot be a guide or measure of faith.

13. (5.) But above all, if we will pretend to reason in religion, we have but one great reason that we can be obliged to; and that is, to believe that whatsoever God hath said, is true: so that our biggest reason in religion is, to submit our reason, that is, not to use our reason in particular inquiries, but to captivate it in the whole. And if there be any particular inquiries, let them seem what they will to my reason, it matters not; I am to follow God, not man; I may be deceived by myself, but never by God. It is therefore sufficient to me that it is in the Scriptures. I will inquire no further. This therefore is a concluding argument; This is in Scripture, therefore this is true; and this is against Scripture, therefore it is absurd, and unreasonable.

14. (6.) After all, experience is our competent guide and warning to us: for we see when witty men use their reason against God that gave it, they in pursuit of reason go beyond religion; and when by reason they look for God, they miss him; for he is not to be found but by faith, which when they dispute for, they find not; because she is built and persuaded by other mediums, than all schools of philosophy to this day have taught. And it was because of reason, that the religion of Jesus was so long opposed and hindered to possess the world. The philosophers would use their reason, and their reason would not admit this new religion: and therefore St. Paul being to remove every stone that hindered, bade them to beware of “vain philosophy;” which does not distinguish one kind of philosophy from another, but marks all philosophy. It is all vain, when the inquiries are into religious mysteries.

15. (7.) For is it not certain that some principles of reason are against some principles of faith and Scripture? and it is but reason, that we should hear reason wherever we find it; and yet we are to have no intercourse with devils, though we were sure they would tell us of hidden treasures, or secrets of philosophy: and upon this account it is that all genethliacal predictions and judicial astrology are decried by all religious persons; for though there be great pretensions of reason and art, yet they, being against religion and revelation, are intolerable. In these and the like cases, reason must put on her muffler, and we must be wholly conducted by revelation.

16. These are the pretences against the use of reason in questions of religion; concerning which the same account may be given, as by the Pyrrhonians and sceptics concerning their arguments against the certainty of sciences. These reasons are like physic, which if it uncertainly purges out the humour, it most certainly purges out itself: and these arguments either cannot prevail against the use of reason in religion, or if they do, they prevail against themselves: for either it is against religion to rely upon reason in religion, or it is not; if it be not, then reason may without danger to religion be safely relied upon in all such inquiries. But if it be against religion to rely upon reason, then certainly these reasons intended to prove it so, are not to be relied upon; or else this is no question of religion. For if this be a question of religion, why are so many reasons used in it? If it be no question of religion, then we may, for all these reasons to the contrary, still use our reason in religion without prejudice to it. And if these reasons conclude right, then we may for these reasons' sake, trust the proposition which says, that in religion reason is to be used; but if these reasons do not conclude right, then there is no danger, but that reason may still be used, these arguments to the contrary notwithstanding.

17. But there is more in it than so: This foregoing discourse, or to the like purpose, is used by two sorts of persons; the one is by those, who in destitution of particular arguments, make their last recourse unto authority of men. For by how much more they press their own peremptory affirmative, by so much the less will they endure your reasons and arguments for the negative. But to these men I shall only say, "Let God be true, and every man a liar:" and therefore if we trust men concerning God, we do not trust God concerning men; that is, if we speak of God as men please, we do not think of men as God hath taught us; viz. that they are weak, and that they are liars: and they who have, by artifices and little devices, acquired to themselves a reputation, take the less care for proving what they say, by how much the greater credulity that is, by which men have given themselves up to be possessed by others. And if I would have my saying to prevail whether it be right or wrong, I shall the less endure that any man should use his own reason against me. And this is one of the great evils for which the church of Rome hath given christendom a great cause to complain of her, who not only presses men to believe or to submit to what she says upon her own authority, without enduring them to examine whether she says true or no, but also requires as great an assent to what she cannot prove, as to what she can; requiring an adherence not less than the greatest, even to those things which she only pretends to be able to prove by prudential motives. Indeed in these cases if they can obtain of men to bring their faith, they are safe; but to come accompanied with their reason too, that is dangerous.

18. The other sort of men, is of those who do the same thing under another cover; for they not having obtained the advantages of union or government, cannot pretend to a privileged authority; but resolving to obtrude their fancies upon the world, and yet not being able to prove what they say, pretend the Spirit of God to be the author of all their theorems. If they could prove him to be their author, the thing were at an end, and all the world were bound to lay their necks under that pleasant yoke; but because they cannot prove any thing, therefore it is that they pretend the Spirit for every thing: and if the noise of so sacred a name will persuade you, you are within the snare; if it will not, you are within their hatred. But it is impossible that these men can prevail, because there are so many of them; it is as if it were twenty mountebanks in the piazza, and all saying they had the only antidote in the world for poison; and that what was not theirs, was not at all, and yet all pretend severally. For all men cannot have the Spirit, unless all men speak the same thing: it were possible that even in union they might be deceivers: but in division they cannot be right; and therefore since all these men pretend the Spirit, and yet all speak several things and contradictory, they do well to desire of us not to use our reason; for if we do, they can never hope to prevail; if we do not, they may persuade, as they meet with fools, that were not possessed before.

19. Between these two there is a third, that pretends to no authority on one hand, nor enthusiasm on the other; but offers to prove what he says, but desires not his arguments to be examined by reason, upon pretence that he urges Scripture; that is, in effect, he must interpret it; but your reason shall not be judge whether he says right or wrong: for if you judge his interpretation, he says you judge of his argument, and make reason umpire in questions of faith: and thus his sect is continued, and the systems of divinity rely upon a certain number of propositions from generation to generation, and the scholar shall be no wiser than his master for ever; because he is taught to examine the doctrines of his master by his master's arguments, and by no other. In effect, they all agree in this, they would rule all the world by religion, and they would have nobody wiser than themselves, but be fools and slaves, till their turn come to use others as bad as they have been used themselves: and therefore, as the wolves offered peace to the sheep upon condition they would put away their dogs; so do these men allow us to be christians and disciples, if we lay aside our reason, which is that guard of our souls whereby alone we can be defended against their tyrannies and pretensions.

20. That I may therefore speak close to the inquiry, I premise these considerations:

(1.) It is a weak and a trifling principle, which supposes faith and reason to be opposite: for faith is but one way, by which our reason is instructed, and acquires the proper notices of things. For our reason or understanding apprehends things three several ways: the first is called νόησις, or the "first notices" of things abstract, of principles and the "primo intelligibilia;" such as are, 'The whole is greater than the half of the whole;—Good is to be chosen;—God is to be loved;—Nothing can be and not be at the same time;—for these are objects of the simple understanding, congenite notices, concreated with the understanding. The second is called διανόησις, or “discourse,” that is, such consequents and emanations which the understanding draws from her first principles. And the third is πίστις, that is, such things which the understanding assents to upon the report, testimony, and affirmation of others, viz. by arguments extrinsical to the nature of the thing, and by collateral and indirect principles. For example, I naturally know that an idol or a false god is nothing; that is νόησις, or the act of abstract and immaterial reason. From hence I infer, that an idol is not to be worshipped; this my reason knows by διανόησις, or illation and inference, from the first principle. But therefore, that all monuments of idolatry are to be destroyed, was known to the Jews by πίστις, for it was not primely known, nor by the direct force of any thing that was primely known; but I know it from God by the testimony of Moses, into the notice of which I am brought by collateral arguments, by tradition, by miracle, by voices from heaven, and the like.

21. (2.) These three ways of knowing, are in all faculties sacred and profane: for faith and reason do not divide theology and philosophy, but in every science reason hath notices all these ways. For in natural philosophy there are prime principles, and there are conclusions drawn from thence, and propositions which we believe from the authority of Plato, or Socrates, or Aristotle; and so it is in theology; for every thing in Scripture is not, in the divided sense, a matter of faith: that the sun is to rule the day, the moon and the stars to govern the night, I see and feel: that God is good, that he is one, are prime principles: that nothing but good is to be spoken of this good God, reason draws by a διανόησις, or discourse and illation: but that this good God will chastise his sons and servants, and that afflictions sent upon us are the issues of his goodness, or that this one God is also three in person, this is known by πίστις, or by belief; for it is not a prime truth, nor yet naturally inferred from a prime truth, but told by God, and therefore is an object of faith; reason knows it by testimony, and by indirect and collateral probations.

22. (3.) Reason knows all things as they are to be known, and enters into its notices by instruments fitted to the nature of things. Our stock of principles is more limited than our stock of words; and as there are more things than words, so there are more ways of knowing than by principles direct and natural. Now as God teaches us many things by natural principles, many by experience, many at first, many more in time; some by the rules of one faculty, some by the rules of another; so there are some things which descend upon us immediately from heaven, and they communicate with no principle, with no matter, with no conclusion here below. Now as in the other things we must come to notices of things, by deriving them from their proper fountains; so must we do in these. He that should go to revelation to prove that nine and nine make eighteen, would be a fool; and he would be no less, that goes about to prove a trinity of persons by natural reason. Every thing must be derived from its own fountain. But because these things, which are derivatives from heaven, and communicate not at all with principles of philosophy or geometry, yet have their proper fountains, and these fountains are too high for us to search into their bottom, we must plainly take all emanations from them, just as they descend. For in this case, all that is to be done, is to inquire from whence they come. If they come from natural principles, I search for them by direct arguments: if they come from higher, I search for them by indirect arguments; that is, I inquire only for matter of fact, whether they come thence or no. But here my reason is set on work; first, I inquire into the testimony or ways of probation, if they be worth believing in what they say, my reason sucks it in. As if I be told that God said, “There are three and one in heaven,” I ask, Who said it? Is he credible? Why? If I find that all things satisfy my reason, I believe him saying that God said so; and then πίστις or faith enters. I believe the thing also, not because I can prove it directly, for I cannot,—but I can prove it indirectly; testimony and authority are my argument, and that is sufficient. The apostles entered into much of their faith by their senses, they saw many articles of their creed; but as they which saw and believed were blessed, so they which see not, but are argued and disputed into their faith, and believe what they find reasonable to believe, shall have the reward of their faith, while they wisely follow their reason.

23. (4.) Now in all this, here is no difference in my reason, save that as it does not prove a geometrical proposition by moral philosophy, so neither does it prove a revelation by a natural argument, but into one and the other it enters by principles proper to the inquisition; and faith and reason are not opposed at all. Faith and natural reason are several things, and arithmetical and moral reasons are as differing, but it is reason that carries me to objects of faith, and faith is my reason so disposed, so used, so instructed.

The Result of these Propositions is this one:

24. That into the greatest mysteriousness of our religion, and the deepest articles of faith, we enter by our reason; not that we can prove every one of them by natural reason; for to say that, were as vain as to say we ought to prove them by arithmetic or rules of music; but whosoever believes wisely and not by chance, enters into his faith by the hand of reason; that is, he hath causes and reasons why he believes. He indeed that hath reasons insufficient and incompetent, believes indeed not wisely, but for some reason or other he does it; but he that hath none, does not believe at all; for the understanding is a rational faculty, and therefore every act of the understanding is an act of the rational faculty, and that is an act of reason; as vision is of the visive faculty; and faith, which is an act or habit of the understanding consenting to certain propositions for the authority of the speaker, is also as much an act of reason, as to discourse in a proposition of Aristotle. For faith, assenting to a proposition for a reason drawn "à testimonio," is as very a discourse, as to assent to a proposition for a reason drawn from the nature of things. It is not less an act of reason, because it uses another topic. And all this is plain and certain, when we discourse of faith formally in its proper and natural capacity, that is, as it is a reception of propositions "à testimonio."

25. Indeed if we consider faith as it is a habit infused by God, and by God's Holy Spirit, so there is something more in it than thus: for so, faith is a vital principle, a magazine of secret truths, which we could never have found out by natural reason, that is, by all that reason which is born with us, and by all that reason that grows with us, and by all secular experiences and conversations with the world; but of such things which God only teaches, by ways supernatural and divine.

26. Now here is the close and secret of the question, whether or no faith, in this sense, and materially taken, be contrary to our worldly or natural reason,—or whether is any or all the propositions of faith to be exacted, interpreted, and understood, according to this reason materially taken? that is, are not our reasons, which we rightly follow in natural philosophy, in metaphysics, in other arts and sciences, sometimes contrary to faith? and if they be, whether shall be followed? Or can it, in any sense, be an article of faith, if it be contrary to right reason? I answer to this by several propositions.

27. (1.) Right reason (meaning our right reason, or human reason) is not the affirmative or positive measure of things divine, or of articles and mysteries of faith; and the reasons are plain: 1. Because many of them depend upon the free will of God; for which, till he gives us reasons, we are to be still and silent, admiring the secret, and adoring the wisdom, and expecting till the curtain be drawn, or till Elias come and tell us all things. But he,—that will inquire and pry into the reason of the mystery, and because he cannot perceive it, will disbelieve the thing, or undervalue it, and say it is not at all, because he does not understand the reason of it, and why it should be so,—may as well say, that his prince does not raise an army in time of peace, because he does not know a reason why he should; or that God never did suffer a brave prince to die ignobly, because it was a thousand pities he should. There is a "ragione di stato," and a "ragione di regno," and a "ragione di cielo," after which none but fools will inquire, and none but the humble shall ever find.

28. Who can tell why the devil, who is a wise and intelligent creature, should so spitefully, and for no end but for mischief, tempt so many souls to ruin, when he knows it can do him no good, no pleasure, but fantastic? or who can tell why he should be delighted in a pleasure that can be nothing but fantastic, when he knows things by intuition, not by phantasm, and hath no low conceit of things as we have? or why he should do so many things against God, whom he knows he cannot hurt,—and against souls, whose ruin cannot add one moment of pleasure to him? and if it makes any change, it is infinitely to the worse: that these things are so, our religion tells us; but our reason cannot reach why it is so, or how. Whose reason can give an account why, or understand it to be reasonable, that God should permit evil for good ends, when he hates that evil, and can produce that good without that evil? and yet that he does so we are taught by our religion. Whose reason can make it intelligible, that God, who delights not in the death of a sinner, but he and his Christ, and all their angels, rejoice infinitely in the salvation of a sinner, yet that he should not cause that every sinner should be saved, working in him a mighty and a prevailing grace, without which grace he shall not in the event of things be saved, and yet this grace is wholly his own production?

Why does not he work in us all to will and to do, not only that we can will, but that we shall will? for if the actual willing be any thing, it is his creation; we can create nothing; we cannot will unless he effect it in us: and why he does not do that which so well pleases him, and for the want of the doing of which he is so displeased, and yet he alone is to do it some way or other, human reason cannot give a wise or a probable account.

Where is the wise discourser, that can tell how it can be, that God foreknows certainly what I should do ten years hence, and yet it is free to me at that time, to will or not to will, to do or not to do, that thing? Where is the discerning searcher of secrets, that can give the reason why God should determine, for so many ages before, that Judas should betray Christ, and yet that God should kill him eternally for effecting the Divine purpose, and foredetermined counsel? Well may we wonder that God should wash a soul with water, and with bread and wine nourish us up to immortality, and make real impressions upon our spirits by the blood of the vine, and the kidneys of wheat; but who can tell why he should choose such mean instruments to effect such glorious promises? since even the greatest things of this world had not been disproportionate instruments to such effects, nor yet too great for our understanding; and that we are fain to stoop to make these mean elements be even with our faith and with our understanding. Who can divine, and give us the cause, or understand the reason, why God should give us so great rewards for such nothings, and yet damn men for such insignificant mischiefs, for thoughts, for words, for secret wishes, that effect no evil abroad, but only might have done, or, it may be, were resolved to be inactive: for if the goodness of God be so overflowing in some cases, we in our reason should not expect, that in such a great goodness there should be so great an aptness to destroy men greatly for little things: and if all mankind should join in search, it could never be told, why God should adjudge the heathen or the Israelites to an eternal hell, of which he never gave them warning, nor created fears great enough to produce caution equal to their danger; and who can give a reason, why, for temporal and transient actions of sin, the world is to expect never-ceasing torments in hell to eternal ages? That these things are thus, we are taught in Scripture, but here our reason is not instructed to tell why or how; and therefore our reason is not the positive measure of mysteries, and we must believe what we cannot understand.

29. Thus are they to be blamed, who make intricacies and circles in mysterious articles, because they cannot wade through them; it is not to be understood why God should send his only Son from his bosom to redeem us, to pay our price; nor to be told why God should exact a price of himself for his own creature; nor to be made intelligible to us, why he who loved us so well, as to send his Son to save us, should at the same time so hate us, as to resolve to damn us, unless his Son should come and save us. But the Socinians, who conclude that this was not thus, because they know not how it can be thus, are highly to be reprov'd for their excess in the inquiries of reason, not where she is not a competent judge, but where she is not competently instructed; and that is the second reason.

30. (2.) The reason of man is a right judge always when she is truly informed; but in many things she knows nothing but the face of the article; the mysteries of faith are oftentimes like cherubim's heads placed over the propitiatory, where you may see a clear and a bright face and golden wings, but there is no body to be handled; there is light and splendour upon the brow, but you may not grasp it; and though you see the revelation clear, and the article plain, yet the reason of it we cannot see at all; that is, the whole knowledge which we can have here, is dark and obscure; "We see as in a glass darkly," saith St. Paul; that is, we can see what, but not why; and what we do see, is the least part of that which does not appear: but in these cases our understanding is to submit, and wholly to be obedient, but not to inquire further. "Delicata est illa obedientia, quæ causas quærit." If the understanding will not consent to a revelation, until it see a reason of the proposition, it does not obey at all, for it will not submit till it cannot choose. In these cases, reason and religion are like Leah and Rachel; reason is fruitful indeed, and brings forth the first-born, but she is blear-eyed, and oftentimes knows not the secrets of her Lord; but Rachel produces two children, faith and piety, and obedience is mid-wife to them both, and modesty is the nurse.

31. From hence it follows, that we cannot safely conclude thus, "This is agreeable to right reason, therefore this is so in Scripture, or in the counsel of God;" not that one reason can be against another, when all things are equal, but that the state of things and of discourses is imperfect; and though it be right reason in such a constitution of affairs, yet it is not so in others: that a man may repel force by force, is right reason, and a natural right, but yet it follows not, that it can be lawful for a private christian to do it, or that Christ hath not forbidden us to strike him that strikes us. The reason of the difference is this; In nature it is just that it be so, because we are permitted only to nature's provisions, and she hath made us equal, and the condition of all men indifferent; and therefore we have the same power over another, that he hath over us; besides, we will do it naturally: and till a law forbade it, it could not be amiss, and there was no reason in nature to restrain it, but much to warrant it. But since the law of God hath forbidden it, he hath made other provisions for our indemnity, and where he permits us to be defenceless, (as in cases of martyrdom and the like,) he hath promised a reward to make infinite amends: so that "we may repel force by force," says nature; "we may not," says Christ; and yet they are not two contradictory propositions. For nature says we may, when otherwise we have no security, and no reward for suffering; but Christ hath given both the defence of laws and authority, and the reward of heaven, and therefore in this case it is reasonable. And thus we cannot conclude, This is a wicked man because he is afflicted, or his cause is evil because it does not thrive; although it be right reason, that good men ought to be happy and prosperous; because although reason says right in it, yet no reason can wisely conclude, that therefore so it should be in this world, when faith and reason too tell us it may be better hereafter. The result is this,—every thing that is above our understanding, is not therefore to be suspected or disbelieved; neither is any thing to be admitted that is against Scripture, though it be agreeable to right reason, until all information is brought in, by which the sentence is to be made.

32. For as it happens in dreams and madness, where the argument is good, and the discourse reasonable oftentimes; but because it is inferred from weak phantasms, and trifling and imperfect notices of things, and obscure apprehensions, therefore it is not only desultory and light, but insignificant, and far from ministering to knowledge: so it is in our reason as to matters of religion; it argues well and wisely, but because it is from trifling, or false, or uncertain principles, and unsure information, it oftentimes is but a witty nothing. Reason is an excellent limbeck, and will extract rare quintessences, but if you put in nothing but mushrooms, or eggshells, or the juice of colloquintida, or the filthy gingran, you must expect productions accordingly, useless or unpleasant, dangerous or damnable.

33. (3.) Although right reason is not the positive and affirmative measure of any article, yet it is the negative measure of every one. So that whatsoever is contradictory to right reason, is at no hand to be admitted as a mystery of faith; and this is certain upon an infinite account:

34. (1.) Because nothing can be true and false at the same time; otherwise it would follow that there could be two truths contrary to each other: for if the affirmative be true, and the negative true too, then the affirmative is true and is not true, which were a perfect contradiction, and we were bound to believe a lie, and hate a truth; and yet at the same time, obey what we hate, and consent to what we disbelieve: no man can serve two such masters.

35. (2.) Out of truth nothing can follow but truth; whatsoever therefore is truth, this is therefore safe to be followed, because no error can be the product of it. It follows therefore, that by believing one truth, no man can be tied to disbelieve another. Whatsoever therefore is contrary to right reason, or to a certain truth in any faculty, cannot be a truth, for one truth is not contrary to another: if therefore any proposition be said to be the doctrine of Scripture, and confessed to be against right reason, it is certainly not the doctrine of Scripture, because it cannot be true, and yet be against what is true.

36. (3.) All truths are emanations and derivatives from God; and therefore whatsoever is contrary to any truth, in any faculty whatsoever, is against the truth of God, and God cannot be contrary to himself: for as God is one, so truth is one; for truth is God's eldest daughter, and so like himself, that God may as well be multiplied, as abstracted truth.

37. (4.) And for this reason God does not only prove our religion, and Jesus Christ prove his mission, by miracles, by holiness, by verification of prophecies, and prediction of future contingencies, and voices from heaven, and apparition of angels, and resurrection from the grave, and fulfilling all that was said of him by the prophets, that our faith might enter into us by discourse, and dwell by love, and be nursed and supported by reason: but also God is pleased to verify his own proceedings and his own propositions, by discourses merely like ours, when we speak according to right reason. Thus God convinces^m the peevish people that spake evil of him, by arguing concerning the justice of his ways, and exposes his proceedings to be argued by the same measures and proportions by which he judges us, and we judge one another.

38. (5.) For indeed how can it be possibly otherwise? how can we confess God to be just if we understand it not? but how can we understand him so, but by the measures of justice? and how shall we know that, if there be two justices, one that we know, and one that we know not, one contrary to another? if they be contrary, they are not justice; for justice can be no more opposed by justice, than truth to truth: if they be not contrary, then that which we understand to be just in us, is just in God, and that which is just once, is just for ever in the same case and circumstances: and indeed how is it that we are, in all things of excellency and virtue, to be like God, and to be meek like Christ, "to be humble as he is humble," and to "be pure like God," to be just after his example, to be "merciful as our heavenly Father is merciful?" If there is but one mercy, and one justice, and one meekness, then the measure of these, and the reason, is eternally the same. If there be two, either they are not essential to God, or else not imitable by us: and then how can we glorify God, and speak honour of his name, and exalt his justice, and magnify his truth, and sincerity, and simplicity, if truth, and simplicity, and justice, and mercy, in him, are not that thing which we understand, and which we are to imitate? To give an example: I have promised to give my friend a hundred pounds on the calends of March: the day comes, and he expects the donative; but I send him answer, that I did promise so by an open promise and signification, and I had an inclination to do so; but I have also a secret will to keep my money, and instead of that to give him a hundred blows upon his back: if he reproaches me for an unjust and a false person; I have nothing to answer, for I believe he would hardly take it for good payment to be answered with a distinction, and told, I have two wills, an open and a secret will, and they are contrary to each other: he would tell me that I were a false person for having two wills, and those two wills were indeed but one, nothing but a will to deceive and abuse him. Now this is reason, right reason, the reason of all the world, the measure of all mankind, the measure that God hath given us to understand, and to walk, to live, and to practise by. And we cannot understand what is meant by hypocrisy, and dissembling, if to speak one thing and not to mean it, be not that hypocrisy. Now put the case, God should call us to give him the glory of his justice and sincerity, of the truth of his promises and the equity of his ways, and should tell us, that we perish by our own fault, and if we will die, it is because we will die, not because we must; because we choose it, not because he forces us; for he calls us, and offers us life and salvation, and gives us powers, and time, and advantages, and desires it really, and endeavours it passionately, and effects it materially, so far as it concerns his portion: this is a certain evidence of his truth and justice; but if we can reply, and say, It is true, O God, that thou dost call us, but dost never intend we should come; that thy open will is loving and plausible, but thy secret will is cruel, decretory, and destructive to us, whom thou hast reprobated; that thy open will is ineffective, but thy secret will only is operative, and productive of a material event, and therefore although we are taught to say, "Thou art just, and true in all thy sayings," yet certainly it is not that justice which thou hast commanded us to imitate and practise, it is not that sincerity which we can safely use to one another, and therefore either we men are not just when we think we are, or else thou art not just who doest and speakest contrary things, or else there are two contrary things which may be called justice.

39. For let it be considered as to the present instance; God cannot have two wills, it is against the unity of God and the simplicity of God. If there were two Divine wills, there were two Gods; and if it be one will, then it cannot, at the same time, will contrary things; and if it does not, then when God says one thing, and yet he wills it not, it is because he only wills to say it, and not to do it; and if to say this thing of the good, the just, the true, the righteous Judge of all the world be not blasphemy, I know not what is.

40. The purpose of this instance is to exemplify, that in all virtues and excellencies there is a perfect unity: and because all is originally and essentially in God, and from him derived to us, and all our good, our mercy, our truth, our justice, is but an imitation of his, it follows demonstratively, that what is unjust in men, and what is falsehood in our intercourses, is therefore false or unjust, because it is contrary to the eternal pattern: and therefore whatsoever our reason does rightly call unjust, or hypocrisy, or falsehood, must needs be infinitely far from God; and those propositions which asperse God with any thing of this nature, are so far from being the word of God, or an article of faith, or a mystery of religion, that it is blasphemous and false, hateful to God and good men.

41. In these things there is the greater certainty, because there is the less variety and no mystery; these things which in God we adore as attributes, being the lines of our duty, the limits and scores we are to walk by; therefore as our reason is here best instructed, so it cannot easily be deceived, and we can better tell what is right reason in these things, than in questions not so immediately relative to duty and morality.

42. But yet this rule also holds in every thing where reason is, or can be, right; but with some little difference of expression, but generally thus:

43. (1.) Whatsoever right reason says cannot be done, we cannot pretend from Scripture, that it belongs to God's almightiness to do it; it is no part of the Divine omnipotency, to do things contradictory; for that is not to be done which is not, and it is no part of power to do that which is not an act or effect of power. Now in every contradictory, one part is a nonentity, a nothing, and therefore by power cannot be produced; and to suppose it producible, or possible to be effected by an almighty power, is to suppose an almighty power to be no power, or to do that which is not the effect of power.

44. But I need say no more of this, for all men grant it, and all sects and varieties of christians endeavour to clear their articles from inferring contradictions, as implicitly confessing, that it cannot be true, to which any thing that is true is contradictory. Only some men are forced by their interest and opinions to say, that although to human reason some of their articles seem to have in them contradictions, yet it is the defect of their reason, and their faith is the more excellent, by how much reason is more at a loss. So do the Lutherans about the ubiquity of Christ's body, and the papists about transubstantiation, and the Calvinists about absolute reprobation, as being resolved upon the propositions, though heaven and earth confute them. For if men can be safe from argument with such a little artifice as this, then no error can be confuted, then there is nothing so absurd but may be maintained, and a man's reason is useless in inquiry and in probation; and (which is to me very considerable) no man can, in any article, be a heretic, or sin against his conscience. For to speak against the words of Scripture, is not directly against our conscience, there are many ways to escape, by interpretation or authority; but to profess an article against our reason, is immediately against our conscience; for reason and conscience dwell under the same roof, and eat the same portions of meat, and drink the same chalice: the authority of Scripture is superinduced, but right reason is the eternal word of God, "The kingdom of God that is within us;" and the best portions of Scripture, even the law of Jesus Christ, which in moral things is the eternal law of nature, is written in our hearts, is reason, and that wisdom to which we cannot choose but assent; and therefore in whatsoever he goes against his reason, he must needs go against his conscience, because he goes against that, by which he supposes God did intend to govern him, reason not having been placed in us as a snare and a temptation, but as a light and a star to lead us by day and night. It is no wonder that men maintain absurd propositions, who will not hear great reason against them, but are willing to take excuses and pretences for the justification of them.

45. (2.) This is not to be understood, as if God could do nothing but what we can with our reason comprehend or know how. For God can do every thing, but we cannot understand every thing: and therefore infinite things there are, or may be, which our reason cannot master; they are above our understanding, but are to be entertained by faith. It is not to be said or believed, that God can do what right reason says cannot be: but it must be said and believed that God can do those things, to which our understanding cannot, by all its powers ministered here below, attain. For since God is omnipotent, unless we were omniscient we could not understand all that he can do; but although we know but little, yet we know some propositions which are truths taught us by God, and they are the measures whereby we are to speak and believe concerning the works of God.

46. For it is to be considered, whatsoever is above our understanding is not against it: "supra" and "secundum" may consist together in several degrees: thus we understand the Divine power of working miracles, and we believe and know God hath done many; and although we know not how our dead bones shall live again, yet our reason tells us that it is within the power of God to effect it; and therefore our faith need not be troubled to believe it. But if a thing be against our understanding, it is against the work of God, and against a truth of God, and therefore is no part, and it can be no effect, of the Divine power: many things in nature are above our understanding, and no wonder if many things in grace are so too; "The peace of God passeth all understanding," yet we feel something of it, and hope for more, and long for all, and believe what we yet cannot perceive. But I consider further:

47. There are some things in reason which are certainly true, and some things which reason does infallibly condemn: our blessed Saviour's argument was certain, "A spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye perceive me to have:" therefore I am no spirit: and St. John's argument was certain, "That which we have seen with our eyes, and heard with our ears, and which our hands have handled of the word of life, that we preach," that is, we are to believe what we see, and hear, and feel; and as this is true in the whole religion, so it is true in every article of it. If right sense and right reason tell us clearly, that is, tell us so that there is no absurdness, or contradiction, or unreasonableness in it, we are to believe it, as we are to believe God; and if an angel from heaven should tell us any thing against these propositions, I do not doubt but we would reject him. Now if we inquire what things are certainly true or false; I must answer, that in the first place I reckon prime principles and contradictions; in the next place, those things which are manifestly absurd: but if it be asked further, which things are manifestly absurd, and what it is to be manifestly absurd? there can no more answer be given to this, than to him who asks, How shall I know whether I am in light or darkness? If therefore it be possible for men to dote in such things as these, their reason is useless in its greatest force and highest powers: it must therefore be certain, that if the parts of a contradiction or a right reason be put in bar against a proposition, it must not pretend to be an article of faith; and to pretend God's omnipotency against it, is to pretend his power against his truth. God can deliver us from our enemies, when to human reason it seems impossible, that is, when we are destitute of all natural help, and proper causes and probabilities of escape, by what we see or feel; that is, when it is impossible to men, it may be possible with God; but then the faith which believes that God can do it, is also very right reason; and if we hope he will do it, there is more than faith in it, but there is nothing in it beyond reason, except love also be there.

48. The result is this: (1.) Our reason is below many of the works, and below all the power, of God, and therefore cannot perceive all that God hath, or can, or will do, no more than an owl can stare upon the body of the sun, or tell us what strange things are in that immense globe of fire. But when any thing that is possible, is revealed, reason can consent; but if reason cannot consent to it when it is told of it, then it is nothing, it hath no being, it hath no possibility: whatsoever is in our understanding is in being; for that which is not, is not intelligible; and to what reason cannot consent, in that no being can be supposed.

49. (2.) Not only what is impossible to reason, is possible in faith, but if any thing be really absurd or unreasonable, that is, against some truth, in which human reason is really instructed, that is a sufficient presumption against a proposition, that it cannot be an article of faith. For even this very thing, I mean, an avoiding of an absurdity, or an inconvenience, is the only measure and rule of interpreting very many places of Scripture. For why does not every christian pull out his right eye, or cut off his hand, and leg, that he might enter into heaven halt and blind? why do not we believe that Christ is a door, and a vine, and a stone, since these things are dogmatically affirmed in Scripture? but that we expound scriptures as we confute them who deny principles, by declaring that such senses or opinions introduce evil and foolish consequents, against some other truth in some faculty or other in which human reason is rightly taught. Now the measure and the limit of this, is that very thing which is the reason of this, and all the preceding discourse,—One truth cannot be against another:—if therefore your opinion or interpretation be against a truth, it is false, and no part of faith. A commandment cannot be against a revelation, a privilege cannot be against a promise, a threatening cannot mean against an article, a right cannot be against a duty; for all reason, and all right, and all truth, and all faith, and all commandments, are from God, and therefore partake of his unity and his simplicity.

50. (3.) This is to be enlarged with this advice, that in all questions of the sense of Scripture, the ordinary way is to be presumed before the extraordinary: and if the plain way be possible, and reasonable, and useful, and the extraordinary of no other use, but to make wonder and strangeness to the belief of the understanding, we are to presume for that, and to let this alone, because that hath the advantage of reason, it being more reasonable that God will keep the methods of his own creation, and bring us to him by ways with which we are acquainted, and by which we can better understand our way to him, than that he will do a miracle to no purpose, and without necessity; God never doing any thing for the ostentation, but very many things for the manifestation, of his power: for his wisdom and his power declare each other, and in every thing where he shows his mightiness, he also shows his wisdom, that is, he never does any thing without great reason. And therefore the Roman doctrine of the holy sacrament suffers an intolerable prejudice, because it supposes daily heaps and conjugations of miracles, wholly to no purpose; since the real body can be taken by them to whom it does no good; and all the good can be conveyed to us, though the body be only taken in a spiritual sense; all the good being conveyed by moral instruments, and to spiritual effect; and therefore the ordinary way, and the sense which the church of England gives, is infinitely to be preferred, because it supposes no violences and effects of miracles, no cramps and convulsions to reason: and a man may receive the holy sacrament, and discourse of all its effects and mysteriousnesses, though he do not talk like a madman, or a man going out of his wits, and a stranger to all the reason and philosophy of the world: and therefore it is remarkable, that there is in our faith no article, but what is possible to be effected by the ordinary power of God: that a virgin should conceive is so possible to God's power, that it is possible in nature, say the Arabians; but however, he that made the virgin out of nothing, can make her produce something out of something: and for the resurrection of the dead, it is certainly less than the creation, and it is like that which we see every year, in the resurrection of plants and dead corn, and is in many degrees imitable by art, which can out of ashes raise a flower. And for all the other articles of our creed, they are so far from being miraculous and strange to reason, that the greatest wonder is, that our belief is so simple and facile, and that we shall receive so great and prodigious events hereafter, by instruments so fitted to the weakest capacities of men here below. Indeed some men have so scorned the simplicity of the gospel, that because they thought it honourable to have every thing strange and unintelligible, they have put in devices and dreams of miracles of their own, and have so explicated them, that as without many miracles they could not be verified, so without one they can hardly be understood. That which is easy to reason and most intelligible, is more like the plainness, and truth, and innocence, and wisdom, of the gospel, than that which is bones to philosophy, and iron to the teeth of babes.

51. But this is to be practised with caution; for every man's reason is not right, and every man's reason is not to be trusted: and therefore,

(4.) As absurd foolish things are not to be obtruded, under the pretence of being mysteries, so neither must mistaken philosophy, and false notices of things, be pretended for reason. There are mistakes on all hands, some christians explicate their mysteries, and mince them into so many minutes and niceties, and speak of them more than they are taught, more than is said in the Scriptures, or the first creeds, that the article, — which in its own simplicity was indeed mysterious, and not to be comprehended by our dark and less instructed reason, but yet was not impossible to be believed, — is made impossible to be understood by the appendages, and exposed to scorn and violences by heretics and misbelievers: so is the incarnation of the Son of God, the mysterious Trinity, the presence of Christ in the holy sacrament. For so long as the mysteries are signified in simple, wise, and general terms, reason can espy no particular impossibilities in them: but when men will explicate what they cannot understand, and intricate what they pretend to explicate, and superinduce new clauses to the article, and by entering within the cloud do less see the light, — they find reason amazed, where she could easily have submitted, and clouds brought upon the main article, and many times the body itself is supposed to be a phantasm, because of its tinsel and fairy dressing: and on the other side, he that would examine an article of faith by a proportion in philosophy, must be careful that his philosophy be as right as he pretends. For as it will be hard to expect that right reason should submit to a false article upon pretence it is revealed, so it will be as hard to distrust an article, because it is against a false proposition, which I was taught in those schools of learning, who speak things by custom, or by chance, or because they are taught, and because they are not suffered to be examined. Whoever offers at a reproof of reason, must be sure that he is right in the article, and that must be upon the strength of stronger reason; and he that offers by reason to reprove a pretended article, must be sure his reason must be greater than the reverence of that pretension.

52. And therefore Holy Scriptures command us in those cases to such purposes, as not only teach us what to do in it, but also confirm the main inquiry; for therefore we are commanded to "try all things;" suppose that be meant that we try them by Scriptures; how can we so try them, but by comparing line with line, by considering the consequents of every pretence, the analogy of faith, the measures of justice, the laws of nature, essential right, and prime principles? And all this is nothing but by making our faith the limit of our reason, in matters of duty to God; and reason the minister of faith, and things that concern our duty. The same is intended by those other words of another apostle, "Beloved, believe not every spirit, but try if the spirits be of God;" how can this be tried? By Scripture? Yea; but how if the question be of the sense of Scripture, as it is generally at this day? Then it must be tried by something extrinsical to the question, and whatsoever you can call to judgment, reason must still be your solicitor and your advocate and your judge; only reason is not always the law; sometimes it is, for so our blessed Saviour was pleased to say, "Why of yourselves do you not judge that which is reasonable?"^a For so δικαιον there is used, "that which is fitting and consonant to reason;" and in proportion to this it was, that so much of the religion of Jesus was clothed with parables, as if the theorems and propositions themselves were clothed with flesh and blood, and conversed after the manner of men, to whom reason is the law and the rule, the guide and the judge, the measure of good and evil for this life, and for that which is to come. The consequent is this:

53. He that says thus, "This doctrine is against the word of God, and therefore it is absurd and against reason," may, as it falls out, say true; but his proposition will be of no use, because reason is before revelation, and that this is revealed by God must be proved by reason. But,

54. He that says, "This is absurd, or this is against reason, therefore this is against the word of God," if he says true in the antecedent, says true in the consequent, and the argument is useful in the whole, it being the best way to interpret difficult scriptures, and to establish right senses, and to con-fute confident heresies. For when both sides agree that these are the words of God, and the question of faith is concerning the meaning of the words, nothing is an article of faith, or a part of the religion, but what can be proved by reasons to be the sense and intention of God. Reason is never to be pretended against the clear sense of Scripture, because by reason it is that we came to perceive that to be the clear sense of Scripture. And against reason, reason cannot be pretended; but against the words of Scripture produced in a question, there may be great cause to bring reason; for nothing seems plainer than those words of St. James, "Above all things, my brethren, swear not at all;" and yet reason interposes and tells us, that plain words must not be understood against plain reason and plain necessity: for if oaths before magistrates were not permitted and allowed, it were necessary to examine all men by torture; and yet neither so could they so well be secured of truth as they can by swearing. What is more plain than the words of St. Paul? Νεκρώσατε τὰ μέλη ὑμῶν, τὰ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, "Mortify (or kill) your members, that are upon the earth;" and yet reason tells us, that we must not hurt or destroy one limb; and wherever the effect would be intolerable, there the sense is still unreasonable; and therefore not a part of faith, so long as it is an enemy to reason, which is the elder sister, and the guide and guardian of the younger.

55. For as when the tables of the law were broken by Moses, God would make no new ones, but bade Moses provide some stones of his own, and he would write them over: so it is in our religion;—when God with the finger of his Spirit writes the religion and the laws of Jesus Christ, he writes them in the tables of our reason, that is, "in the tables of our hearts."—"Homo cordatus," "a wise, rational man," sober, and humble, and discursive, hath the best faith: but the ἄστοι, (as St. Paul calls them), "the unreasonable," they are such who "have no faith,"^p for the christian religion is called by St. Paul λογικὴ λατρεία, "a reasonable worship;" and the word of God is called by St. Peter,^q γάλα λογικὸν ἄδολον, "the reasonable and uncraffy milk;" it is full of reason, but it hath no tricks, it is rational, but not crafty, it is wise and holy: and he that pretends there are some things in our religion, which right reason cannot digest and admit, makes it impossible to reduce atheists, or to convert Jews and heathens. But if reason invites them in, reason can entertain them all the day.

And now to the arguments brought against the use of reason; the answers may easily be gathered from the premises:

56. To the first I answer, that reason is the eye of the soul in all things, natural, moral, and religious; and faith is the light of that eye, in things pertaining to God; for it is true, that natural reason cannot teach us the things of God: that is, reason instructed only by this world, which St. Paul calls "the natural man,"—cannot discern the things of the Spirit, for they are "spiritually discerned:"

that is, that they are taught and perceived by the aids of God's Spirit, by revelation and Divine assistances, and grace: but though natural reason cannot, yet it is false to say that reason cannot; for reason illuminated can perceive the things of God; that is, when reason is taught in that faculty, under that master, and by those rules which are proper for spiritual things, then reason can do all its intentions.

57. To the second I answer, that therefore humility and piety are the best dispositions to the understanding the secrets of the gospel.

(1.) Because these do remove those prejudices and obstructions which are bars and fetters to reason; and the humble man does best understand, because the proud man will not inquire, or he will not labour, or he will not understand any proposition that makes it necessary for him to lay aside his employment or his vanity, his interest or his vice.

(2.) These are indeed excellent dispositions to understanding, the best moral instruments, but not the best natural: if you are to dispute against a heathen, a good reason will sooner convince him than an humble thought; if you be to convert a Jew, an argument from the old prophets is better to him than three or four acts of a gracious comportment.

(3.) Sometimes by way of blessing and reward, God gives understanding to good persons, which to the evil he denies; but this which effects any thing by way of Divine blessing, is not to be supposed the best natural instrument. Thus the divines say, that the fire of hell shall torment souls, "tanquam instrumentum divinæ voluntatis," as the instrument in the hand of a voluntary and almighty agent, but not as a thing apportioned properly to such an event,—for the worm of conscience is more apt to that purpose.

(4.) And when we compare man with man, so it is true that the pious man should be sooner instructed than the impious, "cæteris paribus;" but if we compare discourse and piety, reason and humility, they excel each other in their several kinds, as wool is better than a diamond, and yet a diamond is to be preferred before a bag of wool; they operate to the same purpose of understanding in several manners: and whereas it is said in the argument, that "the doctrine of the cross was foolishness to the Greeks," it is true, but nothing to the present question. For therefore it was foolishness to them, because they had not been taught in the secrets of God, they were not instructed how God would, by a way so contrary to flesh and blood, cause the spirits of just men to be made perfect. And they who were wise by Plato's philosophy, and only well skilled in Aristotle, could do nothing in the schools of Jesus, because they were not instructed in those truths by which such proceedings were to be measured; but still, reason is the great wheel, though according as the motion was intended, new weights must be proportioned accordingly.

58. The third objection presses upon the point of duty, and "because the Scripture requires obedience of understanding, and submitting our most imperious faculties, therefore reason is to be excluded:" to this I answer, that we must submit our understanding to God, is very true, but that is only when God speaks. But because we heard him not, and are only told that God did speak, our reason must examine whether it be fit to believe them that tell us so; for some men have spoken falsely, and we have great reason to believe God, when all the reason in the world commands us to suspect the offerings of some men; and although we ought, for the greatest reasons, submit to God, yet we must judge and discern the sayings of God, from the pretences of men; and how that can be done without using our reason in the inquiries of religion, is not yet discovered; but for the obedience of understanding, it consists in these particulars.

The Particulars in which Obedience of Understanding consists.

59. (1.) That we submit to God only and not to man; that is, to God wherever it appears reasonable to be believed that he hath spoken,—but never to man, unless he hath authority from reason or religion to command our conformity.

60. (2.) That those things which, by the abuse and pretence of reason, are passed into a fictitious and usurped authority, make no part of our religion; for because we are commanded to submit our understanding to God, therefore we must “call no man master upon earth;” therefore it is certain that we must not believe the reports or opinions of men against a revelation of God. He that communicates with holy bread only, and gives not the chalice to all God’s people that require the holy communion, does openly adhere to a fond custom and authority of abused men, and leaves the express, clearest undeniable institution of God.

61. (3.) When reason and revelation seem to disagree, let us so order ourselves, that so long as we believe this to be a revelation, no pretence of reason may change our belief from it: if right or sufficient reason can persuade us that this is not a revelation,—well and good; but if reason leave us in the actual persuasion that it is so, we must force our reason to comply with this, since no reason does force us to quit this wholly; and if we cannot quit our reason or satisfy it, let us carry ourselves with modesty, and confess the revelation, though with profession of our ignorance and unskilfulness to reconcile the two litigants.

62. (4.) That whatsoever is clearly and plainly told us, we obey it, and rest in it, and not measure it by the rules of folly and weak philosophy, or the sayings of men, in which error may be ingredient; but when things are unequal, that is, when we can doubt concerning our reason, and cannot doubt concerning the revelation, we make no question, but prefer this before that.

63. (5.) That in particular inquiries, we so order ourselves as to make this the general measure, that we never do violence to the word of God, or suspect that, but resolve rather to call ourselves liars, than that religion should receive detriment; and rather quit our arguments than hazard an article; that is, that when all things are equal, we rather prefer the pretence of revelation, than the pretences of reason, for the reverence of that and the suspicion of this. Beyond this we can do no more.

64. To the fourth I answer, that it is true, reason is fallible; or rather, to speak properly, ratiocination, or the using of reason, is subject to abuse and deception; for reason itself is not fallible; but if reason, that is, reasonings, be fallible, so are the pretences of revelation subject to abuse; and what are we now the nearer? Some reasons are but probable, and some are certain and confessed, and so it is in the sense of scriptures, some are plain and need no interpreter, no discourse, no art, no reasonings, to draw out their sense; but many are intricate and obscure, secret and mysterious; and to use a fallible reasoning to draw out an obscure and uncertain sense of Scripture, is sometimes the best way we have, and then we must make the best of it we can: but the use of reasoning is not only to find out truth the best we can, but sometimes we are as sure of it as of light; but then and always our reason (such as it is) must lead us into such proportions of faith as they can: according as our reason or motives are, so ordinarily is the degree of our faith.

65. To the fifth I need give no other answer but this, that it confesses the main question; for if this be the greatest reason in the world, “God hath said it, therefore it is true,” it follows, that all our faith relies upon this one reason; but because this reason is of no use to us till the minor proposition be proved, and that it appear that God hath said it, and that in the inquiry after that, we are to use all our reason;—the consequent is, that in the first and last, reason lends legs to faith,—and nothing can be wisely believed, but what can, by some rational inducement, be proved. As for the last proposition in the objection, “This is against Scripture, therefore it is absurd and unreasonable,” I have already made it appear to be an imprudent and useless affirmative.

66. The sixth objection complains of them that by weak reasonings lose their religion,—but this is nothing against right reasoning; for because mountebanks and old women kill men by vile physic, therefore is it true, that the wise discourses of physicians cannot minister to health? Half-witted people talk against God, and make objections against religion, and themselves have not wit or will enough to answer them,—and they intending to make reason to be the positive and affirmative measure of religion, are wholly mistaken, and abuse themselves and others. 2. We are not to exact every thing in religion according to our weak reasonings; but whatsoever is certain in reason, religion cannot contradict that; but what is uncertain or imperfect, religion oftentimes does instruct and amend it. But there are many mysteries of religion contrary to reason, corrupted with evil manners; and many are contrary to reason, corrupted with false propositions; now these men make objections, which upon their own principles they can never answer: but that which seems impossible to vicious persons, is reason to good men; and that which children and fools cannot answer, amongst wise men hath no difficulty; and "the ignorant, and the unstable, wrest some scriptures to their own damnation:" but concerning the new atheists that pretend to wit, it is not their reason, but their want of reason, that makes them such; for if either they had more learning, or did believe themselves to have less, they could never be atheists.

67. To the last I answer, (1.) that it is reason we should hear reason wherever we find it, if there be no greater evil brought by the teacher than he can bring good; but if a heretic preaches good things, it is not always lawful to hear them, unless when we are out of danger of his abuses also. And thus truth from the devil may be heard, if we were out of his danger; but because he tells truth to evil purposes, and makes wise sayings to become craft, it is not safe to hear him. (2.) But besides this, although it is lawful to believe a truth which the devil tells us, yet it is not lawful to go to school to the devil, or to make inquiries of him; because he that does so, makes him his master, and gives something of God's portion to God's enemy. As for judicial astrology and genethliacal predictions, for my part I therefore reprove them, not because their reason is against religion, for certainly it cannot be; but because I think they have not reason enough in what they say; they go upon weak principles which they cannot prove; they reduce them to practice by impossible mediums; they draw conclusions with artless and unskilful heads; they argue about things with which they have little conversation; they cannot make scientific progress in their profession, but out of greediness to do something; they usually, at least are justly suspected to, take in auxiliaries from the spirits of darkness; they have always spoken uncertainly, and most part falsely; and have always lived scandalously in their profession: they have by all religions been cried down, trusted by none but fools and superstitious people; and therefore, although the art may be very lawful, if the stars were upon the earth, or the men were in heaven, if they had skill in what they profess, and reason in all their pretences, and after all, that their principles were certain, and that the stars did really signify future events, and that those events were not overruled by every thing in heaven and in earth, by God, and by our own will and wisdom,—yet because here is so little reason, and less certainty, and nothing but confidence and illusion, therefore it is that religion permits them not; and it is not the reason in this art, that is against religion, but the folly or the knavery of it, and the dangerous and horrid consequents which they feel, that run a whoring after such idols of imagination.

RULE IV.

A Judgment of Nature, or Inclination, is not sufficient to make a sure Conscience.

1. BECAUSE this rule is of good use, not only for making judgment concerning the states of some men, but also in order to many practices, it will not be lost labour to consider that there are three degrees of practical judgment.

2. The first is called an inclination, or the first natural consonancy between the faculty or disposition of man, and some certain actions. All men are naturally pitiful, in some degree, unless their nature be lame and imperfect: as we say, all men naturally can see,—and it is true, if they have good eyes: so all men naturally are pitiful, unless they have no bowels: but some more, some less. And therefore there is in their natures a conveniency, or agreeing between their dispositions and acts of charity. 1. In the lowest sort there is an aptness to it. 2. In the sweeter and better natures there is a virtual charity. 3. But in those that consider and choose, and observe the commandment, or the proportions of right reason, there is in these only a formal, deliberative, compound, or practical judgment.

3. Now concerning the first sort, that is, the natural disposition or first propensity, it is but a remote disposition towards a right conscience and a practical judgment; because it may be rescinded, or diverted by a thousand accidents, and is nothing else but a relic of the shipwreck which Adam and all the world have made, and may pass into nothing as suddenly as it came. He that sees two cocks fight, though he have no interest in either, will assist one of them at least by an ineffective pity and desire: but this passes no further than to natural effects, or the changes or affections of a loadstone; it may produce something in nature, but nothing in manners.

4. Concerning the second, that is, a virtual judgment, that is a natural inclination passing forth into habit or custom, and delight in the actions of some virtues; it is certain that it is one part of the grace of God, and a more promoted and immediate disposition to the virtue of its kind than the former. Some men are naturally very merciful, and some are abstemious, and some are continent: and these in the course of their life take in every argument and accidental motive, and the disposition swells, and the nature is confirmed. But still it is but nature. The man, it may be, is chaste, because he hates the immodesty of those addresses which prepare to uncleanness; or he loves his quiet, or fears the accidents of his enemy-crime; or there was a terror infused into him by the sight of a sad spectacle, the evil reward of an adulterous person:

—quosdam mœchos dum mugilis intrat. JUVEN.

Concerning this kind of virtual judgment, or confirmed nature, I have two things to say:

5. (1.) That this virtual judgment can produce love or hatred to certain objects, ineffective complacencies or disrelishes respectively, proper antipathies and aversions from a whole kind of objects; such as was that hatred that Tamerlane had to Zercon, or some men to cats. And thus much we cannot deny to be produced by the operation and simple apprehension of our senses by pictures and all impressions of fancy: "Cum opinamur difficile aliquid aut terribile, statim compatimur: secundum imaginem autem similiter nos habemus.”^r We find effects and impresses according to the very images of things we see, and by their prime apprehensions: and therefore much rather may these “actus imperati,” or more natural and proper effects and affections of will, be entertained or produced respectively. Men at first sight fall in love with women, and that against their reason, and resolution, and counsel, and interest, and they cannot help it; and so they may do with some actions of virtue. And as in the first case they are rather miserable than vicious; so in this they are rather fortunate than virtuous: and they may be commended, as we praise a fair face, or a strong arm, an athletic health, or a good constitution; and it is indeed a very good disposition and a facilitation of a virtuous choice. But,

6. (2.) This virtual judgment, which is nothing but nature confirmed by accidents, is not a state of good by which a man is acceptable to God. Neither is it a sufficient principle of a good life, nor indeed of the actions of its own kind. Not of good life, because it may be in a single instance; and it can never be in all. The man that is good-natured, that is naturally meek and loving, goes the furthest upon this account; but without the conjunction of other virtues, it is a great way off from that good state, whither naturally it can but tend and incline: and we see some good things are made to serve some evil; and by temperance, and a moderate diet, some preserve their health, that they may not preserve their chastity: and they may be habitually proud, because they are naturally chaste: and then this chastity is no virtue, but a disposition and an aptness only. In this sense that of St. James may be affirmed, “He that offends in one, is guilty of all;” that is, if his inclinations, and his accidentally-acquired habits, be such as to admit a mixture, they are not genuine and gracious: such are these that are the effects of a nature, fitted towards a particular virtue. It must be a higher principle that makes an entire piety; nature, and the habits growing upon her stock, cannot do it. Alexander was a continent prince, and the captive beauties of Persia were secured by it in their honours; but by rage he destroyed his friend, and by drunkenness he destroyed himself.

But neither is this virtual judgment a sufficient principle of the actions of its own kind; for this natural strength is nothing but an uneasiness and unaptness to suffer by common temptations: but place the man where he can be tempted, and this good disposition secures him not, because there may be something in nature bigger than it.

7. It remains then, that to the constitution of a right and sure conscience, there is required a formal judgment, that is, a deliberation of the understanding, and a choice of the will, that being instructed, and this inclined by the grace of God: “Tantoque laudabilior munificentia nostra fore videbatur, quod ad illam non impetu quodam, sed consilio trahebatur,” said Secundus:^s then it is right and good, then when it is not violent, necessary, or natural, but when it is chosen. This makes a right and sure conscience, because the grace of God hath a universal influence into all the course of our actions. “For he that said, Do not kill, said also, Do not steal:” and if he obeys in one instance, for that reason must obey in all, or be condemned by himself; and then the conscience is right in the principle and fountain, though defiled in the issue and emanation. For he that is condemned by his own conscience, hath the law written and the characters still fair, legible, and read; but then the fault is in something else; the will is corrupted. The sum is this:

8. It is not enough that the conscience be taught by nature, but it must be taught by God, conducted by reason, made operative by discourse, assisted by choice, instructed by laws and sober principles; and then it is right, and it may be sure.

RULE V.

When two Motives concur to the determination of an action, whereof one is virtuous, and the other secular, a right Conscience is not prejudiced by that mixture.

1. HE that fasts to punish himself for his sins, and at the same time intends his health, though it will be very often impossible for him to tell himself which was the final and prevailing motive and ingredient into the persuasion, yet it is no detriment to his conscience; the religious motive alone did suffice to make it to be an act of a good conscience; and if the mixture of the other could change this, it could not be lawful to use, or in any degree to be persuaded by, the promises of those temporal blessings which are recorded in both Testaments, and to which there is a natural desire, and proper inclination. But this also is with some difference.

2. If the secular ingredient be the stronger, it is in the same degree as it prevails over the virtuous or religious, a diminution of the worthiness of the action; but if it be a secular blessing under a promise, it does not alter the whole kind of the action. The reason is this: because whatever God hath promised, is therefore desirable and good, because he hath promised it, or he hath promised it because it is of itself good, and useful to us; and therefore whatever we may innocently desire, we may innocently intend: but if it be mingled with a religious and spiritual interest, it ought not to sit down in the highest place, because a more worthy is there present, lest we be found to be passionate for the things of this life, and indifferent for God and for religion.

3. If the secular or temporal ingredient be not under a promise, and yet be the prime and chief motive, the whole case is altered: the conscience is not right, it is natural inclination, not conscience, it is sense or interest, not duty. He that gives alms with a purpose to please his prince, who is charitable and religious, although his purpose be innocent, yet because it is an end which God hath not encouraged by propounding it as a reward of charity, the whole deliberation is turned to be a secular action, and passes without reward. Our blessed Saviour hath, by an instance of his own, determined this case. "When thou makest a feast, call not the rich, who can make thee recompence; but call the poor, and thou shalt have reward in heaven." To call the rich to a feast is no sin; but to call them is to lose the reward of charity, by changing the whole nature of the action from charity to civility, from religion to prudence.

4. And this hath no other exception or variety in it, but when the mixture is of a thing that is so purely natural, that it is also necessary: thus to eat upon a festival-day to satisfy a long hunger, to be honestly employed to get a living, do not cease to be religious,—though that which is temporal, be the first and the greatest cause of the action or undertaking. But the reason of this difference, if any be apprehended, is because this natural end is also a duty, and tacitly under a promise.

5. Quest. It is usually required, that all that enter into the holy offices of the ministry, should so primely and principally design the glory of God; that all other considerations should scarce be ingredients into the resolution: and yet if it be inquired how far this is obligatory, and observe how little it is attended to in the first preparations to the order, the very needs of most men will make the question material.

But I answer to the question, in proportion to the sense of the present rule.

6. (1.) Wherever a religious act by God's appointment may serve a temporal end and a spiritual, to attend either is lawful; but it is still more excellent, by how much preference and greater zeal we more serve the more excellent. Therefore although it be better to undertake the sacred function wholly for ends spiritual, yet it is lawful to enter into it with an actual design to make that calling the means of our natural and necessary support. The reason is:

7. Because it is lawful to intend what God hath offered and propounded. The end which God hath made cannot be evil, and therefore it cannot be evil to choose that instrument to that end, which by God's appointment is to minister to that end. Now since "God hath ordained that they who preach the gospel should live of the gospel," it cannot be unlawful to design that in order to this.

8. (2.) If our temporal support and maintenance be the first and immediate design, it makes not the whole undertaking to be unlawful. For all things, and all states, and all actions, are to be directed or done to the glory of God; according to that saying of St. Paul, "Whether ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God:" and that one calling should be more for God's glory than another, is by reason of the matter and employment; but in every one, for its portion still, God's glory must be the principal: and yet no man questions but it is lawful for any man to bring his son up to the most gainful trade, if in other things there be no objection; and therefore why this may not be the first moving consideration in the susception of, or designation to, the calling ecclesiastical, cannot have any reason in the nature of the thing: for if in all things God's glory must be the principal end, and yet in some callings the temporal advantage is the first mover, then it may be so in all,—the intention of God's glory notwithstanding: for if it hinders not in that, it hinders not in this. But yet,

9. (3.) It is a great imperfection actually to think of nothing but the temporal advantages, of which God hath in that calling made provisions; but I say, it is not always a sin to make them the first mover in the designing the person to that calling.

10. But therefore this is only tolerable in those persons who at great distance design the calling; as when they first study to make themselves capable of it, then it is tolerable, because they are bound to provide for themselves in all just ways, and standing at so great distances from it, cannot behold the beauties which are "in interiori domo;" the duty which is on them, is to do that which is their proper work; that is, to fit themselves with abilities and skill to conduct it, and therefore their intention must be fitted accordingly, and move by the most powerful and prevailing motive, so it be lawful. He that applies himself to learn letters, hath an intention proportionable to his person and capacity when he first enters, and as he grows in powers, so must he also in purposes; so that as he passes on to perfection, he may also have intentions more noble and more perfect: and a man in any calling may first design to serve that end that stands next him; and yet when he is possessed of that, look on further to the intention of the thing, and its own utmost capacity. But therefore,

11. (4.) Whoever does actually enter into orders, must take care that his principal end be the glory of God, and the good of souls. The reasons are these:

12. (1.) Because no man is fit for that office, but he that is spiritual in his person, as well as his office: he must be a despiser of the world, a light to others, an example to the flock, a great denier of himself, of a celestial mind, he must mind heavenly things; with which dispositions it cannot consist, that he who is called to the lot of God, should place his chief affections in secular advantages.

13. (2.) This is that of which the apostle was a glorious precedent, "We seek not yours, but you; for the parents lay up for the children, not children for their parents:"¹ meaning, that between the spiritual and the natural paternity, there is so much proportion, that when it is for the good of the children, they must all quit their temporal advantages; but because this is to be done for the spiritual, it follows, this must be chief.

14. And this I suppose is also enjoined by another apostle, "feeding the flock of God, not for filthy lucre's sake," ἀλλὰ προθύμως, that is, but "of a prompt, ready mind;"² a mind moved by intrinsic arguments of fair design, not drawn by the outward cords of vanity and gain.

15. (3.) The work of the calling being principally and immediately for the good of souls, and for the glory of God, it cannot be pursued as the nature of the work requires, if that be not principally intended which is principally to be procured; all that which is necessary in order to it, must also be taken care of: thus the ministers of religion may attend their health, and must look to their necessary support, and may defend themselves against all impediments of their offices in just and proportionable ways: but because all these have further purposes, although they standing nearest may be first regarded by an actual care, at some times, and in some circumstances, and by actual attention; yet habitually, and principally, and constantly, the glory of God, and the good of souls, must be in the heart, and in the purpose of every action.

16. But the principality and pre-eminence of this intention are no otherwise to be judged of, either by ourselves or others, than by these following significations.

(1.) No man can in any sense principally, that is, as he ought, intend the good of souls, who enters into the sacred ministry without those just measures of preparation and disposition, which are required by the church, and the nature of the thing itself; that is, that he be well instructed in the Holy Scriptures, and be fit to teach, to exhort, to reprove. For he who undertakes a work which can serve God's end and his own in several capacities, and is not sufficiently instructed to serve the ends of God, —it is apparent that what he undertakes is for his own end.

17. (2.) His intentions cannot be right, who by any indirect arts does enter, for that which does not begin at God, cannot be for God: “Non enim ambitione, vel pretio, sed probatæ vitæ et disciplinarum testimonio, ad honoris et sacerdotii insignia oportet promoveri,” said the emperor Theodosius. He therefore who simoniacally enters, fixes his eye and heart upon that which he values to be worth money, not upon the spiritual employment, between which and money there can be no more proportion, than between contemplation and a cart-rope; they are not things of the same nature; and he that comes into the field with an elephant, cannot be supposed to intend to hunt a hare; neither can he be supposed to intend principally the ministry of souls, who comes to that office instructed only with a bag of money.

18. (3.) He may be supposed principally to intend the ministry of souls, and in it the glory of God, who so attends to the execution of his office, that it does really and sufficiently minister to the thing. For since the calling is by God really designed to that end, and if the ministers be not wanting to themselves, they are sufficiently enabled and assisted to that purpose; he that zealously and wisely ministers in the office, hath given a most real testimony of his fair intention, because he does that thing so as those intentions only can be effected. The thing itself is sufficient for the end if God blesses it; he therefore that does the thing, does actuate the intention of God, and sanctifies his own:

19. (4.) He may be confident that his intentions for God's glory and the good of souls are right and principal, who so conjoins his other lesser ends with the conduct of the greater, that they shall always be made to give place to the greater. That is, who still pursues the interest of souls, and the work of his ministry, when the hopes of maintenance, or honour, or secular regards do fail. For he that for carnal or secular regards will either quit or neglect his ministry, it is certain, his carnal or secular ends were his chief motive and incentive in the work. It was the case of Demas, who was St. Paul's minister and work-fellow in the service of the gospel, but he left him, because “he loved the present world;”^x concerning which, it is to be considered, that this lapse and recession of Demas from the assistance of St. Paul, did not proceed from that love of the world which St. John speaks of, and is criminal, and forbidden to all christians, which “whosoever hath, the love of the Father dwells not in him,”^y but is to be understood of such a love, which to other christians is not unlawful, but was, in those times especially, inconsistent with the duty of evangelists, in those great necessities of the church: Demas was a good man, but weak in his spirit, and too secular in his relations, but he returned to his station, and did the work of an evangelist, awhile after, as appears in the epistle to the Colossians and Philemon; but for the present he was to blame. For he would secure his relations and his interests with too great a caution and diligence, and leave the other, to attend this. Such as now-a-days is too great care of our estates, secular negociations, merchandises, civil employments, not ministering directly unto religion, and the advantages of its ministration. For our great King the Lord Jesus hath given to all christians some employment, but to some more, to some less, and in their own proportion they must give a return: and in a minister of the gospel, every inordination of carefulness, and every excess of attendance to secular affairs, and every unnecessary avocation from, or neglect of, his great work, is criminal: and many things are excesses in them, which are not in others, because the ministerial office requires more attendance and conversation with spiritual things, than that of others.

20. (5.) If ever the minister of holy things, for hope or fear, for gain or interest, desert his station, when he is persecuted, or when he is not persecuted, —it is too much to be presumed, that he did not begin for God, who, for man, will quit God's service. They that wander till they find a rich seat, do all that they do for the riches of the place, not for the employment: “Si non ubi sedeas, locus est, est ubi ambules,” said he in the comedy; the calling of these men is not fixed but ambulatory: and if that which fixes them be temporal advantages, then that which moved them principally is not spiritual employment.

21. For it is considerable, that if it be unlawful to undertake the holy calling, without a Divine vocation to it, then to forsake it without a Divine permission must be criminal. He that calls to come, calls to continue, where the need is lasting, and the office perpetual. But to leave the calling when the revenue is gone, to quit the altar when it hath no offering, to let the souls wander when they bring no gifts,—is to despise the religion, and to love only the fat of the sacrifices: for the altar indeed does sanctify the gift, but not the gift the altar; and he hath but a light opinion of an eternal crown of glory, or thinks God but an ill paymaster, that will do him service upon the stock of his promises, and will not feed the flock, though he have no other reward but to be feasted in the eternal supper of the Lamb. Who are hirelings, but they who fly when the wolf comes? And woe be to that evangelist, who upon any secular regard neglects to preach the gospel; woe be to him, to whom it shall be said at the day of judgment, “I was hungry, and my flock was hungry, and ye fed neither it nor me.”

But this is to be understood with these liberties:

22. (1.) That it be no prejudice to those ecclesiastics, who in time of persecution do so attend to their ministries, that no material part of it be omitted, or slightly performed, and yet take from it such portions of time as are necessary for their labour or support, by any just and honest employment. Thus St. Paul wrought in the trade of a tent-maker, because he would not be a burden to the church of Corinth; and when the church is stripped naked of her robes, and the bread of proposition is stolen from her table by soldiers, there is no peradventure but the ecclesiastical offices are so to be attended to, that the natural duty and necessity be not neglected.

23. (2.) That it be no prejudice to ecclesiastics in the days of peace or war, to change their station from bishop to bishopric, from church to church, where God or the church, where charity or necessity, where prudence or obedience, calls. Indeed it hath been fiercely taught, that ecclesiastics ought never, and upon no pretence, to desert their church, and go to another, any more than a man may forsake his wife; and for this a decretal of Pope Evaristus is pretended, and is recorded in the canon law. “Sicut vir non debet adulterare uxorem suam, ita nec episcopus ecclesiam suam, ut illam dimittat ad quam fuit sacratus:”² and therefore when Eusebius the bishop of Cæsarea was called to be bishop of Antioch, he refused it pertinaciously, and for it was highly commended by the emperor; and St. Jerome in his epistle to Oceanus tells, “In Nicenâ synodo à patribus decretum est, ne de alia in aliam ecclesiam episcopus transferatur, ne, virginalis pauperulæ societate contempta, ditioris adulteræ quærat amplexus.” Something indeed like it was decreed by the fifteenth and sixteenth canons of the Nicene council; and it was a usual punishment amongst the holy primitives, “careat cathedra propria, qui ambit alienam.” But these things, though they be true and right, yet are not contradictory to the present case. For,

24. (1.) Evaristus, it is clear, forbade translations and removes from church to church, “ambitus causâ,” for ambition or covetousness, and therefore it is by him expressly permitted in their proper cases and limits; that is, “in inevitabili necessitate, aut apostolica, vel regulari mutatione,” “when there is inevitable necessity,” or the command and authority of a superior power: and yet upon perusal of the decree I find, that Evaristus’s intent was, that a bishop should not thrust his church from him by way of divorce and excommunication, and take another: as appears not only by the corresponding part of the decree, viz. “that neither must the church take in another bishop or husband upon him to whom already she is espoused;” but by the expression used in the beginning of it, “Dimittere ecclesiam episcopus non debet;” and it is compared to the adultery of a man that puts away his wife, and marries another; and also it appears more yet by the gloss, which seems to render the same sense of it, and wholly discourses of the unlawfulness to excommunicate a church or a city, lest the innocent should suffer with the criminal; for when a church is excommunicated, though all those persons die upon whom the sentence fell, yet the church is the same under other persons their successors; and therefore all the way it does injustice, by involving the new-arising innocents, and at last is wholly unjust by including all and only innocent persons. But which way soever this decree be understood, it comes not home to a prohibition of our case.

25. (2.) As for Eusebius, it is a clear case he imposed upon the good emperor, who knew not the secret cause of Eusebius’s denial to remove from Cæsarea to Antioch. For he having engaged the emperor beforetime to write in his behalf, that he might be permitted to enjoy that bishopric, was not willing to seem guilty of levity and easiness of change. But that was not all, he was a secret favourer of the Arians, and therefore was unwilling to go to that church, where his predecessor Eustathius had been famous for opposing that pest.

(3.) To that of St. Jerome out of the Nicene council, I answer, That the prohibition is only of such, as without authority, upon their own head, for their own evil purposes, and with injury to their own churches, did it; and of covetousness it is, that St. Jerome notes and reproves the practice: to despise our charge because it is poor, is to love the money more than the souls, and therefore this is not to be done by any one of his own choice; but if it be done by the command or election of our superior, it is to be presumed it is for the advantage of the church in matter of direct reason, or collateral assistances, and therefore hath in it no cause of reproof.

26. And to this purpose the whole affair is very excellently stated by the fourteenth canon of the apostles; “A bishop must not leave his own parish or diocese, and invade that of another man, nisi forte quis cum rationabili causâ compellatur, tanquam qui possit ibidem constitutus plus lucri conferre, et in causâ religionis aliquid profectus prospicere.” If there be a reasonable cause, he may; and the cause is reasonable, if by going he may do more good or advantage to religion: but of this he is not to be judge himself, but must be judged by his superiors; “et hoc non à semetipso pertentet, sed multorum episcoporum judicio, et maximâ supplicatione perficiat;" "he must not do it on his own head, but by the sentence and desire of the bishops."

27. There needs no more to be added to this, but that if a greater revenue be annexed to another charge, and that it be "in rem ecclesiæ," that the more worthy person should be advanced thither, to enable his better ministries by those secular assistances, which our infirmity needs, there is nothing to be said against it, but that if he be the man he is taken for, he knows how to use those advantages to God's glory, and the good of souls, and the services of the church; and if he does so, his intentions are to be presumed pure and holy, because the good of souls is the principal.

28. Upon the supposition of these causes, we find that the practice of the ancient bishops and clerks in their translations was approved. Origen did first serve God in the church of Alexandria, afterwards he went to Cæsarea, to Antioch, to Tyre: and St. Gregory Nazianzen changed his episcopal see eight times. Nay, the apostles themselves did so: St. Peter was first bishop of Antioch, afterwards of Rome: and the necessity and utility of the churches called St. Paul to an ambulatory government and episcopacy, though at last he also was fixed at Rome; and he removed Timothy and Titus from church to church, as the need and uses of the church required. But in this, our call must be from God, or from our superiors, not from levity or pride, covetousness or negligence. Concerning which, who please further to be satisfied, may read St. Athanasius's epistle to Dracontius, of old; and of late, Chytræus "in epistolis p. 150. et 678." and Conradus Porta in his "Formalia." This only; If every man were indispensably tied to abide where he is first called to minister, then it were not lawful for an inferior minister to desire the good work of a bishop; which because it is not to be administered in the same place or charge, according to the universal discipline of the church for very many ages, must suppose that there can be a reasonable cause to change our charges, because the apostle commands that desire which supposes that change.

29. These being the limits and measures of the rule, it would be very good if we were able to discern concerning the secrets of our intentions, and the causes of actions. It is true, that because men confound their actions and deliberations, it will be impossible to tell, in many cases, what motive is the principal ingredient. "Sed ut tunc communibus magis commodis, quam privatæ jactantiæ studebamus, cum intentionem effectumque muneris nostri vellemus intelligi; ita nunc in ratione edendi veremur, ne fortè non aliorum utilitatibus, sed propriæ laudi servisse videamur." It is hard for a wise and a gallant man, who does public actions of greatest worthiness deserving honour, to tell certainly whether he is more pleased in the honours that men do him, or in the knowledge that he hath done them benefits. But yet in very many cases, we may at least guess probably which is the prevailing ingredient, by these following measures; besides those which I have noted^a and applied to the special case of undertaking the calling ecclesiastical.

Signs of Difference, whereby we may in a mixed and complicated Intention, discern which is the principal Ingredient.

30. (1.) Whatsoever came in after the determination was made, though it add much the greater confidence, and makes the resolution sharper and more active, yet it is not to be reckoned as the prevailing ingredient; for though it add degrees, yet the whole determination was perfected before. The widow Fulvia was oppressed by Attilius; she complains to Secundus the lawyer. He considers whether he should be advocate for his friend Attilius, or for the oppressed Fulvia; and at last determines on the side of piety and charity, and resolves to relieve the widow, but with some abatement of his spirit and confidence, because it is against his friend; but charity prevails. As he goes to court he meets with Caninius, who gloriously commends the advocacy,—and by superadding that spur made his diffidence and imperfect resolution confident and clear. In this case the whole action is to be attributed to piety, not to the love of fame; for this only added some moments, but that made the determination.

31. (2.) When the determination is almost made, and wants some weight to finish it, whatsoever then supervenes and casts the scales, is not to be accounted the prevailing ingredient, but that which made most in the suspension and time of deliberation, and brought it forward. It is like buying and selling: not the last maravedi that was stood upon, was the greatest argument of parting with the goods; but that farthing added to the bigger sum, made it big enough: and a child's finger may thrust a load forward, which being haled by mighty men stands still for want of a little assistance.

32. (3.) That is the prevailing ingredient in the determination which is most valued, not which most pleases; that which is rationally preferred, not that which delights the senses. If the man had rather lose the sensual than the intellectual good, though in that his fancy is more delighted, yet this is the stronger and greater in the Divine acceptance, though possibly in nature it be less active, because less pleasing to those faculties, which whether we will or no, will be very much concerned in all the intercourses of this life. He—that keeps a festival in gratitude and spiritual joy to do God glory, and to give him thanks, and in the preparation to the action is hugely pleased by considering the music, the company, the festivity and innocent refreshments, and in his fancy, leaps at this, but his resolution walks on by that,—hath not spoiled the regularity of his conscience by the intertexture of the sensual with the spiritual, so long as it remains innocent. For though this flames brightest, yet the other burns hottest, and will last longer than the other. But of this there is no other sign, but that first we be infinitely careful to prescribe measures and limits to the secular joy, that it may be perfectly subordinate to, and complying with, the spiritual and religious: and secondly, if we are willing to suppress the light flame, rather than extinguish the solid fire.

33. (4.) Then the holy and pious ingredient is overpowered by the mixture of the secular, when an instrument toward the end is chosen more proportionable to this than to that. Cæcilius, to do a real not a fantastic benefit to his tenants, erected a library in his villa, and promised a yearly revenue for their children's education, and nobler institution: and thus far judgment ought to be made, that he intended piety rather than fame; for to his fame, plays and spectacles would (as the Roman humour then was) have served better; but when in the acting his resolution he praised that his pious purpose, and told them he did it for a pious, not a vain-glorious end, however the intention might be right, this publication was not right: but, when he appointed that anniversary orations should be made in the praise of his pious foundation, he a little too openly discovered what was the bigger wheel in that motion. For he that serves a secret piety by a public panegyric, disorders the piety by dismantling the secret: it may still be piety, but it will be lessened by the publication; though this publication be no otherwise criminal, than because it is vain. "Meminimus, quanto majore animo honestatis fructus in conscientia, quam in fama, reponatur. Sequi enim gloria, non appeti, debet: nec si casu aliquo non sequatur, idcirco quod gloriam meruit, minus pulchrum est. Hi vero, qui benefacta sua verbis adornant, non ideo prædicare, quia fecerint, sed ut prædicarent, fecisse creduntur;"^b which is the very thing which I affirm in this particular. If the intermediate or consequent actions serve the collateral or secular end, most visibly it is to be supposed, that this was the greater motive, and had too great an influence into the deliberation.

But because the heart of man is so intricate, trifling, and various, in most cases it must be sufficient for us to know, that if the mixture be innocent the whole deliberation is secured in the kind of it, and for degrees we must do as well as we can.

35. But, on the other side, if the secular end mixed with the spiritual and religious, the just and the honest, be unlawful, and yet intended, though in a less degree, though but accidentally and by an after-consent; the conscience is neither sure nor right, but is dishonoured and defiled; for the whole deliberation is made criminal by mingling with forbidden purposes. He that takes up arms under his prince in a just war, and at the same time intends revenge against his private enemy, casually engaged on the adverse party, loses the reward of his obedience, and changes it for the devilish pleasures of revenge.

Concerning the measure and conduct of our intentions, there are some other things to be said, but because they are extrinsic to the chief purpose of this rule, they are properly to be considered under their own head.

^b Plin. lib. I. ep. 8.

RULE VI.

An Argument not sufficient nor competent, though it do persuade us to a Thing in itself good, is not the Ground of a right, nor a sufficient Warrant for a sure Conscience.

1. HE that goes to public prayers because it is the custom, or communicates at Easter to avoid a censure, hath done an act in itself good, but his motive was neither competent nor sufficient to make the action religious, or to manifest and declare the conscience to be sure and right. For conscience is the repository of practical reasons: and as in civil actions, we count him a fool who wears clothes only because they cost him nothing, or walks because he would see his shadow move upon the wall; so it is in moral. When the reason is incompetent, the action is by chance, neither prudent nor chosen, alterable by a trifle, tending to a cheap end, proceeding by a regardless motion: and conscience might as well be seated in the fancy, or in the foot, as in the understanding, if its nature and proper design were not to be conducted with reasons proportionable to such actions, which tend to an end perfective of man, and productive of felicity.

2. This rule is so to be understood, that it be not required of all men to have reasons equally good for the same determinations, but sufficient and reasonable in themselves, and apt to lead them in their proper capacities and dispositions, that is, reasons proportionable to that kind of things in which the determination is instanced, viz. a religious reason for an action of religion; a prudent reason for a civil action: but if it be in its proper kind, it is sufficient if it be probable, provided always, that it makes a sure mind, and a full persuasion.

3. He that believes christian religion, because the men are charitable and chaste, and so taught to be, and commanded by the religion, is brought into a good place by a single taper; but he came in by no false light, and he is there where he ought to be. He did not see the way in so brightly as St. Paul did, who was conducted in by an angel from heaven with a bright flame in his hand; but he made shift to see his way in: and because the light that guided him came from heaven, his conscience was rightly instructed, and if it persuaded him heartily, his conscience is as sure as it is right.

4. Quest. Upon the account and consequence of this rule it is proper to inquire, Whether it be lawful and ingenuous, to go about to persuade a man to the belief of a true proposition, by arguments with which himself is not persuaded, and which he believes are not sufficient? The case is this:

5. Girolami, a learned priest of Ferrara, finds that many of his parishioners are infected with Judaism, by reason of their conversation with the Jewish merchants. He studies the Jewish books to discover the weakness of their arguments, and to convince them upon their own grounds. But finding his parishioners moved only by popular arguments, and not capable of understanding the secrets of the old prophets, the synchronisms, nor the computation of Daniel's weeks, the infinite heaps of reasons by which christianity stands firm in defiance of all pretensions to the contrary; sees it necessary to persuade them by things as easy as those are by which they were abused. But then he considers; if they were by error led into error, it is not fit that by error also they should be led out of it into truth, for God needs not to be served with a lie, and evil must not be done that good may be thence procured. But if I go by a false argument to cozen them into truth, I tell a lie to recover them from a lie, and it is a disparagement to the cause of God, that it must be supported by the devil. But having discoursed thus far, he considers further: every argument which I am able to answer, I know cannot conclude in the question; for if it be to be answered, it is at most but a specious outside of reason; and he that knows this, or believes it so, either must not use that instrument of persuasion, or, if he does, he must resolve to abuse the man's understanding before he can set it right: and this he believes to be against the honour of truth, and the rules of charity, and the simplicity and ingenuity of the spirit of a christian.

To this Question I answer by several Propositions.

6. (1.) It is not lawful to tell a lie for God and for truth; because God will not be served by that which he hates, and there are no defects in truth which need such violent remedies. Therefore Girolami might not, to persuade his Judaizing parishioners, tell them a tale of a vision, or pretend a tradition which is not, or falsify a record because these are direct arts of the devil, this is a doing evil for a good end: and every single lie is directly hated by God, and where there is a difference, it is made by complication, or the mixing of something else with a lie: and because God hath created and communicated to mankind, not only sufficient but abundant justifications of whatsoever he hath commanded us to believe, therefore he hates infinitely to have his glorious economy of faith and truth to be disordered and discomposed by the productions of hell. For every lie is of the devil.

7. (2.) It is lawful to use an argument "cui potest subesse falsum," such which I know is not certain, but yet I actually believe it to be true. That is, though the argument be not demonstrative, but probable only, yet I may safely use it, if I believe myself to be on the right side of the probability: for a real truth and a supposed truth are all one as to the innocence of my purposes. And he that knows how little certainty there is in human discourses, and how "we know in part, and prophesy in part," and that of every thing whereof we know a little, we are ignorant in much more, must either be content with such proportions as the things will bear, or as himself can get, or else he must never seek to alter or to persuade any man to be of his opinion. For the greatest part of discourses that are in the whole world, is nothing but a heap of probable inducements, plausibilities, and witty entertainments: and the throng of notices is not unlike the accidents of a battle, in which every man tells a new tale, something that he saw, mingled with a great many things which he saw not: his eyes and his fear joining together equally in the instruction and the illusion, these make up the stories. And in the observation of things, there is infinitely more variety than in faces, and in the contingencies of the world. Let ten thousand men read the same books, and they shall all make several uses, draw several notes, and understand them to several effects and purposes. Knowledge is infinite, and out of this infinity every one snatches some things real, and some images of things; and there are so many cognitive faculties above and below, and powers ministering to knowledge, and all these have so many ways of being abused, or hindered, and of being imperfect; and the degrees of imperfection, positive, and privative, and negative, are also themselves absolutely so infinite, that to arrive at probabilities in most things is no small progression. But we must be content to make use of that, both for ourselves and others.

8. Upon this account we may quote scriptures to those senses which they can well serve in a question, and in which they are used by learned men, though we suppose the principal intention be of a different thing, so it be not contrary. For all learned men know, that in Scripture many sayings are full of potential significations, besides what are on the face of the words, or in the heart of the design: and therefore although we may not allege scriptures in a sense contrary to what we believe it meant; yet to any thing beside its first meaning, we may, if the analogy will bear it; and if by learned men it be so used, that is in effect, because for aught we know it may be so indeed.

9. (3.) If a man suppose his arguments sufficient and competent to persuade, though they be neither fitting to persuade, nor at all sufficient, he may yet lawfully use them. For in this case, though himself be deceived, yet because it is upon the strength of those arguments he relies, he can be tied to use no better than he hath: and since his conscience is heartily persuaded, though it be in error, yet that which follows that persuasion is innocent, (if it be not mingled with design,) though, it may be, that which went before was not so.

10. (4.) In the persuasion of a truth, it is lawful to use such arguments whose strength is wholly made prevailing by the weakness of him that is to be persuaded. Such as are arguments "ad hominem," that is, proportionable to the doctrines, customs, usages, belief, and credulity, of the man. The reasons are these:

1. Because ignorant persons are not capable of such arguments as may demonstrate the question; and he that goes about to draw a child to him, may pull him by the long sleeve of his coat, and need not to hire a yoke of oxen.

2. That which will demonstrate a truth to one person, possibly will never move another. Because our reason does not consist in a mathematical point: and the heart of reason, that vital and most sensible part, in which only it can be conquered fairly, is an ambulatory essence, and not fixed; it wanders up and down like a floating island, or like that which we call the life-blood; and it is not often very easy to hit that white, by which only our reason is brought to perfect assent: and this needs no other proof but our daily experience, and common notices of things. That which at one time is not regarded, at another time is a prevailing motive; and I have observed that a discourse at one time hath been lightly regarded, or been only pleasing to the ear, which, a year or two after, hath made great impressions of piety upon the spirit of the hearers. And therefore, that I can answer the argument, it is not enough to make me think it necessary to lay it aside or to despise it; there may be something in him that hears me, that can make the argument to become perfect and effectual; and the want of that, it may be, in me, makes me apt to slight it. And besides that some pretended answers are illusions rather than solutions, it may be, that beyond my answer, a wiser man may make a reply, and confirm the argument so as I know not: and therefore if it be truth you persuade, it were altogether as good, and I am sure much more easy, to let the man you persuade, enter at the first and broadest gate of the true proposition, than after having passed through a great many turnings and labyrinths, at last come but to the same place where he might first have entered. There are some witty men that can answer any thing; but suppose they could not, yet it would be impossible that men should be tied in all cases to speak nothing but demonstrations.

3. Some men are to be wrought upon not by direct argument, but by artifices and back-blows; they are easy enough to believe the truth, if they could; and therefore you must, to persuade them, remove their prejudices and prepossessions; and to this purpose, it will not be necessary to bring those things which are proper to the question, but things accidental and extrinsical. They who were prejudiced at our blessed Saviour because he was of Galilee, needed no other argument to make them to believe in him, but to confute that foolish proverb, "Out of Galilee comes no good:" and yet he that from thence thinks the question of his being the Messiah sufficiently concluded, is very far from understanding the effect and powers of argument.

4. The hinderances of belief are seated in several faculties, in our fancy, in our will, in our appetite: now in these cases there is no way to persuade, but by arguing so as to prevail with that faculty. If any man should say that our blessed Saviour is not yet come in the flesh, upon a foolish fancy that he believes not, that God would honour such a wicked nation with so great a glory, as that the Saviour of the world should be born of them; he needs no argument to persuade him to be a christian, but by having it proved to him, that it was not only likely, but really so, and necessary it should be so, not only for the verification of the prophecies of him, but for divers congruities in the nature and circumstances of things. Here the argument is to confute the fancy only, not the reason.

5. Sometimes the judgment is right, but the affections are perverse; and then, not demonstrations, but popular arguments, are not only lawful, but useful, and sufficient. For reasons of abstracted speculation move not the lower man. Make the people in love with your proposition, and cause them to hate the contrary, and you have done all that they are capable of. When some divines in Germany were forced for their own defence to gain the people to their party, they disputed against the absolute decree of reprobation, by telling them that their adversaries' doctrine did teach that God did drag the pretty children from their mothers' breasts, and throw many of them into the eternal portion of devils: this moved the women, who follow reason as far as they can be made in love with it, and their understanding is oftentimes more in their heart than in their head. And there are thousands of people, men and women, who believe upon no other account than this, neither can they be taught otherwise. When St. Paul would persuade the Jews to reason, and from laying violent hands upon him; he was not to attempt it by offering undeniably to prove that he did well by going to the gentiles, since God had rejected the Jews, excepting a remnant only: but he persuaded them by telling them he did nothing against the law of Moses and the temple.

6. There are some fondnesses, and strange adherences to trifles in most people, humours of the nation, love of the advantage of their families, relations to sects or dignities, natural sympathies and antipathies, in a correspondency to which, all those arguments which are dressed, are like to prevail, and cannot otherwise do it. For when a man's understanding is mingled with interest, his arguments must have something of this, or else they will never stir that: and therefore all our arguments cannot be freed from such allays.

7. In all the discourses of men, not only orators, but philosophers, and even in their severest discourses, all the good and all the wise men of the world heap together many arguments, who yet cannot suppose them all certain; but yet they therefore innocently use them, because, as there are several capacities of men to be dealt withal, so there are several notices of things; and that may be highly concluding, which, it may be, is not well represented, and therefore not fancied or observed by him that uses it; and to another it becomes effective because he does.

8. The Holy Spirit of God himself in his intercourses with men is pleased to descend to our capacities, and to use arguments taken from our own principles, and which prevail more by silencing us, rather than demonstrating the thing. Thus St. Paul in his arguments for the resurrection uses this; "If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain." ^c There are some, even too many now-a-days, and many more then, who would have granted both the antecedent and the consequent; but because the Corinthians disavowed the consequent, they were forced to admit the antecedent. And at last, thousands of persons could never be drawn from their error, if we might not make use of arguments, weak like their capacities, and more proportionable to their understanding than to the question.

There are two cautions to be added to make the rule perfect :

1. That if the disciple, relying upon his master's authority more than his own ability to judge, ask the doctor, whether upon his knowledge and faith that argument does evict the question; if the doctor himself does not believe it, he must then put no more force upon it by his affirmation and authority, than he thinks it does in nature bear; but must give prudent accounts of the whole question in compliance to the present necessity of the demander.

Of the same consideration it is, when a question being disputed between two parties, the standers-by expect the truest and most proper account of things. In this case, all openness and ingenuity is to be used according to our own sense of things, not according to what may comply with any man's weakness; and the not doing so is want of ingenuity, and the worthiness of christian charity, and a perfect deceiving them who expect and desire such things as ought to be finally relied upon.

2. In all arguments which are to prevail by the weakness or advantages taken from the man, he that goes about to persuade, must not say any thing that he knows to be false; but he must comply and twist about the man's weakness, so as to be innocent all the way. Let him take him that is weak and wrap him in swaddling-clothes, but not encompass him with snakes: but yet this hath one loose and permission that may be used.

11. (3.) It is lawful for a man, in persuading another to a truth, to make use of a false proposition, which he that is to be persuaded, already doth believe: that is, a man may justly dispute upon the supposition, not upon the concession and granting of an error. Thus St. Paul disputed with the Corinthians, and to induce them into a belief of the resurrection, made use of a foolish custom among them in use, of being baptized for the dead. For the christian church hath but two sacraments, baptism and the Lord's supper; at the beginning some of the christians used baptism, and in succeeding ages, they used to celebrate the Lord's supper for the dead, and do to this day in the church of Rome. Upon this fond custom of theirs, St. Paul thus argues: "If there be no resurrection, then it is to no purpose that you are baptized for the dead; but that is to purpose, (as you suppose,) therefore there is a resurrection." Thus prayer for the dead, and invocation of saints, according to the principles taught in the primitive church, might have been made use of against each other. If all men are imperfect till the day of judgment, and till then enter not into heaven, then you cannot with confidence make prayers to them, who, for aught you know, need your help more: but if all that die well, that is, if all that die in the Lord, do instantly enjoy the beatifical vision, and so are in a condition to be prayed to, then they need not be prayed for. As for the middle place, they in those ages knew no such thing, as men have since dreamed of. As God in such cases makes use of a prepared wickedness, though he infers none, much less does he make any to be necessary and unavoidable; so may good men and wise make use of a prepared error, a falsehood already believed; but they must neither teach nor betray any one into it.

The objections mentioned in the state of this question, are already answered in the stating the propositions.

But now arises another question, and the solution will follow upon the same grounds.

12. Quest. Whether it be lawful, for a good end, for preachers to affright men with panic terrors, and to create fears that have no ground; as to tell them, if they be liars, their faces will be deformed; if they be perjured, the devil will haunt them in visible shapes; if they be sacrilegious, they shall have the leprosy; or any thing whereby weak and ignorant people can be most wrought upon?

I answer briefly :

13. There are terrors enough in the New Testament to affright any man from his sins, who can be wrought upon by fear: and if all that Moses and the prophets say, and all that Christ and his apostles published, be not sufficient, then nothing can be. For I am sure nothing can be a greater or more formidable evil than hell; and no terrors can bring greater affrightment, than those which are the proper portion of the damned. But the measures of the permission and liberty that can be used, are these :

14. (1.) A preacher or governor may affright those that are under him, and deter them from sin, by threatening them with any thing which probably may happen. So he may denounce a curse upon the estate of sacrilegious persons, robbers of churches, oppressors of priests, and widows, and orphans; and particularly, whatsoever the widow or orphan in the bitterness of their souls do pray, may happen upon such evil persons; or what the church in the instruments of donation have expressed: as, to die childless; to be afflicted with the gout; to have an ambulatory life, the fortune of a penny, since for that he forsakes God and his religion; a distracted mind or fancy, or any thing of this nature. For since the curses of this life and of the other are indefinitely threatened to all sinners, and some particularly to certain sins, as want is to the detainers of tithes, a wandering fortune to church-robbers;^d it is not unreasonable, and therefore it is lawful, to make use of such particulars, as are most likely to be effective upon the consciences of sinners.

15. (2.) It is lawful to affright men with the threatening of any thing, that is possible to happen in the ordinary effects of Providence. For every sin is against an infinite God, and his anger is sometimes the greatest, and can produce what evil he please; and he uses to arm all his creatures against sinners, and sometimes strikes a stroke with his own hand, and creates a prodigy of example to perpetuate a fear upon men to all ages.

But this is to be admitted with these cautions :

^d Malachi iii. 8, &c. Psal. lxxxiii. 13.

1. It must be done so as to be limited within those ways, which need not suppose a miracle to have them effected. Thus to threaten a sinner in England, that if he profanes the holy sacrament, a tiger shall meet him in the churchyard and tear him, is so improbable and unreasonable, that it is therefore not to be done, lest the authority, and the counsel, and the threatening, become ridiculous: but we have warrant to threaten him with diseases, and sharp sicknesses, and temporal death; and the warrant is derived from a precedent in Scripture, God's dealing with the Corinthian communicants.^e

2. He who thus intends to dissuade, must in prudence be careful that he be not too decretory and determinate in the particular; but either wholly instance in general threatenings, or with exceptive and cautious terms in the particular; as, "Take heed lest such an evil happen;" or, "It is likely it may," and, "We have no security for a minute against it;" and, "So God hath done to others."

3. Let these be only threatenings, not prophecies, lest the whole dispensation become contemptible; and therefore let all such threatenings be understood with a provision, that if such things do not happen, the man hath not escaped God's anger, but is reserved for worse. God walketh upon the face of the waters, and his footsteps are not seen; but however, evil is the portion of the sinner.

16. (3.) In all those threatenings which are according to the analogy of the gospel, or the state of things and persons with which we have intercourse, we may take all that liberty that can by apt instruments concur to the work of God: dressing them with circumstances of terror and affrightment, and representing spiritual events by metaphors, apologies, and instances of nature. Thus our blessed Lord, expressing the torments of hell, signifies the greatness of them by such things which in nature are most terrible; as "brimstone and fire, the worm of conscience, weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth." But this, I say, must ever be kept within the limits of analogy to what is revealed, and must not make excursions to extra-regular and ridiculous significations. Such as is the fancy of some divines in the Roman church, and particularly of Cornelius à Lapide,^f that the souls of the damned shall be rolled up in bundles like a heap and involved circles of snakes, and in hell shall sink down like a stone into the bottomless pit, falling still downward for ever and ever. This is not well; but let the expressions be according to the proportions of what is revealed. The divines in several ages have taken great liberty in this affair, which I know no reason to reprove, if some of their tragical expressions did not, or were not apt to, pass into dogmatical affirmatives and opinions of reality in such inventions.

17. (4.) If any extra-regular example hath ever happened, that may be made use of to affright men from the same or the like sins, and so pass into a regular warning. Thus, though it but once happened, that God punished rebellion by causing the earth to open and swallow up the rebels against their prince and priest, Moses and Aaron, that is, it is but once recorded in Holy Scripture; yet God hath the same power now, and the same anger against rebellion; and as he can, so we are not sure that he will not, oftentimes do the same. Whatsoever hath happened and can happen, we ought to fear lest in the like cases it should happen. And therefore this is a proper instrument of a just fear, and apt rightly to minister to a sure and a right conscience.

^e 1 Cor. xi. 30.

18. (5.) If any prodigy of accident and judgment hath happened, though it be possible it may be done for the manifestation of the Divine glory, yet because it is ten thousand to one but it is because of sin too; this may be made use of to affright sinners, although there be no indication for what sin that judgment happened. Thus the ruin of the Greek monarchy finished upon the day of Pentecost: the fearful and prodigious swallowing up the cities of the Colossians and Laodiceans; the burning towns and villages by eruption of fire from mountains; the sudden cataracts of water breaking from the Indian hills; the sudden deaths and madness of many people; the horrible ruin and desolation of families and kingdoms, may be indifferently used and propounded to all sorts of persons, where there is need of such violent courses: and provided that they be charitably and prudently applied, may effect fear and caution in some sinners, who otherwise would be too ready for gaieties and unsafe liberties.

19. (6.) To children and fools, and all those whose understanding is but a little better, it hath been in all ages practised, that they be affrighted with mormoes and bugbears, that they may be cozened into good. But this is therefore permitted, because other things which are real, certain, or probable, cannot be understood or perceived by them: and therefore these things are not to be permitted, where it can well be otherwise. If it cannot, it is fit that their understandings should be conducted thither where they ought to go, and by such instruments as can be useful.

RULE VII.

A Conscience determined by the Counsel of wise Men, even against its own Inclinations, may be sure and right.

FOR in many cases the counsel of wise men is the best argument; and if the conscience was first inclined by a weaker, every change to a better is a degree of certainty. In this case, to persist in the first inclination of conscience, is obstinacy, not constancy: but on the other side, to change our first persuasion when it is well built, for the counsel of men of another persuasion, though wiser than ourselves, is levity, not humility. This rule is practicable only in such cases where the conscience observes the weakness of its first inducement, or justly suspects it, and hath not reason so much to suspect the sentence of wiser men. How it is further to be reduced to practice, is more properly to be considered in the third chapter, and thither I refer it.

RULE VIII.

1. His sin is indeed the greater, because it is less excusable and more bold. For the more light there is in a regular understanding, the more malice there is in an irregular will. "If I had not come to them, (said Christ,^g) they had not had sin; but now have they no cover for their sin:" that is, because they are sufficiently taught their duty. It is not an aggravation of sin, barely to say, "It was done against our conscience:" for all sins are so, either directly or indirectly, mediately or immediately, in the principle or in the emanation. But thus; the more sure and confident the conscience is, the sin receives the greater degree. It is an aggravation of it, that it was done against a clear light, and a full understanding, and a perfect, contrary determination.

2. But even then it does not make it to be a distinct sin. "Whatsoever is not of faith, is sin," said the apostle; but he did not say it was two. It is a transcendent passing upon every sinful action, that it is against a known law, and a contrary reason and persuasion; but if this could make the act to be doubly irregular,—by the same reason, every substance must be two, viz. by having a being, and a substantial being. And the proper reason of this is, because the conscience obliges and ties us by the band of the commandment, the same individual band, and no other. The conscience is therefore against the act, because the commandment is against it; the conscience being God's remembrancer, the record, and the register of the law. A thief does not sin against the law and the judge severally; neither does the magistrate punish him one way, and the law another. The conscience hath no law of its own, but the law of God is the rule of it. Therefore, where there is but one obligation to the duty, there can be but one deformity in the prevarication. But,

3. In sins where there is a double formality, there, indeed, in one action there may be two sins, because there is a double law: as he that kills his father, sins twice, he is impious and unjust; he breaks the laws of piety and justice; he sins against the fifth and the sixth commandments at once; he is a murderer, and he is ungrateful, and he is impious. But in sins of a single nature, there is but a single relation. For the conscience and the law is the rule and the parchment; and he that sins against the one, therefore also sins against the other, because they both terminate but one relation.

4. But although he does not commit two sins, yet he commits one great one,—there being nothing that can render an action culpable or imputable in the measures of justice, but its being a deviation from, or a contradiction to, the rule. It is against my conscience, that is, against my illuminated and instructed reason, therefore it is a sin: this is a demonstration, because it is against God, and against myself; against my reason, and his illumination; that is, against all bands, Divine and human.

5. Quest. But then what shall a judge do, who knows the witnesses in a criminal cause to have sworn falsely? The case is this: Conopus, a Spartan judge, walking abroad near the gardens of Onesicritus, spies him killing of his slave Asotus; who, to palliate the fact, himself accuses another of his servants, Orgilus, and compelled some to swear it as he affirmed. The process was made, advocates entertained by Onesicritus, and the poor Orgilus convict by testimony and legal proof. Conopus, the judge, knows the whole process to be injurious, but knows not what to do, because he remembers that he is bound to judge according to allegation and proof, and yet to do justice and judgment, which, in this case, is impossible. He therefore inquires for an expedient, or a peremptory resolution on either hand: since he offends against the laws of Sparta, the order of law, and his own life, if he acquits one who is legally convicted; and yet, if he condemns him whom he knows to be innocent, he sins against God and nature, and against his own conscience.

6. That a judge not only may, but is obliged to, proceed according to the process of law, and not to his own private conscience, is confidently affirmed by Aquinas, by his master, and by his scholars, and, of late, defended earnestly by Didacus Covaruvias, a learned man indeed and a great lawyer; and they do it upon this account:

7. (1.) For there is a double person or capacity in a judge; he is a private person, and hath special obligations and duties incumbent upon him in that capacity: and his conscience hath a proper information, and gives him laws, and hath no superior but God: and as he is such a one, he must proceed upon the notices and persuasions of his conscience, guided by its own measures. But as he is a judge, he is to do the office of a judge, and to receive information by witnesses and solemnities of law, and is not to bring his own private conscience to become the public measure. Not Attilius Regulus, but the consul, must give sentence: and since he is bound to receive his information from witnesses, as they prove, so the law presumes; whose minister because he is, if there be any fault, it is in the law, not in the judge; and in this case, the judge does not go against his conscience, because by oath he is bound to go according to law. He, indeed, goes against his private knowledge; but that does not give law to a judge, whose knowledge is to be guided by other instruments. (2.) And it is here as in a case of execution of sentences, which is another ministry of law. "Ordinarius tenetur obsequi delegato, etsi sciat sententiam illam injustam, exequi nihilominus tenetur eandem," said Innocentius III.^h The executioner is not to refuse his office, though he know the judge to have condemned an innocent: for else

he might be his judge's judge, and that not for himself alone, but also for the public interest. For if an executioner, upon his persuasion that the judge did proceed unjustly against the life of an innocent, shall refuse to put him to death, he judges the sentence of the judge over again, and declares publicly against it, and denies to the commonwealth the effect of his duty: so does a judge, if he acquits him whom the law condemns, upon the account of his private knowledge. (3.) It is like speaking oracles against public authority from a private spirit. (4.) Which thing, if it were permitted, the whole order and frame of judicatures would be altered, and a door opened for a private and an arbitrary proceeding: and the judge, if he were not just, might defame all witnesses, and acquit any criminal, and transfer the fault to an innocent and unsuspected, and so really do that which he pretends to avoid. (5.) And the case would be the same, if he were a man confident and opinionative. For he might seem to himself to be as sure of his own reason, as of his own sense; and his conscience might be as effectively determined by his argument as by his eyes; and then by the same reason he might think himself bound to judge against the sentence of the law, according to his own persuasion, as to judge against the forms of law, and proceedings of the court, according to his own sense. (6.) And therefore not only in civil but in the ecclesiastical courts we find it practised otherwise: and a priest may not refuse to communicate him, whom he knows to have been absolved upon a false allegation, and unworthily; but must administer sacraments to him according to the public voice, not to his own private notice: for it would be intolerable, if that which is just in public, should be rescinded by a private pretence, whether materially just or no; not only because there are other measures of the public and private, and that to have that overborne by this would destroy all government; but because if this private pretence be admitted, it may as well be falsely as truly pretended: and therefore, since real justice by this means cannot be secured, and that unless it were, nothing could make amends for the public disorder, it follows that the public order must be kept, and the private notice laid aside. (7.) For the judge lays aside the affections of a man, when he goes to the seat of judgment; and he lays aside his own reason, and submits to the reason of the law,—and his own will, relinquishing that to satisfy the law; and therefore he must bring nothing of a private man with him, but his own abilities fitted for the public. (8.) And let no man in this case pretend to zeal for truth and righteousness; for since in judicatures, legal or seeming truth is all that can be secured, and with this the laws are satisfied, we are sure we may proceed upon the testimony of concurring witnesses, because they do speak legal truth; and that being a proportionable conduct to legal persons, is a perfect rule for the conscience of a judge; according to the words of our blessed Saviour quoted out of Moses's law, "It is written in your law, the testimony of two men is true,"¹ that is, it is to be accepted as if it were true, and proceedings are to be accordingly. In pursuance and verification of this, are those words of St. Ambrose:^k "Bonus judex nihil ex arbitrio suo facit, et domesticæ proposito voluntatis, sed juxta leges et jura pronunciat, scitis juris obtemperat, non indulget propriæ voluntati, nihil paratum et meditatum domo defert, sed sicut audit, ita judicat." "A good judge does nothing of his will, or the purpose of his private choice, but pronounces according to laws and public right, he obeys the sanctions of the law, giving no way to his own will, he brings nothing from home prepared and deliberated, but as he hears so he judges." This testimony is of the more value, because St. Ambrose had been a judge and a ruler himself in civil affairs, and therefore spake according to the sense of those excellent laws, which almost all the civil world have since admitted. (9.) And the thing is confessed in the parallel cases: for a judge may not proceed upon the evidence of an instrument which he hath privately perused, if it be not produced in court, though he by that could be enabled to do justice to the oppressed party; for he does not know it as a judge, but as a private man; and though that be a distinction without a real difference of subject, yet in effect it means, that the laws do not permit a judge to take notice of any private information, which might prove an inlet to all manner of violence and robbery. (10.) And therefore if a priest hearing the confession of Caius, understands that Titius was the complice of Caius's crime, he may not refuse to absolve Titius, though he do not confess the fact in which he took part with Caius; because he is to proceed by the method of that court where he sits judge. For private and personal notice is not sufficient. (11.) And if I do privately know that my neighbour is excommunicate, I am not bound to refuse him my society, till I know it legally; and therefore much less may a judge do a public act, upon private notice, when we may not do even a private act referring to law without a public notice. (12.) And all this is confirmed by the authority of Ulpian:^l "Veritas rerum erroribus gestarum non vitatur, et ideo præses provinciæ id sequatur, quod convenit eum ex fide eorum quæ probabuntur." "The truth of things is not prejudiced by errors in matters of fact: and therefore let the president of the province follow that which is fitting for him, proceeding by the faith of those things which shall be proved." (13.) For since no man must judge by his own private authority, he must not judge by his own private knowledge. (14.) And to what purpose shall he call in witnesses, to give him public information, if when they have done so, he by his private may reject the public?

8. But if after all this you inquire, "What shall become of the judge as a man, and what of his private conscience?" these men answer,—that the judge must use what ingenious and fair artifices he can to save the innocent, or to do justice according to truth, but yet so as he may not prevaricate the duty of a judge: he may use the prudence of a friend and a private man: let him, by various and witty interrogatories, in which he may be helped by the advantage of his private knowing the secret, make ways to entrap the false witnesses, as Daniel did to the two elders in the case of Susanna; or let him refer the cause to the supreme power, or resign his office, or make a deputation to another, or relieve the injured man, or leave a private way for him to escape, or use his power of interpretation, or find some way to elude the unjust hand of justice, which in this case does him wrong by doing right. But if none of these ways, nor any other like them, can preserve the innocent man, or the judge's private conscience, he must do justice according to law, standing upright as a public person, but not stooping to particulars, or twisting himself by his private notices.

9. This is the sum of what is or can be said in this opinion; and though they speak probably and well, yet I answer otherwise, and I suppose, for reasons very considerable. Therefore,

To the question, I answer, that a judge in this case may not do any public act against his private conscience; he may not condemn an innocent whom he knows to be so, though he be proved criminal by false witnesses. And my reasons are these:

10. (1.) "Innocentum et justum non occides," said God;^m To slay an innocent person is absolutely and indispensably evil. Upon which ground I argue; That which is in its own nature essentially and absolutely evil, may not be done for any good, for any pretence, for any necessity, nor by any command of man. Since therefore in the present case, the man is supposed innocent, he ought not to be delivered to death for any end in the world, nor by any authority, much less for the preservation of the forms of courts, or to prevent a possible evil that may accidentally and by abuse arise; especially since the question here is not matter of prudence or policy, but of justice and conscience; nor yet of the public interest, but of the judge's duty; nor at all, what the laws actually do constitute and appoint, but what the judge may really practise. Now, in all cases, if a man dies, it must be by the merit of the cause, or for some public end. The first is not supposed in this question, because the man is supposed innocent; and if the latter be pretended, it is an open profession of doing evil that good may come of it. And if it be answered, that this is true, if the man did appear to be innocent, but in law he appears otherwise; I reply, that it is true, to the law he does so, but not to the judge; and therefore, though the law can condemn him, yet she cannot do it by that judge. He must not do it, because it being by an unavoidable defect or error that the law may do it, and if the law could be rightly informed, she would not, she could not, do it, it follows that the judge who is rightly informed, can no more do it than the law itself, if she had the same information.

11. (2.) To judge according to forms and processes of law, is but of human positive right and constitution; for the law may command a judge to proceed according to his own knowledge, if she will trust him and his knowledge: and in all arbitrary courts it is so; and in the supreme power it is always so, if it be absolute. But not to condemn the innocent, is of Divine and eternal right, and therefore cannot be prejudiced by that which only is human. And indeed if we look into the nature and causes of things, we shall find, that the reason why judges are tied to forms and processes of laws, to testimonies and judicial proofs, is, because the judge is supposed not to know the matters brought before him, till they appear, in the forms of law. For if a judge did know men's hearts, and the secrets of things and causes,—supposing him to be honest, he were the fittest person in the world to be a judge, and can proceed summarily, and needs no witnesses. But this is the way of the Divine judgment, who proceeds upon his own knowledge, though for the declaration of his justice to men, he sometimes seems to use processes, and measures of human inquiry; as in the case of Sodom, and the like. And in proportion, if God should reveal to a judge the truth of every cause that lies before him, I think no man doubts, but he might safely proceed to judgment upon that account. This was the case of Daniel and Susanna. For she was convicted and proved guilty by concurrent witnesses; God revealed the truth to Daniel, and he arrested judgment upon that account. Upon examination of the witnesses he finds them disagree in the circumstances; but this was no legal conviction of their falsehood in the main; but it was therefore sufficient, because Daniel came in the manner of a prophet, and knew the truth from God, not by forms of law. Now it matters not, as to the justice of the proceeding, which way the truth be known; for the way of receiving it is but extrinsical to the main question: and as Daniel being made judge by God, might not have consented to the death of Susanna, though not only the two elders, but ten more, had sworn that they had seen Susanna sin; so neither can a judge, to whom God by some special act of providence in behalf of truth and innocence hath made known the matter, proceed to sentence against that knowledge, which he by Divine dispensation hath received.

12. (3.) If a king, or senate, or any supreme power, receive testimony of a matter of fact concerning any of their council, whom they know to be innocent; as if it be legally proved that Sempronius robbed a man, upon the kalends of March, a hundred miles from the place where the king or senate saw him sitting all that day; that they may not deliver him to death appears therefore, because they, being accountable to none but God, must judge by his measures, that is, so as to preserve the innocent, and not by those measures which men's necessity, and imperfection, and weaknesses, have made regularly necessary. But that which is regularly necessary, may irregularly and by accident in some cases be unjust, and in those the supreme power must make provisions where it can, and it can when it knows the truth of the particular. For since the legislative power can dispense in the administration of its own laws upon particular necessities, or charity upon the affirmation and petition of him that needs it: much more must it dispense with the forms of proceedings in a case of such necessity, and justice, and charity, and that upon their own knowledges. The affirmation of the argument is, that princes and senates may and must do this; that it is necessary, and therefore also just, in them to do so. The consequent of the argument is this: that therefore if private judges may not do so, it is because they have no authority to do so, but are compelled by their princes to proceed by forms: and, if this be all, it declares the necessity of such proceedings to be only upon man's authority; and so, though by law he may be bound to do so, yet our inquiry being what he is tied to do in conscience, the law cannot prevail above conscience, the subordinate above the superior,—there being, in this case, a knowledge of the fact, and the law of God for the right.

13. (4.) For the case is this; God says, "Thou shalt not slay the innocent," and the judge does certainly know, that the accused man is truly innocent: the conclusion is, Therefore this man must not die. Against this, the argument opposed is this: human authority says, Thou shalt slay him that is convicted of a fault, whether by true or false witnesses: here are witnesses which do convict him, and I know them to be false: the conclusion is, Therefore this man must die. Which of these two arguments ought to prevail, I think needs not much inquiry.

14. (5.) And what if Titius be accused for killing Regulus, whom the consul at that time hath living in his house, or hath lately sent abroad; would not all the world hoot at him, if he should deliver Titius to the tormentors for killing the man whom the judge knows to be at home, it may be dressing of his dinner, or abroad gathering his rents? But if this be so absurd, (as it is indeed extremely,) it follows that he may use his private knowledge against a false testimony that is public. Or how if he sees the fact done before him in the court? a purse cut, or a stone thrown at his brother-judge, as it happened at Ludlow not many years since? The judge proceeded to sentence upon intuition of the fact, and stayed not for the solemnities of law. Or put case that there be depositions offered on both sides, for and against the innocent, either directly or indirectly. If in this case the judge's private knowledge may determine for either, it follows that his private knowledge can be admitted as the instrument of justice; and if it may, it must; for nothing can hinder him to do it, but because he may not. But that he may, appears in the now alleged instances.

15. (6.) Adrianus puts another case, in which it is also without contradiction evident that private notice is to be preferred before public solemnity, where there is an error in this and none in that. The case I choose to express in this narrative. Viretta, a naughty woman, pretends to be wife to Coloro, an Italian gentleman, and brings a priest and witnesses whom she had suborned, to prove the marriage. The judge gives sentence for Viretta, and commands Coloro to pay the duties of a husband to her, and to use her as a wife. He knows the contrary, and that he is husband to Vittoria Morisini, and therefore pays her all his duty, and neglects the other; and he is bound to it, because no man's error or malice can alter the laws of God, and from paying that duty which he knows is due by the laws of God, he cannot be excused by any formal error arising in the administration of the laws of man. The same is the judge's case. For if the law commands him to do an act against a known private duty, he is so to follow the duty he knows he owes to God, in preserving the innocent, as Coloro is bound to preserve his duty to his wife, and the judge may no more commit murder than Coloro may commit adultery; but neither of them can be rescued but by their private conscience, therefore they may use that. And there is no escape in this instance, because the subject is as much bound to submit to the sentence of the law, as the judge is to the forms of it; and that which secures one, secures both.

16. (7.) The evils that may be consequent to the strict adherence to the forms and proofs of law against the judge's conscience, may be so great as to be intolerable, and much greater than can be supposed to be consequent to the following a certain unsolemn truth. And there is no man, but put the case so as himself and his party may be involved in ruin by false witness, and he will grant that himself is by all means to be preserved. Put case a whole order of the clergy, of monks, of lawyers, should be accused falsely and oppressed by evil men, as the knights templars were accused fiercely, and so were the religious in Henry VIII.'s time: if the king had known that the monks, and the pope had known that the templars had been innocent, no man ought to have persuaded them to condemn the guiltless. For if the king had proceeded against them to confiscation, making use of his advantage gotten by the sin of vile men, the effect had been, that he would rather have gotten money by a lie, than have done justice to the oppressed according to his conscience. And indeed, because it is not to be supposed but all the world would have given sentence for themselves in their own case, it is to be supposed that the contrary opinion is but the sentence of men in prosperity, or of inexperienced scholars, who care not what load they put upon others to verify their own opinion. And what christian will not condemn Pilate for condemning the most holy Jesus, according to the testimonies of his false accusers, and against his own conscience? And let the case be put, that the witnesses had agreed, and proved foul things against the unspotted Lamb of God, and made all clear in forms of law, and that Pilate had known the Lord to be innocent and injured, could the water in the basin have washed him clean, if he had, against his conscience, in compliance with the solemn perjuries, have condemned him who was purer than the angels? In this case the effect had been intolerable, for which no pretence of necessity, or legal formalities, could have made recompence.

17. (8.) A law founded upon presumption binds not in the court of conscience, when the presumption is found to be an error. The law presumes that the heir entering upon an estate, if he makes not an inventory, does it to conceal the goods, and defraud the creditors. But if an heir does so by negligence, or ignorance, or an impertinent fear, or upon ill counsel, or be betrayed to do so; if the creditor knows that the goods are not sufficient, he may not in conscience take the advantage the law gives him, but is bound to do charity and justice by the measures of his private knowledge, and not by the measures of the law to do violence and oppression, which was the thing in question.

18. (9.) To the verification of the sentence of death upon an accused person there are required, 1. A reality of the crime. 2. A power in the judge. 3. And equity in the law. Now if divers men should swear that the judge hath a competent power, nay, though they threaten him with death if he does not, yet he may not exercise any such power, which himself privately knows that he hath not. So also, if he knows the fact does not deserve death, though men swear it, or a higher power declare it, or another competent judge affirm it, yet a judge must not consent to it, if himself knows it to be unjust. And I have read of an excellent prince, who because he did consent to the forms and processes of law made by his senate against the bravest of his subjects, against his own conscience and knowledge, repented of it all the days of his life, and was not pardoned for it till the day of his death; and the first confidence he had of pardon, was upon the account of St. Paul's words, "He that is dead, is justified from sins." But then, since the defect of either of these two makes it unlawful for a judge to proceed according to the forms of law, and ties him to follow his conscience even against allegation and proof, much more must it be so, if there be no reality of fact in the accused party; because in the destitution of this, the laws themselves have no power, and therefore they can give none to a judge their minister. "Justis lex non est posita;" "The law was not made for the innocent," but to defend them, and therefore hath no power to destroy them; and then the judge can have none,—and so cannot in that case be tied to proceed according to formalities,—and therefore must proceed according to his conscience, or not at all. For,

19. (10.) If a law were made that a judge should be bound to condemn an innocent person, though he knows him to be so, and to be accused by calumny, and supplanted by perjury, it were an unjust law, as all men (that I know of) grant, and indeed must grant. For it were a law made to encourage perjurers and oppressors, to discourage innocence; a law made against the intention of laws, which is, to defend the right and punish the wrong-doer: it were a law disabling the judge to rescue the oppressed, and a law expressly disowning the cause of the afflicted: and if any judge should undertake his office upon such terms, he should openly profess that, if the case happened, he would do against his conscience. And all laws going the best way they can to find out truth, would never disable a judge to make use of it when he had found it out, and assisted the inquiry of the laws by a fortunate discovery. For the examining of witnesses being but a means to find out truth, cannot possibly be so adhered to, as to be preferred before the end to which it is designed; that were as if a man should rather love to seek than find. Since, therefore, no law ever was, or can be, so unreasonable as to decree that a judge shall not, in such a case, directly relieve the innocent, but proceed to his condemnation, it follows that he can have no obligation to do so, and then the obligation of his conscience can upon no pretence be declined. The law does not intend to oblige the judge in that case, because no law can be made expressly to do so; he, therefore, being free from the law in that case, stands bound to his private conscience, without excuse. Nay, the canon law expressly enjoins that a judge should give sentence according to his own conscience, as appears in "c. l. de Re Judic. in 6. et in Clem. 1. sect. Verum de Hæret."

20. (11.) Suppose a judge should suborn false witnesses against an innocent; either he is bound not to proceed according to allegation and proof, but according to his secret conscience, or else he is bound to go on in his crime, and effect that which he had maliciously designed. For it is not enough that he is bound to disengage the witnesses and take off the subornation: for suppose the persons already appearing will not cease, lest they should be ashamed and ruined, but will take confidence from their crime, and perseverance from their publication, then there is no remedy for the innocent, neither can the judge rescue him from himself, nor give over sinning, unless he proceed by his private certain measures, and not by those which are false and public. For to say he may be sorry for his fault, and yet proceed in it, is to make him a hypocrite: if he confesses that he suborned the witnesses, and yet proceed to condemn the innocent, he is ridiculous, and makes the law put on the face of tyranny and unreasonable violence and oppression. So that either he must go on and sin to the end without remedy, or he must be admitted to proceed by his private conscience, and that in his case would be justice and penitence besides.

21. (12.) Lastly, all laws being intended for the good of the subjects, are bound not only to comply with their ordinary cases by ordinary provisions, but for their accidental needs by the extraordinary. And so we find it, that all laws yield in particulars, when the law is injurious in the special cases: and this is the ground of all chancery, because "summum jus, summa injuria;" and Solomon advised well, "Noli esse justus nimium," "Be not over righteous;" and the justice of God being ἐπιείκεια, gentleness and favour, equity and mercy, ours is best when we follow the best precedent: now since no case is more favourable than the present, the laws are unjust that will not bend and stoop to the miseries of the oppressed; and therefore the judge having no hinderance, he is tied by a double band to relieve the oppressed innocent, by his direct sentence, (where it can be admitted,) or by his open declaration, and "quantum in se est," but at no hand to consent to his condemnation.

22. I conclude, therefore, with that rule of the canonⁿ law, "Melius est scandalum nasci quam ut veritas deseratur;" "It is better that a scandal should be suffered, and an offence done to the forms and methods of judicial proceedings, than that truth should be betrayed and forsaken;" and what was said in the prophecy concerning our blessed Saviour, "Non secundum auditum aurium arguet," "He shall not reprove according as he hears," but according as he knows, is also true of judges in this case: they do judge most perfectly, when, in truth and in defence of the innocent, they follow the pattern of the Divine judgment, and not the imperfection of the human, that is, they are to judge by the eyes, not by the ears;

*Segnius irritant animos demissa per aures,
Quam quæ sunt oculis commissa fidelibus—*

That is a sure sentence that can rely upon ocular demonstration; for our eyes are a better guard of innocence than the tongues of sycophants, and our consciences are surer informers than the forms of law; and since no law hath declared against it, the conscience is at perfect liberty; and yet if it were not, we are certain it is better to obey God than men; the conscience is no man's servant, it is God's only. Conscience is God's angel: "Grieve not the angel, lest he smite thee; do nothing against him, lest he forsake thee."—"Viro bono fixum in omni vitâ est, transversum unguem à rectâ conscientiâ non discedere," said Cicero;ⁿ "Every good man is perfectly resolved not to depart from his right conscience a hair's breadth during his whole life."

23. And now to the pretences which are made on the other side, there will be the less need of a reply, if we consider that they only prove that a judge is tied to observe the forms of judicial process, and to proceed according to allegation and proof, ordinarily and regularly, as supposing that this is the best ordinary way of information, as it is most certainly. But as the law, using the best she hath, would not yet refuse a prophet from heaven, or a miracle to bring truth from her retirements, or her veil, so neither will she refuse any better way that can be offered; but whatever the law would do, yet the question now being concerning the judge, it is certain that the judge, in the case now put, hath a surer way of evidence: and therefore as the law, if she had a surer way of evidence, ought not to go against so clear a light, so neither can the judge. And the arguments, only proceeding upon the usual suppositions, conclude that regularly judges must do as usually they can do, that is, proceed according to proof, because they can have no better way, but they cannot be drawn to this extraordinary and rare contingency. For though most men are brought in upon suspicion or private accusation, yet the apostle says that "some men's sins are manifest, going before unto judgment:" and when this happens, the judge must not go in inquest after what he sees. And the same arguments may as well be urged against all dispensations and remissions, against favour and chancery, and destroy all equity, and all religion, as to destroy all conscience when it is certain and infallible. But I shall say something to the particulars.

24. (1.) It is true that a judge hath a double capacity, and he hath offices proportionable; some as a man, some as a judge; that is, he hath some natural and essential obligations, some which are superinduced upon his office. And therefore, I refuse to use this distinction as it is commonly used, and so made more subject to mistake and abuse. In this case the judge is not to be considered as a public man and a private man; for private is as much superinduced as public, and his other relations are as much to yield to his essential duty, as that of a judge: such as are the relation of a husband, of a father, of a tutor, of a master; and, amongst these, the more private is often tied to yield to the more public. But therefore in this case the judge is to be considered as a judge and as a man; and in this case the duties are sometimes disparate, but never contrary; and when there is a dispute, the superinduced must yield to that which is original; for whatsoever is his duty as a man, the judge may not prevaricate; for it is the man that is the judge, in the man that office is subjected, and the office of a judge is bound upon him by the conscience of the man. If the judge had two consciences, and two real persons, then it were to be granted that they were to be served and attended to in their several callings; but it is not so: they are but two persons in fiction of law, but materially, and to all real events, the same: it is the same conscience ministering to divers duties: and therefore as the judge is always that man, so his conscience is the conscience of that man; and because as a man he must not go against his conscience,—so when that man is a judge, he must not go against the man's conscience, for the judge is still that man ruled by that conscience. The essential duty of a man cannot by any superinduced formality be dispensed with. Now to go according to our conscience and knowledge is the essential rule and duty of a man, which he cannot put off by being a judge. The new office superinduces new obligations, but none contrary, no more than he can cease being a man by being a judge. "Certe prior anima quàm litera, et prior sermo quàm liber, et prior sensus quàm stylus, et prior homo quàm philosophus et poeta;"^o He is first a man, and then a philosopher, a poet, or a judge; and that which is first, cannot be prejudiced by what is superinduced. And if the judge go against the conscience of the man, pretending to do according to the conscience of the judge, the man shall be damned,—and where the judge shall then appear, any child can tell. If the bishop of Bayeux, as earl of Kent, will rebel against his prince, the earl of Kent shall lose his head, though the bishop of Bayeux may plead his clergy. For in this there is a great mistake. To be a man and to be a judge, are not to be compared as two distinct capacities of equal consideration. To be a bishop and to be a ⁿ Cap. penult. de Reg. Jur.

judge are properly such, and have distinct measures; but to be a man is the subject of the two capacities, and cannot be laid aside as either of the other may; and therefore the distinction is vain and sophistical: and if it could be admitted in metaphysics, (in which yet it appears to have an error,) yet it can never be suffered to pass to real events. This being the ground of all the contrary opinion, and being found false, the superstructure must also fall to the ground. To the special cases this I answer:

25. (2.) An executioner may not refuse to do his office, though the judge hath given an unjust sentence: it is true only when the matter is dubious, or not known, or intolerable. But if the judge commands the hangman to flay a prophet alive, or to crucify Christ, or to strike his king through with a sword, I doubt not but the adversaries themselves will think he is not obliged to obey.—Indeed this ought not easily to be drawn into a rule, lest such people turn it into a pretence.—But if the executioner be sure, and the matter be notorious, and such as cannot deceive him, his hand ought not to be upon an innocent. For as receivers are to thieves, so are executioners to unjust judges. When the fact is notorious, and the injustice evident, then it is such as all men can see it: and then, as if there were no receivers, there would be no thieves; so if there were no executioners of unjust sentences, the judge would be apt to reverse his sentence.

26. (3.) Now whereas it is pretended that if a private notice were admitted against public evidence, it were like a private spirit against a public article, and would open a way to every pretension, it would dissolve the forms of judicatures, and introduce many evils: I answer, that if all this were true, and that for this there could be no remedy, nor yet any recompence in the special cases, it would follow that the law were prudent, if it did refuse to admit such a proceeding, unless she had some reason to trust the judge: but this were nothing to the judge. For the law therefore refuses his testimony, because she hath that which she presumes is better, and because she, not knowing the secret, follows the best way she hath. But the judge knows the secret, and he is not deceived, and he does not make pretences, for the case supposes him to speak according to his conscience; and therefore, although the law in prudence does not believe him, yet he cannot but believe himself, and therefore in duty to God must proceed accordingly, or must not proceed at all.

27. (4.) Neither is this like a private spirit against a public article; because this conscience of the judge does not impose upon the public, who hath power to admit or to refuse his sentence; but it is only for himself: and although his conscience ought not to be the public measure, yet it ought to be his own. I do not doubt but the law may go against the judge's conscience, but the judge himself may not go against his own.

28. (5.) And this we see verified in the matter of a private evidence; for though the judge hath seen it in a chamber, yet he must not judge by it in the court, the law will not suffer him to do so: but yet for himself he may so far make use of it, as to be persuaded in his conscience, and to understand on which side the right stands, and to favour it in all the ways that are permitted him. But the case here being not matter of life and death, the law hath power to dispose of estates, and the conscience of the judge is not obliged to take more care of a man's money or land than himself does, but it can be obliged to take care of men's lives, when the injured person is not able. A man may give away his estate, but he may not give his life away; and therefore he may lose his estate by such ways, by which he ought not to be permitted to lose his life. Add to this, that a judge having seen an instrument in private which could much clear the cause depending, may not upon that account proceed to sentence, because, it may be, the adverse party can give an answer to it, and make it invalid; whereas in matters of fact, of which the judge is conscious, there is no uncertainty nor fallibility. And, lastly, the suffering party in the question of money or lands suffers no inconvenience, but what is outweighed to the public by the order of justice and solemnities of law; and the man that loses to-day for want of producing his evidence, may produce it to-morrow and recover it. But in matter of life and death, nothing can make recompence to the oppressed innocent; and if he suffers to-day, he cannot plead an error in the indictment to-morrow. For these and many other considerations the case is wholly different.

29. (6.) By some of these things we may also answer to the instance of a confident and opinionative judge. He may not prefer his private opinion before the sentence of the law, and bring it into open judgment. 1. Because he himself may be deceived in his opinion, and his confidence is no argument that he is not deceived. 2. Because if the sentence and decree of the law be less reasonable, yet the judge without sin may proceed to it, because the more reasonable is not in his choice, and the less reasonable is not absolutely and simply unjust. 3. In matters of prudence and civil government there is no demonstration of reason, but the legislative power may determine for the public interest as is presently apprehended, and may refuse the better counsel, and yet do well enough; for that which is simply the better, is not in these cases necessary; and in such things a man's reason ought not to be so confident, as he is of what he sees, or what is matter of faith; and therefore in these only he is to be guided by his own, in the other he must proceed by the public measures. And as in all things, not demonstratively certain or evident, the executioner is bound to obey the judge; so is the judge bound to obey the law; and the presumption will lie for the law against the judge, as it will lie for the judge against the officer. 4. And yet, after all, I do not doubt but if a judge's conscience were effectively determined against a law, and that he did believe it to be unjust and unlawful, he ought to follow his conscience. As if a judge did believe it to be a sin to put a man to death for stealing thirteen pence halfpenny, he might not condemn such a thief to the gallows. And he is not excused by saying, "It is not the judge but the law that does amiss." For if the judge believe the law to be unjust, he makes himself a partner in the injustice by ministering to an unjust law against his conscience. For not only he that commands evil to be done is guilty, but he that obeys such a command. In this case, either the judge must lay aside his opinion or his office; for his conscience must not be laid aside.

30. (7.) The instance of a priest and an excommunicate person unworthily absolved will no way conclude this question. 1. Because the case is infinitely differing between condemning an innocent, and acquitting the guilty. If any man pretends he is satisfied in conscience that the accused person is criminal, though it cannot be legally proved, yet there is no wrong done, if the accused man be let free; an inconvenience there may be, but the judge must not be permitted to destroy by his private conscience, against or without legal conviction, because the evil may be intolerable if it be permitted, and the injustice may be frequent and insufferable; but if it be denied, there may sometimes happen an inconvenience by permitting a criminal to live, but there can be no injustice done. It may have excuse, and it may have reason, and it may have necessity, that a judge refuse to consent to the death of an innocent; but that he should against his conscience kill him, can have no warrant: and if he be not innocent, there may be reason to let him alone, but none to condemn if he be. Conscience can oblige a judge to an unsolemn absolution, but not to an illegal and unsolemn condemnation. This should have been considered in the earl of Strafford's case. The law hath power to forgive the criminal, but not to punish the guiltless. And therefore if a man be absolved when he deserved it not, we may suppose him pardoned, and the private priest is not his judge in that case. For to refuse to communicate him is an act of public judicature, and to absolve him is an act of the same power, and therefore must be dispensed by authority, not by usurpation, that is, by the public sentence, not by the private minister, since to give the holy communion to such a person is not against any essential duty of a christian. And therefore if the priest knows him unworthy to communicate, he may separate him so far as he hath power to separate him, that is, by the word of his proper ministry: let him admonish to abstain, represent his insufficiency, threaten him with the danger; but if he will despise all this, the private priest hath no more to do, but to pray and weep for him, and leave him to God and the church. But of this I am to speak more largely in its proper place.

31. (8.) As for the case of a priest hearing confessions, though he find Titius accused by Caius, yet if Titius does not accuse himself, Titius is rather to be believed in his own case than Caius in another man's. Because in this intercourse every man is so concerned to do his duty, that every man is to be believed for himself and against himself, because if he speaks false, himself only is the loser. 2. Caius accusing Titius may, for aught the confessor knows, tell a lie and abuse him, and therefore he cannot pretend knowledge and conscience against Titius; and so this comes not home to the present case, which supposes the judge to know the accused person to be innocent. 3. This argument supposes that a man cannot be absolved unless he enumerate all his sins to the priest; which being in many cases false, (as I have shown elsewhere,^p) that which relies upon it can signify nothing.

32. (9.) Last of all, although the judge must lay aside his affections, and his will, and his opinion, when he sits upon the seat of judgment, because these are no good measures of judicature, nor ought to have immediate influence upon the sentence; yet he cannot lay aside his knowledge, and if he lay aside his conscience, he will make but an ill judge. 2. And yet the judge must lay his affections and his will aside never, but when they tempt him to injustice. For a judge must not cease to be merciful when it does not make him unjust; nor need he cease to please himself, so long as he is pleased to do right: these if they do hurt indeed must be left off, else not; and therefore it cannot with any colour from hence be pretended, that he must lay aside his knowledge, when it is the only way by which he can do good.

33. (10.) To the authority of St. Ambrose, what I have already said is a sufficient answer. For he speaks of a judge's office regularly and usually, not what he is to do in cases extraordinary, and such as is the present question. But he that said, "Sicut audit, ita judicat," would no less have said, "Sicut videt, ita judicat." The seeing of his eyes is as sure a measure as the hearing of his ears.

34. (11.) As for the words of Ulpian I will give no other answer, than that Panormitan and Covaruvias, who urge them and are concerned to make the most of them, do yet confess that they make as much against them as for them, and that they say true, will appear to any ordinary understanding that considers them.

(12.) For although no judge must do acts of a private authority, yet he may as well use his own private knowledge, as he may use the private knowledge of the witnesses; for their knowledge is as private as the judge's till it be brought into open court, and when his is brought thither it is as public as theirs; but however, to argue from the authority to the knowledge is a plain paralogism; for the prince who armed him with public authority, did not furnish him with a commission of knowledge, but supposed that to be induced by other ways.

(13.) And therefore the judge may, when he hath called witnesses, reject them upon his own certain knowledge, as well as use arts of discovery, or any other collateral ways to secure the innocent. For it may as well be inquired concerning the judge's using his knowledge to the infatuating or discovering the falsehood of the evil witnesses, as to the rejecting them. For if he must absolutely take all for granted which they say, then he must use no arts to invalidate their testimony; but if he may do that, he may do the other, and yet the calling in of witnesses may be to many good purposes, and by the collision of contraries light may arise, and from falsehood also truth may be produced like a fair child from a foul mother. And after all, though this question is not to be determined on either side by authorities, yet because amongst the writers of cases of conscience very many rely much upon the testimony of authors, I think it not amiss to say, that this sense of the question which I defend, was the sentence of many eminent divines and lawyers, particularly Nicolaus Lyra, Adrianus, Angelus, Navarre, Hostiensis, Calderinus, Panormitan, Martinus, Johannes Arboræus, Oldendorp, Corrasius, Lessius, Bresser, and divers others; and therefore besides the strength of the reasons, I walk the more confidently by having such good company.

35. To conclude: All those advices of prudence which are given by the adverse party in this affair, as expedients for the judges to proceed by in such cases, I am ready to admit, if they will secure their conscience and the life of the innocent oppressed. But if they will not, but that the judge must give sentence for law or for conscience, the case to me seems very clear. God is greater than our conscience, but our conscience is greater than any thing besides. "Fiat jus et pereat mundus," said St. Austin; "ad hæc, imagine ne naturæ veritas obumbretur, curandum." For images and forms of things, the natural and substantial truth of things may not be lost or prejudiced. Let justice be done whatsoever be the event.

"Accipere personam improbi non est bonum, ut pervertas justum in judicio:" "It is not good to receive the person of a wicked man, thereby to overthrow the righteous in his cause."⁴

RULE IX.

The Goodness of an Object is not made by Conscience, but is accepted, declared, and published by it, and made personally obligatory.

1. No object can have its denomination from the judgment of reason, save only that from thence it may be said to be understood to be good, to be declared, to be consented to: all which supposes the object to be good, or to be so apprehended. Just as an emerald is green before the eye perceives it so: and if the object were not in itself good, then the reason were deceived in consenting to it, and a deceiver in publishing it.

2. This is true in respect of the material, fundamental, and proper goodness of the object; for this it hath independently of the conscience: and the rectitude of the conscience is dependent on this, and consequent to the perception of it. But yet there is a formal, extrinsical, and relative goodness passed upon an object by the conscience, by whose persuasion although an evil object do not become naturally good, yet it becomes personally necessary; and in the same proportion a good object may become evil.

3. The purpose of this is to remonstrate that we must rather look to the rule than to the present persuasion; first taking care that our conscience be truly informed, before it be suffered to pass a sentence; and it is not enough that our conscience tells us thus, unless God hath told the conscience. But yet if the conscience does declare it, it engages us, whether it be right or wrong. But this hath in it some variety.

4. (1.) The goodness of an act depends upon the goodness of an object, that is, upon its conformity to a rational nature and the commands of God. For all acts of will and understanding are of themselves indefinite and undetermined till the relation to an object be considered; but they become good or bad, when they choose or refuse that which is good or bad respectively. To will to do an act of theft is bad, because theft itself is so: to be willing to commit an act of adultery is evil, because all adultery is evil: and on the other side, to be willing to do an act of justice is therefore good, because justice itself is good. And therefore Aristotle defines justice by a habitude or relation to its object. It is "voluntas dandi suum cuique," "a will of giving to every one that which is their due." And therefore our conscience, because it is to receive its information from the rule by which every action is made good or bad, and its motion from the object, is bound to take in that only which is really and truly good, and without sin or error cannot do otherwise.

5. (2.) Although conscience is bound to proceed this way, yet sometimes the younger takes the elder brother by the heel, or gets out before him, and the act gets before the object by indirect means. For though all things should be thought good because they are good, yet some things are made good because they are thought so; and the conscience looking upon its object finds error dressed up in the shape of truth, and takes it in, and adopts it into the portion of truth. And though it can never be made really and naturally good, yet by being supposed so by the conscience, it is sometimes accepted so by God.

6. (3.) Although the rule by which good and bad are measured be in itself perfect, yet it is not always perfectly received by us. Good is proportionable to reason; and as there is "probabiliter verum," so there is "probabiliter bonum," "a probable good," as well as "a probable truth:" and in the inquest after this, we often show a trick of humanity, even to be pitifully deceived; and although when it is so, it is an allay of the good it intends, yet it does not wholly destroy it: God, in his goodness, accepting at our hands for good, what we really and innocently suppose to be so. Just like the country fellow that gave a handful of water to his prince; he thought it a fine thing, and so it was accepted. For when the action and the rule are to be made even, if either of them comply and stoop, the equality is made. God indeed requires the service of all our faculties, but calls for no exact measures of any but the will. For the acts of the will are perfect in their kind, but our understanding is imperfect, therefore this may find an excuse, but that never.

⁴ Prov. xviii. 5.

7. (4.) Upon this account it is, that though the goodness or badness of an act depends upon the quality of the object regularly and naturally, yet the acts become irregularly or accidentally good or bad by the conscience, because the conscience changes the object; that is, the act is good by the object really good, or so apprehended. The object always changes or constitutes the act, but the conscience changing the object immediately, hath a mediate influence upon the act also, and denominates it to be such as in the event it proves. But then in what degrees, and to what events, this change is made, is of more intricate consideration.

What Changes can be made in moral Actions by the Persuasion and Force of Conscience.

8. (1.) Whatsoever is absolutely and indispensably necessary to be done, and commanded by God expressly, cannot be changed by conscience into an evil, or into that which is unnecessary. Because in such cases where the rule is plain, easy, and fitted to the conscience, all ignorance is voluntary, and spoils the consequent act, but never can legitimate it. And the same reason is for things plainly and expressly forbidden, as adultery, murder, sacrilege, and the like; they can never become good by any act of conscience. And therefore in such cases it often happened, that God did declare his judgment to be contrary to the opinion which men had of themselves and of their actions. Sometimes men live contrary to their profession; "they profess" the worship of God, but deny him in their hearts,^r even when they least think they do. Thus the Israelites having constrained Aaron^s to make a golden calf, proclaimed a feast, "To-morrow is a feast unto Jehovah:" but God says of them, "they offered sacrifice to devils and not to God." And so it was with their children after them, who killed and persecuted the apostles and servants of Jesus, and thought they did God good service. He that falls down before an idol, and thinks to do honour to the Lord,—or robs a temple, and thinks it is for religion,—must stand or fall, not by his own fancy, but by sentence of God, and the rule of his law; "Protestatio contra factum," is invalid in law. To strike a man's eye out, and say he did it in sport,—to kill his brother, and think it is well done, because done to prevent his sin, though it may be thought charity by the man,—yet it is murder before God.

9. (2.) Where the rule is obscure, or the application full of variety, or the duty so intricate, that the conscience may inculpably err; there the object can be changed by conscience, and the acts adopted into a good or an evil portion by that influence. He that thinks it unlawful to give money to a poor Turk, hath made it to become unlawful to him, though of itself it seems to be a pious act. So also it is in the uncertain application of a certain proposition. It is certainly unlawful to commit adultery; but if Jacob supposes he lies with Rachel, and she prove to be Leah, his conscience hath not changed the rule, but it hath changed the object and the act; the object becomes his own by adoption, and the act is regular by the integrity of the will. This is that which is affirmed by the apostle, "I know and am persuaded in the Lord Jesus, that there is nothing unclean of itself, but he that thinketh it is unclean, to him it is unclean."^t This instance is in a case in which they might easily be mistaken, and innocently abused, by reason of the prepossession of their minds by Moses's law, and therefore in such cases the conscience rules. They who believe themselves married, may mutually demand and pay their duty: but if they be not married, it is fornication or adultery, as it happens. But if conscience says they are married, it is not adultery, but an act of duty; because the same conscience that declares for the marriage, obliges also to pay their duty, as a matter of necessity. Wherever the understanding is wrong, and the will is wholly right, the action is accepted, and the error pardoned.

10. (3.) When the act is materially evil, the conscience adopting it into a good portion, that is, believing it to be good, does not make a perfect change, but leaves an alloy in the several degrees of its persuasion. For it is impossible that a right conscience and a wrong should have no difference in the effect, especially if there be any thing criminal or faulty in the cause of the error. When two men take up arms in a different cause, as suppose one for his prince, and the other against him; though they be both heartily persuaded, and act according to conscience, yet they do not equally do well or ill. The one shall be accepted, and, it may be, the other pardoned, or excused in various degrees. But this which needs a pardon for one thing, is not, in the whole constitution of it, good for any thing, nor can it be accepted to reward.

11. (4.) If the conscience dictate a thing to be necessary, the thing is become necessary, and at no hand to be declined. This was it which St. Paul said, "He that is circumcised, is a debtor of the whole law,"^u meaning, that though Christ had broken the yoke of Moses, yet if conscience did take up one end of it, and bound it upon itself, the other end would be dragged after it, and by the act of conscience become necessary. If a man inquires, whether he is bound to say his prayers kneeling, or whether he may do it standing, or lying, or leaning; if his conscience be persuaded that he must do it kneeling, it is necessary he should do so, and he may not do it in his bed; because the conscience is a lawgiver, and hath authority over the man, and ought to prevail, when the contrary part is only, that they may do otherwise. For whether this part be true or false, the matter is not so great, because there is no danger if a man do not make use of a liberty that is just: he can let it alone and do well enough: and therefore to follow the other part which is supposed necessary, must needs be his safest way.

But if the question be, whether it be necessary to keep a holy day, or necessary to let it alone;

^r Tit. i. 16.

^s Deut. xxxii. 17.

^t Rom. xiv. 14. Vide Chrysost. in hunc locum. St. Ambros. ib. et Theophyl. ib.

^u Gal. v. 3

there if the conscience determine that for necessary to be done, which is necessary to be let alone, the man is indeed bound to follow his conscience, but he cannot escape a sin. For conscience makes no essential alterations in the thing, though it makes personal obligations to the man; and if it be an evil superstition to keep a holy day, it cannot be made lawful, because the conscience mistaking calls it necessary. And if this were otherwise, it were not a pin-matter what a man thought; for his thinking so becomes his law, and every man may do what is right in his own eyes. And therefore God was pleased expressly to declare it, that if a prophet did mislead the people, both he and they should perish; and our blessed Saviour signified the same thing in a parabolical expression, "If the blind lead the blind, they both fall into the ditch." But in this case there is a fault somewhere, and the man smarts under the tyranny, not the empire of his conscience; for conscience can have no proper authority against the law of God. In this case, that which the conscience falsely calls necessary, becomes so relatively and personally, (that is, he thinks so, and cannot innocently go in the right way, so long as his guide conducts him in the wrong, and yet cannot innocently follow his guide, because she does abuse him,) but in itself, or in the Divine acceptation, it only passes for a "bonum," something there is in it that is good, and that God may regard; there is a "præparatio animi," a willingness to obey.

12. (5.) If the conscience being mistaken in a question, whether an action be good or no, calls that good which is nothing but indifferent; the conscience alters it not, it is still but lawful; but neither necessary nor good, but relatively and collaterally: the person may be pitied and have a gift given him in acknowledgment, but the thing itself cannot expect it. When the lords of the Philistines, that they might deprecate the Divine judgments, offered to God golden mice and emerods, the thing itself was not at all agreeable to the way by which God chose to be worshipped: but their conscience told them it was good, it therefore became lawful to them, but not good in itself; and God, who is the Father of mankind, saw their heart, and that they meant it for good, and he was pleased to take it so. But the conscience, I say, cannot make it good. For to be good or bad is wholly another consideration than to be necessary or not necessary. This distinction is relative to persons, and therefore can be made by conscience in the sense above allowed. But good and bad is an abstract consideration, and relates to the materiality of the object, and is before the act of conscience, not after.

13. (6.) If the conscience being mistaken calls a thing lawful, which is not so in the rule or law of God, there the conscience neither makes an alteration in the thing, nor passes an obligation upon the person. Eleonora de Ferrante was married to a Spanish gentleman, who first used her ill, then left her worse. After some years she is courted by Andrea Philippi her countryman, to marry him. She inquires whether she may or no, and is told by some whom she ought not easily to have believed, that she may; and so she does. But being told, by her confessor, of her sin and shame, she pretends that she did it "bono animo," her conscience was persuaded she might do it, and therefore hopes to be excused or pardoned. He answers her, that her conscience could not make that lawful which God had forbidden, and therefore she ought not to pretend conscience; for though her conscience did say it was lawful, she was not bound to follow it; because though she must do nothing that is unlawful, yet she is not tied to do every thing that is lawful: and though her conscience can give her a law, yet it cannot give her a privilege. She is bound to do what her conscience says is necessary, though it be deceived: and if she does not, she sins against her conscience, which can never be permitted or excused. But if her conscience tells her only it is lawful so to do; if she does not do the thing which her conscience permits, she offends it not, because, though it allows, yet it does not command it. If therefore she does it, and there be an error in the conscience, the sin is as great as the error, great as the matter itself; as if the fact materially be adultery, it is also morally so, and the persuasion of the conscience does not excuse it from being such. The reason is plain; for since the conscience when she allows, does not command, if the person chooses that thing which materially is a sin, it is in pursuance of her own desires, not in obedience to her conscience. It is lust more than conscience. But yet whereas she says she hopes for pardon in this case, there is no question but she may. For she sinned as St. Paul did in persecuting the church; he did it "ignorantly," and so did she. Here only was the difference, he was nearer to pardon than she; because he thought he was bound to do so, and therefore could not resist his conscience so persuaded: she only thought she might do it, and therefore might have chosen. The conscience hath power in obligations and necessities, but not so much, nor so often, in permissions.

CHAPTER III.

OF THE CONFIDENT OR ERRONEOUS CONSCIENCE.

RULE I.

An erroneous Conscience commands us to do what we ought to omit; or to omit what we ought to do, or to do it otherwise than we should.

1. In this there is no other difficulty but in the last clause. For when our blessed Lord had propounded an instance of perfection, he that not only obeys the counsel, but thinks it to be a commandment, and necessary to be done in all times and persons, enters into an error at the gate of zeal, and at the same place lets out the excellency of his love. Christ hath recommended renunciation of the world, spiritual castration for the kingdom of God, dying for our enemies, &c. He that in zeal, with charity and prudence, follows these advices, will find his reward swell high; but he whose zealous desire to grow towards perfection, shall so determine his practice, as that, by degrees, he shall think these counsels individually necessary, hath abused his conscience, laid a snare for others, put fetters upon christian liberty, and is passed into that state of doing it, that though he entered first by love, he is gone beyond it, and changed it into fear, and scruple, and superstition: he is at last got so far that he would not do it at all, if he durst do otherwise; and he dares not, because his love was zealous, and his zeal was imprudent, and his imprudence was a furious snare, and the passion of a mighty folly.

2. But an erroneous conscience is generally abused by two manners of proceeding. 1. By a true application of a false proposition, thus:

Whatsoever is done against my conscience is a sin:
But to allow of magistrates is against my conscience:

Therefore, it is certainly a sin that they be allowed.

The first proposition is not true, unless it be understood of him only, against whose conscience it is done, and then it is always true, either absolutely, or relatively, originally, or accidentally. But if it be intended to conclude, that because it is against my conscience to allow them, therefore it is simply unlawful, or unlawful to every one else, this is a paralogism, and makes an erring conscience. Or, secondly, the conscience is abused, and made erroneous by a false application of a true proposition.

Whatsoever is forbidden by God is a sin:

But every oath is forbidden by God:

Therefore, every oath is a sin.

Every thing here is true but the conclusion. The second proposition is true, but not universally. For St. James saying,^a "Swear not at all," forbids all kinds of oaths materially: that is, in that sense in which any is forbidden, in the same all are forbidden. Without just authority and occasion, it is not lawful to swear by God; therefore, without such authority, neither is it lawful to swear by a creature. So that his words mean thus; except in such a case, "swear not at all,"—that is, not with any kind of oath; for unless that case occurs to warrant it, this or that oath is criminal as well as any: that is, it is no excuse in common talk to say, "it was but a slight oath;" for you must not swear at all, viz. in such circumstances.

The Causes of Error are,

3. (1.) Ignorance, either of right or fact. For no other division of ignorance can concern the relation of an erring conscience. For, although a man is otherwise concerned in ignorance, if it be vincible, otherwise if it be invincible, yet his will is concerned in that directly, and his conscience but collaterally and indirectly.

4. (2.) Fear, whether it be pusillanimous or superstitious, that is, whether it begin upon religion, or upon natural imbecility, they alike abuse the conscience. Ignorance makes it erroneous, but takes not away its confidence, but oftentimes increases it: fear makes it erroneous too; and though it begins in doubting, it ends in a silly choice, which grows to as much confidence as it can, so much as to establish the error.

5. (3.) To this usually is reduced a morose humility and abjection of mind, which, because it looks pitifully and simply, some men in charity think it laudable; so Antoninus particularly; and it is the same that St. Gregory^b recommends, "Bonarum quippe mentium est, ibi etiam aliquo modo culpas suas agnoscere, ubi culpa non est;" It is the sign of a good mind to accuse themselves of a fault when there is none."—Which, if it relates to the present affairs, is dangerous and illusive. For if the question be in a case of conscience, and the conscience be determined upon its proper grounds innocently and right, there to acknowledge a fault in the conscience or determination, is to make the rule itself crooked, to introduce eternal scruples and irresolution, to disturb our own peace, and a device to snatch at a reward by thrusting it from us, and to think to please God by telling of a lie. But if the saying relates to all the whole action in all its conjugation of circumstances and appendages, then it may consist with humility and prudence both, to suspect a fault where there is none; to fear lest we have erred by excess of degrees in passion, or by remissness and slackness of action, or by obliquity of intention, or intertexture of some indecency, or weariness, or sensuality, or complacency, and fantastic deliciousness, or something secret, and we know not what: but even in this case, we may best follow St. Paul's expedient and manner of expression, "Nihil mihi conscius sum," "I am guilty of nothing;" my heart smites me not, "Yet I am not hereby justified; for God is greater than my conscience:" I may, for aught I know, have done something amiss, or my duty not well; but as I cannot accuse myself, so neither can I acquit myself, but refer myself to God's equal and merciful sentence. What goes beyond this, may abuse the conscience, not only by a secret scruple, but by an evil principle and false conclusions: and this, although it looks like modesty, and seems contrary to confidence, and therefore cannot be so well reduced to this kind of conscience, but to the doubting, or the scrupulous; yet I have chosen to place it here for the reason above mentioned. It looks in at the door with a trembling eye, but being thrust in, it becomes bold. It is like a fire-stick, which, in the hand of a child being gently moved, gives a volatile and unfixed light, but being more strongly turned about by a swift circular motion, it becomes a constant wheel of fire: or like a bashful sinner sneaking to his lust, till he be discovered, and then he is impudent and hardened. And there are very many wise men, who tremble in their determinations,—and not being able clearly to resolve, fall upon one part by chance, or interest, or passion, and then they are forced for their peace' sake to put on an accidental hardness, and a voluntary, not a natural confidence. But this confidence is commonly peevish, impatient, and proud, hating all contradiction and contradictors; because it was only an art to sleep, and to avoid the first trouble, and therefore hates every thing that brings them forth from their fantastic securities.

6. Other causes of an erroneous conscience here usually are assigned, but inartificially I suppose, and not of present concernment or relation. Such as are the subtraction of the Divine aids, God's leaving a man, and giving him over εἰς τοὺς ἁῶ-κτιον, and to believe a lie; perplexity, or irresolution, self-love, pride, prejudice, and passion; "perit enim omne iudicium, cum res transierit in affectum; quia affectus obscurat intellectum, ne rectè iudicet," said Seneca. When affection sits judge, there reason and truth are seldom admitted to plead; or if they are, yet they cannot prevail.

Impedit ira animum, ne possit cernere verum.

But these are no otherwise causes of an erroneous conscience, but as they are causes of ignorance, or deception; for in this case I reckon them to be but one; an error being nothing else but an ignorance of truth, which whether it be culpable or inculpable, and at what gate it enters, is of another disquisition, and shall be reserved to its proper place.

RULE II.

An erroneous Conscience binds us to obedience, but not so as a right Conscience does.

1. THE object can move the will no otherwise, than as it is propounded by the understanding. If it be propounded as evil, the will that chooses it under that formality, is criminal and malicious. If it be propounded as good, the will that rejects it so propounded, despises good; for it is so to the will, if it be so to the understanding, which is the judge and the immediate rule of all human actions. And he that does a good thing while he believes it to be evil, does choose the evil, and refuse the good; for he does therefore, because he believes it evil, or though he thinks it so, and therefore is equally disposed to choose a real evil; for that this is not so, is but extrinsical and accidental to his choice.

2. If this were not thus, but that it were possible to be otherwise, then we might suppose that a man might do a thing reasonably, for which he hath no reason; and a humane action without the natural process of humanity, that is, to choose by chance, and unnaturally, to choose for a reason that he hath not, and a good that appears not, which is like beholding of a thing that he sees not. The Jew thinks it is his duty to be circumcised, and to keep the sabbath. While in this error he is confident, by what argument can he be moved to omit it? If you give him reasons, you seek to cure his error, and to alter his persuasion; but while this persuasion is not altered, how can he be moved to omit it? If you give him no reasons, you desire him to omit it, because he thinks he ought not, and to do an action because it seems unreasonable, and follow your opinion because he believes it false; that is, to obey you because he ought not; which is a way not possible to prevail with a wise man, or with a fool; how it may work with any sort of madness, I know not.

3. But against this rule some contend earnestly, in particular Gulielmus Parisiensis, and some that follow him, saying "it is impossible that an erring or a lying conscience should oblige a man to follow it." The thing hath great influence upon our whole life, and therefore is worth a strict survey.

Quest. Whether a false and an abused conscience can oblige us to pursue the error?

That it cannot, these reasons are or may be pretended.

(1.) Because it seems to be absurd to say, that when the error itself is not a sin at all, or but a little one, that it can be a great sin to follow a man's own humour against that error; if a man should do according to his error, it could at most be but a small sin, and therefore, to go against it cannot be greater. For the error can oblige no higher than its own nature, as rivers cannot rise above their fountains.

4. (2.) But it is a more material consideration; if an erring conscience obliges us to follow it, then some men are bound to persecute the church, and the high priests sinned not in crucifying Christ; and the zealots of the Jews did well in afflicting the apostles and disciples of Jesus, because they did it ignorantly, and by the dictate of an erring conscience; and St. Paul says of himself before his conversion, "I myself thought I ought to do many things against the name of the Lord Jesus;" and yet he sinned in following his erring conscience; and, therefore, certainly could not be bound to it. In pursuance of which,

5. (3.) St. Bernard^c argues thus; to follow truth is always good; but if by the conscience we can be bound to follow error, and that in that case it is not good to follow truth; that is, if a good may become evil by the sentence of an erring conscience, and so great an evil as it supposes it to be,—then by the same reason that which is evil, may by the like sentence, become good, and so great a good as it is supposed; and then may a man be chaste for committing adultery, and charitable for committing murder, and religious for worshipping idols, and pious to his parents in denying to relieve them for the "Corban;" all which consequents being intolerable, the antecedent which infers them must needs be false.

6. (4.) It is true indeed, the conscience is our guide and our lawgiver, our judge and our rule; but it is not our Lord, nor in the present case is it an authentic record, but a ψευδεπίγραφον, a heap of lies and errors; and therefore cannot be a true guide, and we are not tied to follow any leader to hell. Better it is in this case to follow the conscience of a wiser and a better man than myself, it being more reasonable that we be tied to follow his right, than our own wrong conscience.

7. (5.) For if still we were bound to follow our abused conscience, then we were bound to impossibilities: for then either we were not at all bound to follow God, or if we were, and yet bound to follow our conscience against God, we were bound at the same time to do, and not to do the same thing; "to serve two masters;" which, our blessed Saviour said, "No man can do."

8. (6.) But, therefore, in this case God must be obeyed and not man; it being impious to say that the law of our conscience should derogate from, or wholly evacuate, the law of God, by which alone we ought to be governed. For if this law of conscience takes away the obligation of the Divine law, or if the Divine law takes away the obligation of conscience when it errs, then they must cease respectively; and the event will be this, that as long as God's law binds us, (which is for ever,) the law of an erring conscience cannot bind us.

9. (7.) And there are in this great proportions of reason. For if the will be bound to lay down all its rods and axes, all the ensigns of empire at the foot of the throne of God, doing or refusing by the command of God against its own inclination, it will not be imagined that the conscience, that is, the practical understanding, hath any such privilege indulged to it, that it can be exempt from the jurisdiction of God, or that it can oblige in defiance of his laws.

^c Li. de præcept. et dispens.

10. (8.) For it is certain, conscience is God's creature, bound to its Lord and Maker by all the rights of duty and perfect subordination, and therefore cannot prejudice the right and power of its Lord; and no wise man obeys the orders of a magistrate against the express law of his king; or the orders of a captain against the command of his general; and therefore, neither of conscience which is God's messenger, against the purpose of the message with which God intrusted it. However, it is better to obey God than man; to follow the law of God than to go against it; to do that which we should, rather than that which we should not.

11. (9.) And there can be no more necessity upon us to follow our conscience teaching us, than our conscience binding us; and yet if a contract that is vicious be made, or an oath that is unlawful be uttered, the obligations of conscience cease, because they are against the law of God; and how then can conscience against this law of God in any sense pass an obligation? But this rather, that as we are bound not to commit a crime, so not to follow an error and a lie.

12. (10.) For it is impossible that our opinion, or falsely persuaded conscience, should make any alteration in the thing; if it was evil in itself, it is so still; and my thinking that mercury is not poison, nor hellebore purgative, cannot make an antidote and delectary against them, if I have upon that confidence taken them into my stomach; and the sun is bigger than the earth, though I foolishly think it no wider than a bushel. And, therefore, in such cases the conscience can have no power, and can bind us to nothing but to lay our error down. Because as to him that is in error, it were madness to bid him err more; so to him that hath an erring conscience, it were equally evil to bid him pursue, and actuate and consummate his error; which yet he were bound to do, if an erring conscience could bind him.

13. (11.) Lastly, if an erring conscience binds us to obedience, it either binds us by its own independent, ingenite power, or by a power derived from God. If by a power derived from God, then God commands us to believe a lie, to commit a sin, to run after false fires and illusions,—which to affirm, seems to be blasphemy; but if it binds us by its own power, then our conscience can make God's law to become unlawful to us, and we shall be stronger than God, and a man's self becomes his own rule; and he that is deceived by a false opinion, is a lawgiver to himself, and error shall be the measure of good and evil.

14. These are the arguments which are used by several persons respectively in verification of the opinion of Parisiensis, which I have not only heaped here together, but added some and improved the rest, that by the collision of these with their answers, the truth might be made more useful and evident; and divers collateral things incident to the main question might be spoken of; and those arguments remain valid which I brought for the affirmative in the first and second paragraphs of this rule. To the first therefore I answer:

15. (1.) That it is not the error that binds us to follow it, but the conscience in error; and therefore, although the error can have no force greater than its own nature and proper energy, yet our conscience can bind beyond the force of error. As if a general commands a soldier to turn to the right hand under pain of death; if he mistaking turn to the left, the event is greater than can be effected by the intentional relations of right or left hand, but depends upon the reason, and the command, the power, and empire of the general.

16. (2.) To the second, I answer, that it follows not, because the erring conscience binds, therefore the obedience is not a sin. For such is or may be the infelicity of an abused conscience, that if it goes forward, it enters into folly; if it resists, it enters into madness; if it flies, it dashes its head against a wall, or falls from a rock; if it flies not, it is torn in pieces by a bear; and the very instances make it clear; the rulers of the Jews and St. Paul were both called to repent of that, which they did in obedience to their erring conscience,—which cannot legitimate impiety, but only make the one or the other instance to be unavoidable.

17. (3.) To that which St. Bernard objects, the answer is easy upon another account; for conscience may make a good thing evil to it; because, besides the goodness of the object to make an action lawful, there is required the faith and persuasion of the agent; and if this be wanting, as it is in an erring conscience that believes not the goodness of it, the action is evil, by reason of the destitution of an integral part. For, "Bonum ex integrâ causâ, malum ex qualibet particulari;" and by the same reason, conscience cannot make an evil thing good, because, besides the persuasion of conscience, there is required the goodness of the object, which if it be wanting, one ingredient cannot make it good: all must enter into the constitution of good, though the want of one is enough to spoil it.

18. (4.) To the fourth I answer, that because the conscience is in error, and the principle within it is a ψευδεπίγραφον, "a false record," therefore it is true, that we are not absolutely tied to follow its conduct, but we are tied to lay the error aside, that we may follow it in straight ways; but in the present constitution of affairs it is miserable, and because we must follow our leader, that is, all that can go before us; we do go to hell, or to mischief, not that we are by God bound to do this, but only to do that; and it is by our own fault that we are bound to fall into an evil portion. God binds us to follow our conscience; we spoil it by some folly or other, and then we follow it: the evil appendage is our own, the law by which God bound us was holy. Nature requires of us to drink at our meals: but if we have corrupted all our beverage, we must drink unwholesome draughts, but yet nature did not bind us to this misfortune.

19. (5.) And therefore, the answer to the next objection provides us of a remedy against the former. We are bound absolutely to follow the law of God; but we are bound to follow the contrary law of conscience erring, conditionally and by accident, that is, because we have made our rule crooked, which God had made straight. For to be absolutely and irrepectively bound to follow God, and yet respectively and by accident to be bound to follow the contrary conscience, are not impossibilities, or the parts of a contradiction, because they are not "ad idem," not "in the same regards." But then, since it is impossible that both these should be actually followed, therefore God does not command us to follow our conscience and not to follow it at the same time, but to follow our conscience, and to lay aside the error, and then both parts are reconciled; for God and the conscience are but accidentally opposed; and God commanding us to follow our conscience, took care that at the same time we should follow God too; and therefore God taught our conscience, but when we get other teachers, we make it impossible to obey God. Let us submit our conscience to God, that is, lay aside our error, and then God and conscience are not two masters, but one, that is, God; and conscience is his deputy and subordinate. And in order to this, it is not ill advised in the fourth objection, to follow the right conscience of a wiser man; to do so, is a good expedient for the laying down our error; but it is not directly obligatory, so long as the error is confident; for I must not follow a wiser man in his right, if I believe him to be in the wrong; and if I believe him to be in the right, and he really be so, then I have laid aside my error, and indeed to do this is our duty; but this cannot be done till the error be discovered: till then I must follow my own conscience, not the conscience of another man.

20. (6.) To the sixth, I answer, that the law of conscience cannot derogate from the law of God, when they are placed in the eye of reason over against each other; that is, when the conscience sees the law of God, no law, no persuasion, no humour, no opinion, can derogate from it. But an erring confident conscience believes that it follows God when it does not, so that the law of God hath here a double effect. The law of God, apprehended by the conscience, binds him to action; but the law of God, real and proper, binds the man to lay aside his error. For he that goes against the matter and the instance of the law of God, does yet at the same time obey the sanction and authority, because he proceeds to action in obedience to, and in reverence of, the law of God. The wife of Amphitryon was kind to her lord, when she entertained Jupiter in his semblance; and, for Sosia's sake, Mercury was made much of: and because the error is dressed like truth, for truth's sake we hug and entertain the error. So here. The law of God is not despised, much less evacuated, by following the dictate of conscience, because it is for the sake of God's law that this conscience is followed; and therefore, since by accident they are made opposite, the event of it cannot be that one must cease,—for both may and must stand, but nothing must cease but the error.

21. (7.) And therefore, although the will must cease from its own pleasure, when God's will is known to be clear against it, yet the understanding must not cease from that which it supposes to be the will of God till the error be discovered; but when it is, then it must as much cease from its own ways as the will must; for every understanding, as well as every proud will, must be submitted to the obedience of Jesus.

22. (8.) For conscience being God's creature, and his subordinate, cannot possibly prejudice the rights of God; for as soon as God's right appears, and his laws are read, conscience doth and must obey; but this hinders not but that conscience must be heard when she pretends the law of God for her warrant, so long as it is not known but that she says true.

23. (9.) For it is in this as it is in contracts and oaths.—so long as they seem lawful they must be observed, and must not be rescinded until it be discovered that they are against the law of God; and so it is with the dictates of an erring conscience.

24. (10.) And the reason is plain, because conscience does not make a real change in extreme objects (as I have formerly discoursed);^d the things are good or bad by their proportions to God's law, and remain so, whatever the conscience thinks: but yet they put on vizors and shapes, and introduce accidental obligations by error. Indeed, the error brings in no direct obligation but that it be discovered and laid down: but so neither can it hinder but that conscience shall still retain the power that God hath given it, directly and principally; that is, that it be the man's rule and guide; for the fallacy that runs through all the objections, is this,—that the erring conscience is in its obligation considered as erring. Now it does not bind, as erring, but as conscience; that is, not by its error, but by its nature, and the power of God, as being the reporter and record of his commands. Against which, he that bids our conscience to proceed, indeed gives ill counsel. He that counsels a man to follow his erring conscience, invites him to folly; he tells him he is in error, and bids him not lay it down. But he that advises him to follow his conscience, though it happens in the truth of things that his conscience be in error, meddles not at all in the countenancing the error, but in the power of conscience.

25. (11.) For all the obligation which our conscience passes on us, is derivative from God, and God commands us to follow our conscience, but yet he commands us not to sin; because his commanding us to follow our conscience supposes our conscience instructed by the Word of God and right reason, and God had appointed sufficient means it should be: but that conscience offers a sin to the obedience, is wholly the man's fault, and besides the intention of God. God hath not made us to sin, but hath committed us to the conduct of conscience, which, by prevaricating its instructions, hath betrayed us.

26. By this it appears what manner of obligation is passed upon us by an erring conscience; the conscience always hath the same commission as being the same faculty, the same guide: but because itself is bound to the laws of God and right reason, so far as it follows them, so far it binds. But because when it is in error, it also pretends them, by them it still binds, till the illusion be discovered. Durandus expressed this by a distinction of words, in which himself only made the difference. "Ligat,

sed non obligat:" so he. That is, it hath not the same power that is in a right conscience. But it binds us so, that we cannot proceed to good. A right conscience directly and finally binds us to the action itself: an erring conscience cannot do that, because the action it offers is criminal, but it makes us take that instead of what it ought to bind us to; that is, it hath the same authority, but an evil exercise of it; the formal obligation is the same, but when it comes to be instanced, it binds us to that in which it hath no power. For though it hath power over us, yet it hath no direct power in that particular matter.

27. Cordubensis and Vasquez contradict this expression of Durandus, affirming that an erring conscience does "ligare et obligare;" I cannot well translate the words into a distinction, but their meaning is this, that "we are not bound positively to follow the error, but yet so that we must not do the contrary." Which, indeed, is the same thing; and they going to reprove Durandus's distinction, that hath no difference, they do it by a contradiction that hath in it no opposition. For to say that an erring conscience does so bind us that we must not contradict it, is to say that it positively binds us to follow it. For if it commands us to follow it, and we must not go against that command, is it not notorious and evident that we must positively follow it? But for the establishing the measures of obedience in the present case, these following rules are the best proportions.

The Measures of Obedience due to an erring Conscience.

28. (1.) If an erring conscience commands a thing that is of itself indifferent, we are bound to follow it, and we may do it without sin. Because, if it be indifferent, it is therefore lawful, and it cannot cease in itself to be lawful, by being supposed to be necessary. Indeed, if a governor commands us to do a thing indifferent, and says it is necessary, we may not do it under that compliance; that is, we may not betray our christian liberty, and accept that as simply necessary which Christ hath left under liberty. We must do the thing, but not own the necessity. But if an erring conscience bid us do an indifferent, and represent it as a necessary action, though it may be a sin to believe it necessary, yet it is no sin to do the action; for nothing that supervenes can alter the nature of the thing, and a new personal necessity introduced by an erring conscience, by making it seem necessary to him, changes it not from being lawful in itself. But then it infers this also, that as it may be done without sin, so without a sin it cannot be left undone: because the error hath made it personally necessary, and the truth of God hath made it lawful really.

29. (2.) If an erring conscience dictate a thing to be good which is not good,—not to follow that dictate, and not to do that thing, is no sin; because every good is not necessary, and it may be good, or seem so; and yet to omit it in certain circumstances, may be equally good or better.

30. (3.) If an erring conscience affirm that which is good, or which is indifferent, to be evil and vicious; as if it says, it is a sin to spit upon the pavement of a church, or that it is superstition to serve the poor in an hospital, it is no sin to omit that indifferent or that commendable action; because here is no command of God to countermand the resolution of conscience, and therefore the error may become a snare and a hinderance, but no direct cause of sin; because such actions in themselves not being necessary, it cannot be criminal upon a less reason to omit them. But upon the same account it is a sin to do them, because they are not of faith, and the conscience being persuaded against them, they are sins. For any deficiency of a necessary ingredient makes a sin.

31. (4.) If an erring conscience say that "such an action is lawful only, when of itself it is good and laudable," we sin not if we do it, or if we do it not. For in this case, neither is there any direct obligation from God, nor any indirect obligation from conscience, and therefore the man is wholly permitted to his liberty: although it may be a pious action to pray kneeling on the ground with bare knees, or prostrate on our faces, yet if conscience says it is in no sense laudable, but that it is lawful only, we may safely do it; but then there is no other effect of such an action, than there is of scratching a man's head with one finger: and it cannot be commendable in him to do an action, in which he believes there is no worthiness.

32. (5.) If an erring conscience commands what is simply evil, or forbids to do that which is absolutely commanded, the man sins, whether he obeys or obeys not. In one case he sins against his rule, and in the other against his guide, and any one miscarriage is enough to introduce a sin. But this will be the matter of the next rule. The use of these rules is not at all effective upon erring consciences, while the error remains: for the advices supposing the error are not applicable to them, who will not suppose themselves in error. But they are applicable to consciences recovered from their error, and are useful in the conduct of their repentance, because they describe the respective measure of sin and innocence, and what obligations of sorrow and amends are left behind when the error is gone.

To these may be added those rules which I have already given,^c concerning the changes which can be made in moral actions, by the persuasion and force of conscience.

RULE III.

A Conscience erring vincibly or culpably is an unavoidable Cause of Sin, whether it be resisted or complied with.

1. WHEN the error proceeds of malice or negligence, the man is guilty according to the venom of the ingredient: there is a sin in the principle, and this leads to an action materially evil. He that makes assemblies against his prelate, and thinks he may lawfully do it, does an action for which, by the laws, he is punishable; but to God he is to answer besides the action, for the sin that led him to that error.

2. Quest. But if it be inquired, whether that also be a sin which is an obedience to his conscience, that is, whether the instance of the action be a sin, beside the malice of the principle, and so every such action become a double sin,—I answer, that it is according as the instance is.

3. (1.) If it be against a prime principle, in which we are naturally, or any way greatly instructed, then the error is culpable in that manner that it remains voluntary all the way; and then not only the introduction or first principle, but the effect also is a sin. The man hath only put a blind before his eyes, and in every reflex action it is discovered, and he knows it habitually all the way. And therefore, in this case, the conscience ought not to be obeyed.^f For the conscience is but imperfect and equivocal, violent and artificial. It is persuaded in the act, and convinced of the evil in the habit or reflex act, and is no otherwise deceived than a man is blind that wears a hood upon his eye.

4. (2.) If the conscience be possessed with a damnable error, and in a great matter, and this possession is a dereliction and a punishment from God for other crimes,—it is no matter whether we call the consequent action a sin or no; for the man is in a state of reprobation, and the whole order of things and actions in that state are criminal, formally or equivalently. His prayers are abomination; and if so, then the actions that are materially evil, are much worse, and in estimation are prosecutions of the state of sin. Of this sort are they that are given over to believe a lie; all the consequent actions are sins, just as the envies and blasphemies of damned people are sins, or as the acts of devils are imputed: they are consigned to death, and all the consequent actions are symbolical; and it will be always so, unless they can return to a state of repentance.

5. (3.) If the conscience be abused in a deduction, consequence, or less certain proposition, by evil arts and prejudice, by interest and partiality, there is so much evil in the whole determination, as there was in the introducing cause of the error, and no more. For if the action consequent to the persuasion were also a sin, then it ought not to be done; but because in this case the conscience ought to be obeyed, though in the whole affair there is a sin, and it is unavoidable,—yet the sin is antecedent to the action and determination, but no proper appendage or qualification of it. And since the object in the present case transmits honesty and equity into the action, not according to what it is in the thing, but according to what it is in reason, it must needs be that we are obliged according to what we find it to be in conscience. For in this case we know not what it is in itself, and therefore by it we cannot be guided to choose or to refuse; but because we must be guided by something, it must be wholly by opinion and conscience.

6. (4.) If the conscience be weakly and innocently misguided, there is no sin either in the error, or in the consequent action. Because no man is bound to do better than his best; and if he hath no sin in the principle of his error, it is certain he did his best, that is, he did all his duty; and then to proceed by the best light he hath, is agreeable to right reason and to religion.

^c Ch. 2. Rule 9.

^f Castropal. tom. 1. dis. 1. punct. 6. n. 3.

7. Upon the ground of these conclusions we may easily infer, that though an erring conscience is to be followed, (as it is above explained,) and yet that God also is entirely to be followed, and that therefore a man, by accident and by his own fault, may be entangled "in nervis testiculorum leviathan," (as St. Gregory's expression is, out of Job,) in the infoldings of sin and Satan, and cannot escape innocently so long as he remains in that condition; yet, because he need not remain in that condition, but either by suspecting himself, or being admonished by another, by inquiry and by prayer he may lay his error down,—it follows, that to obey God never hath an unavoidable dilemma, and never is impossible, so long as the man is in a state and possibility of repentance. Because every error that infers an action, that is formally as well as materially sinful, not only ought, but may also be deposed or laid down; because, in such cases, no man is invincibly abused. No man can ever be in that condition, that to love God shall become a sin to him; because no man can really be ignorant, or properly entertain this opinion, that it is a sin to love God; that rebellion is lawful; that adultery is no sin; that it can be lawful to strike a prince for justice, or to break a commandment to preserve the interest of a sect; that a man may rob God in zeal against idolatry and images. These things are so plainly taught, that an error in these cannot choose but be malicious.

8. But when the error is in such cases where either it is invincible and irremediable, or where weakness pleads excuse, the action is in that degree innocent in which the error is unavoidable; and if it could be otherwise, then a case might happen, in which, by the laws of God, a man could be bound to that which is intrinsically evil,—and then God, and not man, were the author of the sin.

9. The sum is this. God is supreme, and conscience is his vicegerent and subordinate. Now it is certain, that the law of an inferior cannot bind against the command of a superior when it is known. But when the superior communicates the notices of his will by that inferior, and no otherwise, the subject is to obey that inferior, and in so doing he obeys both. But the vicegerent is to answer for the misinformation, and the conscience for its error, according to the degree of its being culpable.

RULE IV.

It is a greater Sin to do a good Action against our Conscience, than to do an evil Action in obedience to it.

1. This rule concerns degrees only, but is useful in the conducting some actions of repentance; and it is to be understood to be true only in equal cases, and when there is no circumstance aggravating one part. Friar Clement, the Jacobin, thinks erroneously, that it is lawful to kill his king; the poor demoiselle Faucette thinks it unlawful to spit in the church: but it happened that, one day, she did it against her conscience; and the friar, with his conscience and a long knife, killed the king. If the question be here, who sinned most? the disparity is next to infinite; and the poor woman was to be chidden for doing against her conscience, and the other to be hanged for doing according to his. Because the friar's error could not be invincible and inculpable, her's might; and in such questions, the effect of which is of so high concernment, because the errors in them are supreme and dangerous, the inquisition ought to be very great where there can be difficulty, and therefore the negligence is always intolerable, and it is malicious where the discovery is easy, as it is in these cases. And therefore, in so different materials, the case can no way be equal; because in one there is a greater light, a more ready grace, a perfect instruction, an evident provision, an open restraint, and a ready commandment.

2. But when the effect of the questions is equal, and not differenced by accidents, the rule is certain upon this reason; because a sin done against knowledge is greater than a sin done ignorantly. He that sins against his conscience, sins against all his knowledge in that particular: but if he sins against a commandment which he knows not to be such, he sins ignorantly, and therefore the more excusably. "But I found mercy," saith St. Paul, "for I did it ignorantly, in unbelief."

3. Upon this account, it comes to be the same kind, and the same degree of crime, to sin against an erring, and to sin against a right conscience in the same instances. He that omits to hear Divine service on a festival, when he hath no reasonable impediment, and he who omits it upon a common day, which he erroneously supposes to be a festival, hath equally prevaricated the law of the church, and the analogy of the commandment of God on which this of the church is founded, they being equally against his rule by which he is to walk: and this error hath no influence upon the will or choice, but is wholly extrinsic to it. But this is to be understood in errors of fact, and such as are inculpable, and have no effect, and make no change in the will.

4. And, therefore, in our penitential sorrows and expiations, we need not be curious to make a difference of them which have the same formal malice; and if we be taught to make any, it may have this evil consequence in it, that we may love our ignorance, and flatter ourselves in our irregularities, which we think will not be so severely imputed, by reason of the error. If this be a great crime to disobey our conscience, teaching us righteous and true propositions, it is on the other side also very great to suffer our conscience to be so misled, that a good action shall become criminal by such mistaking; so that, besides the departing from our rule, which is equal in both, they have their own superadded evil to weigh against each other.

RULE V.

It is not lawful to delight in an evil Action, (after the Discovery of our Error,) which we did innocently in an erroneous Conscience.

1. THE case is this:—Quintus Hortensius^g received a forged will of Minucius from some hæredipetæ or testamentary cheaters; and because they offered to verify it, and to give him a share, he defended the forgery and possessed his part; but when he afterwards perceived the cheat, and yet detained the purchase, he grew infamous: it was innocent till he knew it, but then it was criminal. He should not have pleased himself in it, because he should have restored it. But in this there is no question.

2. But when the possession or purchase may lawfully remain, there is some difference in the decision of the question. Spurinna, striking a stag, involuntarily and unwittingly kills his brother, and becomes rich by the inheritance. Here the man must separate the effect from its relation, and so proceed: the inheritance was a blessing, the accident was a misfortune; and if he may not rejoice in that, he may not give thanks for it, but as for a cross. But if he pleases himself in the way of his entrance to it, he had a mind ready to have killed his brother if he durst, or at least did secretly wish him dead, that he might openly have his living. In this there is no great difficulty to make the separation. God strikes a man with blindness, and gives him a good memory; he sighs for that, and rejoices for this. A little metaphysics makes this abstraction.

3. (2.) But concerning the act, when it is discovered to have been evil, he is to have no other complacency, but because he did it ignorantly. He that suffers nocturnal pollution, if he finds a remedy by it, is to rejoice that himself suffered it involuntarily, that is, he may rejoice that he did not sin; and of the innocence of the joy he can have no other testimony but by his hating the act in all cases in which it is a sin, and refusing to do it. But the French woman, whom my Lord Montaigne speaks of, who having suffered a rape by divers soldiers, gave God thanks, that, without sin, she had enjoyed pleasure, had a criminal joy, and delighted in the action, for the voluntary entertainment of which she only wanted an excuse.

4. (3.) If we consider the whole conjunction of things together, the evil act with the advantageous effect, we are to be indifferent to joy and sorrow, that is, to do neither directly, but to look on it as an effect of the Divine providence bringing good out of evil, and to fear lest a joy in the whole should entitle us too nearly to the sin by the relation of an after-act and approbation; or lest we be so greedy of the effect, that we be too ready to entertain the like upon terms equally evil, but less fortunate.

5. (4.) This is also to be understood only in such cases in which we are not obliged to restitution; for if we rejoice in that effect which we ought to destroy, we recall the sin from the transient action, and make it dwell with the possession, and then the first involuntary error becomes a chosen rapine.

6. (5.) If the action was only materially, and therefore innocently, an error against a human law, and turns to our secular advantage, we are more at liberty to rejoice and please ourselves in the advantage; because human laws make no action intrinsically and essentially evil, but only relatively and extrinsically. And therefore the danger is not so great of polluting the conscience by the contract and mingling of the affections with the forbidden action. He that eats flesh in Lent in those places and circumstances where it is forbidden, and did not remember it was Lent, or did not know it, and by so doing refreshes himself well, and does advantage to his health—may not be accused easily, if he delights in the whole action, as it joins the error and the advantage. For, besides the former reason, this also is considerable; that human laws, not being so wise and excellent as Divine laws, do bend more easily and readily, that they may comply with the ends of charity and gentleness, and have in them a more apt dispensation, and almost offer themselves to go away, when a greater good comes in their room. But of this in its due place.

7. (6.) In actions materially evil against the Divine laws, if the event cannot be clearly separated from the irregularity, the first innocent error is, by the after-pleasure, turned into a direct sin. Cneius Carbo lay with Lælia unwittingly, supposing her to be his wife Posthumia; but afterwards, having discovered the error, was pleased in the mistake, because he, by the arts of fancy, did by an after-thought represent to himself the change and the variety, and then he was adulterous. For to be pleased in the mistake which brings no advantage separable from the sin, is directly to choose the sin for the advantage' sake; and this was Carbo's case.

RULE VI.

An innocent, or invincibly erring Conscience, is to be obeyed even against the known Commandment of our Superiors.

1. AGAINST this St. Bernard^b seems to argue earnestly: “Si tantopere vitanda sunt scandala parvulorum, quanto amplius prælatorum, quos sibi Deus cœquare quodammodo in utroque dignatur, dum sibimet imputat et illorum reverentiam et contemptum?” &c. “If with so great caution we must be careful, that we do not offend any of God's little ones, how much more must we be curious to avoid giving offence to great ones, to our superiors, whom God seems, in some manner, to make equal to himself, while the reverence or the contempt that is done to them, he takes unto himself; saying, ‘He that heareth you, heareth me, and he that despiseth you, despiseth me.’ But if you say, that men may be deceived in their inquest after the will of God, and may deceive others in reporting it; what is that to thee, who knowest not that they are deceived?”

especially since from Scriptures thou art taught, 'That the lips of the priest shall preserve knowledge, and they shall require the law at his mouth, because he is the angel of the Lord of hosts.' To which discourse of St. Bernard, the following considerations may add some moment; and the discussing them may give light to the inquiry.

2. For in things indifferent the command of the superior must needs be accounted the will of God; for although our superiors are executioners of the Divine laws, yet because they have also a legislative power, they who can alter nothing in things commanded or forbidden by God, must have a power to command or to forbid respectively in things indifferent, or not at all: and therefore, in such things our conscience is bound to obey.

3. And if conscience be pretended against it, it is an error, and ought to be laid down; for to follow this erring conscience, engages us in sin all the way.

4. But as he that submits his understanding to the obedience of Jesus, pleases God most, even when he does it in defiance of all arguments and temptations to the contrary, which though he cannot answer, yet he resolves to follow Christ; so he does best, who, though his conscience pretend reasons against it, will yet lay aside those reasons, that he may submit to his superiors.

5. For it is a great crime by rebelling against, or slighting, the command of our rulers, to give offence to whole societies of men; and there can be no greater contempt done to them, than by undervaluing their judgment to prefer our own; and therefore the prophet pronounces woe to them, who "are wise in their own eyes."

6. But let a subject be ever so wise, he ought not to judge his superior, or to condemn his sentence; and therefore he must be judged by it, and not by his own erring conscience.

7. For as he, who hath made a vow of obedience, hath divested himself of all pretences of contradicting what shall be imposed; and if his conscience shall check him in the instance, he ought to look upon it as a temptation, and use it accordingly: so must it be also in every subject, who by the laws of God is as much tied to obey his superior, as he can be by any law which he puts upon himself. The effect of these suggestions is this, that in things where the law of God hath not declared positively, an erring conscience is not to be attended to; but the law of the superior, and his sentence, must be the guide of his conscience.

2. To this discourse I answer in short, that it is all very true; that the lawful superiors are God's vicegerents, appointed over us in things pertaining to God, so as to be executioners of the Divine laws; and besides this, to make laws in things indifferent and pertaining to men; that all contempt done to them is done to God; that it is scandalous to refuse obedience to them; that he is a proud man who says he is wiser than his superiors; and he is intolerable that prefers his private folly before the public wisdom; and therefore it is well inferred, that the error of an abused conscience ought to be laid down; and though he cannot in particular answer the arguments which trouble him, yet, if he have reason to believe that though the arguments be too hard for him, yet that the superior's command is innocent; it were well if he would lay aside those arguments and adhere to authority. Yet all this touches not the secret of the question; for,

3. He that compares the law of conscience with the law of the superior, compares the law of God and the law of man; and the question is not, whether a man should follow his superior or follow himself? but, whether God or man be to be obeyed, whether the superior or the supreme be to be attended to? The reason of this is, because the conscience stands bound by the supposed law of God, which being superior to all the law of man, must rather be obeyed; and therefore, although the arguments conclude rightly that an erring conscience, disobeying his superior's lawful command, does sin greatly; yet they cannot conclude, that he avoids sin by obeying against his conscience; for his condition is indeed perplexed, and he can no way avoid sin, but by laying his error aside first, and then obeying. And since he sins, whether he obeys his superior's just command or the unjust command of his conscience, the inquiry is, in this sad conjunction of things, by what hand he must be smitten, on which side he must fall, that he may fall the easier? To this the rule answers, that his erring conscience must be obeyed rather, because he is persuaded that God speaks there, and is not persuaded that God speaks by his superior. Now, though in this he be deceived, yet he, that will not go there where he thinks God is, and leave that where he thinks God is not,—does uncertainly go towards God, but does certainly forsake him, as much as lies in him. For,

4. It is to the conscience all one as if the law of God were really upon it, if it be thought it is. "Idem est esse et apparere" in this case; and therefore the erring conscience is to be attended to, because the will and the affections are for God, though the judgment hath mistaken a glow-worm for the sun. But this is to be understood only when the conscience errs innocently and unavoidably, which it can never do in the precepts of nature, and brightest revelation.

5. But if the conscience does err vincibly, that is, with an actual fault, and an imperfect, artificial resolution, such a one, as a good man will not, and a wise man need not have, this present persuasion excuses him not from a double sin, for breaking a double duty; for he is bound to correct his error, and to perform the precepts of his superior; and if he does not, his sin is more than that which was in the vicious cause of his mispersuasion, as I showed in the explication of the former rules.

6. But according as the ignorance and error approaches towards pity, lessening or excusing, so the sin also declines. He that thinks it is not lawful at all to take up arms at the command of his prince, in an unjust or a dubious cause, sins if he does what he thinks so unlawful, and he commits no sin in disobeying, that only excepted which entered into his mispersuasion, which is greater or less, or next to none at all, according as was the cause of his error, which in the whole constitution of affairs he could not well avoid. But he that is foolishly persuaded that all government is unlawful and antichristian, is bound to lay his error down, and besides the vicious cause of his error, he sins in the evil effect of it, though his imperfect, equivocal conscience calls on him to the contrary; yet he sins if he does not obey, because in such notorious and evident propositions an error is not only malicious in the principle, but voluntary all the way; and therefore may easily, and must certainly, be laid aside in every period of determination.

Whatsoever cases are between these partake of the extremes, according to their proper reason and relation.

RULE VII.

The Error of an abused Conscience ought to be reformed, sometimes by the Command of the Will, but ordinarily by a contrary Reason.

1. (1.) If the error did begin upon a probable reason, it cannot be reformed but by a reason seeming equal to it, because a less reason hath not naturally the same efficacy with a greater; and to assent to a less probability against a greater, is to do against reason, against all that by which this lesser reason is outweighed.ⁱ For in this case the will can have no influence, which, not being a cognoscitive and discoursing faculty, must be determined by its own motives when it is not determined by reason, that is, by the motives of understanding. Now the motives of will, when it is not moved by right reason, are pleasure and profit, ambition and revenge, partiality and pride, chance or humour: and how these principles can disabuse a conscience is very hard to understand, how readily and certainly they do abuse it, is not hard. Whether the stars be even or odd; whether the soul be generated, or created and infused; whether it be lawful to fight or rail against a prince; what hath the will to do with it? If the will meddles, and makes the resolution, it shall be determined, not as it is best, but as it falls out by chance, or by evil, or by vain inducements. For in the will there is no argument good but reason; I mean, both in the matter of nature and of grace; that is, reason changed into a motive, and an instrument of persuasion, from whatsoever inducing principle.

3. (2.) Some have affirmed,^k that the error of a conscience may fairly be deposed upon any probable argument, though of less persuasion; which if it could be admitted, would give leave for a man to choose his side as he pleases; because, in all moral things, as dressed with circumstances, it is very easy to find some degrees of probability, but very difficult to find a case against which nothing can be disputed. And therefore, if it happens that a man be better persuaded of his error than of the contrary truth, that truth cannot be chosen wisely, nor the error honestly deposed, because it is done against the way of a man not absolutely, but comparatively against reason.

3. (3.) If the reason on both sides seems equally probable, the will may determine by any of its proper motives that are honest; any prudent interest, any fair compliance, any custom, in case these happen to be on the right side. When the arguments seem equal, the understanding or conscience cannot determine. It must either be a chance, and a special providence of God, or a particular grace, that casts us on the right side. But whatsoever it be that then determines us to the right, if of itself it be innocent, it is in that case an effect of God's grace, and an apt instrument of a right conscience.

4. (4.) When the conscience is erroneous, and the error unreasonable, commenced wholly upon interest, trifling regards, or vicious principles, the error may be deposed honestly, though there be no reason thought of to the contrary, besides the discovery of the first abuse. The will in this case is enough. "Volo servare animam meam," said one; "I will, I am resolved to save my own soul." A man may, and ought to hate the evil principle of his error, and decline it upon the stock of indignation which in this case is a part of repentance. And this insinuates the reason of this discourse. For,

5. Repentance is founded principally in the will; and whatsoever a man is to leave upon the stock of repentance, he may do it wholly upon the stock of his will, informed, or inclined by general propositions, without any cognizance of the particulars of the present question. Eratosthenes coming among the Persian magi, and observing their looser customs of marrying their sisters and their mothers, falls in love with his half-sister Lampra, and marries her. A while after, perceiving that he entered upon this action upon no other account but lust and fancy, and compliance with the impurer magi, he began to hate his act for the evil inducement, and threw away her and his folly together. This he might do without any further reasonings about the indecency of the mixture, by perceiving that a crime or a folly stood at the entrance, and invited him to an evil lodging. He that begins without reason, hath reason enough to leave off; by perceiving he had no reason to begin: and in this case the will is the great agent, which therefore here is no ill principle, because it leaves the error upon the stock of grace and repentance.^l

6. (5.) If the will entertained the error without any reason at all, as oftentimes it does, it knows not why, she may also depose it honestly without any reason relating to the particular, upon this general, that it could not make the action to be conscientious to have it done without any inducement. But then the taking up the contrary truth upon as little reason, is innocent, because it happens to be on the right side; but it is not virtue nor conscience till it be persuaded by something that is a fit inducement either in the general or in the particular.

RULE VIII.

The Error of a Conscience is not always to be opened to the erring Person by the Guides of Souls, or any other charitable Adviser.

1. IF the error began with a sin, and still dwells there upon the same stock, or if it be productive of a sin, it is always to be discovered, though the greatest temporal inconvenience were certainly consequent to the discovery. Because a man must not be suffered to lie in sin, no, not a minute, if he can be recovered or rescued from it; and no temporal advantage or disadvantage can be considerable in this case, which is the case of a soul; an error that is vincible, is all the way criminal, and must not be permitted.

2. (2.) If the error be invincible, and innocent or pitiable in the cause, and yet ends in an intolerable event, and the effect be a crime or a great danger to souls, the error must be discovered by them that can. The Novatians erred in the matter of repentance: the inducing cause of their error was an over-active zeal, and too wary a tenderness in avoiding scandal and judging concerning it. God served the ends of his glory by the occasion of that error, for he uses to bring good out of every evil; and the church, under a better article, grew as wary as the Novatians, as watchful against scandal, as severe against lapsed persons. Now, although in this case the error was from an innocent cause, yet because it landed them upon a course of discipline and persuasion that was not innocent, they were not to be permitted in their error, though the dissolution of the error might or would have occasioned the remission of discipline. For their doctrine of repentance was dishonourable to the mercies of God, an instrument of despair, a rendering the power of the keys and the ministry of the order ecclesiastical in a manner wholly useless, and would, if it were pursued to its just consequents, have hindered repenting sinners to revert to the folds of the church; and therefore, for the accidental good which God brought, or which was likely to have come from that error or the innocence of its principle, it was not to be concealed, but reprov'd and destroyed because it dwelt in sin. He that believes that repentance to be sufficient, which hath in it nothing but sorrow for what is past, and a present purpose without amendment really in the future, upon no pretence is to be complied withal in the palliation of his error, because the consequent of his error is such a danger, or such a state of sin, for which nothing can make amends.

3. (3.) If the error be invincible, and the consequent of the persuasion be consistent with the state of grace, the error must be opened or not opened, according to prudent considerations relating to the person and his state of affairs. So that the error must rather be suffered than a grievous scandal, or an intolerable, or a very great inconvenience. To this purpose Comitulus says, it was determined by a congregation of learned and prudent persons in answer to a strange and a rare case happening in Venice: a gentleman ignorantly did lie with his mother; she knew it, but intended it not, till for her curiosity and in her search whether her son intended it to her maid, she was surprised and gotten with child: she perceiving her shame and sorrow hasten, sent her son to travel for many years; and he returned not till his mother's female birth was grown to be a handsome pretty maiden. At his return he espies a sweet-faced girl in the house, likes her, loves her, and intends to marry her. His mother conjured him by all that was sacred and profane that he should not, saying, "she was a beggar's child, whom for pity's sake she rescued from the streets and beggary, and that he should not, by dishonouring his family, make her to die with sorrow." The gentleman's affections were strong, and not to be mastered, and he married his own sister and his own daughter. But now the bitings of the mother's conscience were intolerable, and to her confessor she discovered the whole business within a year or two after this prodigious marriage, and asked whether she was bound to reveal the case to her son and daughter, who now lived in love and sweetness of society, innocently, though with secret misfortune, which they felt not. It was concluded negatively, she was not to reveal it, lest she bring an intolerable misery in the place of that which to them was no sin; or lest upon notice of the error they might be tempted, by their mutual endearments and their common children, to cohabit in despite of the case, and so change that into a known sin, which before was an unknown calamity; and by this state of the answer, they were permitted to their innocence, and the children to their inheritance, and all under the protection of a harmless, though erring and mistaken conscience.

4. (4.) If it be doubtful whether more good or hurt may be consequent to the discovery, it is better to conceal it. Because it is more tolerable to have a good omitted, than to have an evil done. That may sometimes be lawful, this can never; and a known evil that is not a sin, is rather to be admitted than an unknown, which no man can tell whether it will arrive. But in this, the prudence of a good and a wise man is to be his only guide, and God's glory his only measure and the public good, and the greater concernments of the interested be chiefly regarded.

CHAPTER IV.

OF THE PROBABLE OR THINKING CONSCIENCE.

RULE I.

A probable Conscience is an imperfect Assent to an uncertain Proposition, in which one Part is indeed clearly and fully chosen, but with an explicit or implicit Notice that the contrary is also fairly eligible.

1. A PROBABLE conscience dwells so between the sure and the doubtful that it partakes something of both. For a sure conscience may begin upon a probable inducement, but is made sure either by an assent to the conclusion, stronger than the premises will infer, or by a reflex act, or some other collateral hardness and adventitious confidence, and therefore the probable is distinguished from that by the imperfection of the assent. But because in that respect it approaches to the doubtful, and in that is alike, it is differenced from this by the determination. For a doubtful conscience considers the probabilities on each side, and dares not choose, and cannot. But the probable does choose, though it considers that in the thing itself there can be no certainty. And from them both it is distinguished by the intervening of the will. For in the sure conscience the will works not at all, because it is wholly conducted by the understanding, and its proper motives. In the doubtful the will cannot interpose by reason of fear and an uncertain spirit; but in the probable it can intervene, not directly, but collaterally and indirectly, because the motives of the probable conscience are not always sufficient to make the conclusion without something of the will applied to extrinsical motives, which reflect also upon the understanding; and yet in this conscience there is no fear, and therefore the will can here be obeyed, which in the first needs not, in the last it cannot. For it is remarkable, that a probable conscience, though it be in speculation uncertain, yet it may be practically certain,—that is, he that believes his opinion to be probable, cannot but think that it is possible he may be in an actual error, but yet he may know that it is innocent to do that for which he hath a probable reason; for though in all these cases he may choose that which is the wrong part, yet he proceeds as safely as if he had chosen right: for if it were not safe to do that which is only probable, then nothing could be done till something were demonstrated; and then in moral theology we should often stand still and suspend our act, but seldom do any thing; nay, sometimes we should neither act nor suspend, it being but probable that either is to be chosen. Yea, sometimes it happens what Aristotle said, that “false things are made more probable than true,” as it is to all them who are innocently and invincibly abused; and in this case, if probability were not a sufficient conviction of conscience, such persons could not honestly consent to truth. For even wise men disagree in their sentences of truth and error, and after a great search, scarcely do they discover one single truth unto just measures of confidence; and therefore, no other law could be exacted for human actions, than an opinion honestly entered into, and a probable conscience. And it is remarkable that Cicero saith, that the word “arbitror” is “verbum consideratissimum;” and the old Romans were reserved and cautious in the decrees of judges, and the forms of their oath began with “arbitror,” although they gave testimony of things whereof they were eye-witnesses; and the words which their prætors did use in their sentences, was “fecisse videtur,” or “non videtur.” —“He that observeth the winds, shall not sow; and he that watcheth the clouds, shall never reap;”^a which means, that if we start at every objection, and think nothing safe but what is certain, and nothing certain but what can be demonstrated, that man is over wise and over just, and by his too curious search misses what he inquires for. Λέγοιτο δ’ ἂν ἱκανῶς, εἰ κατὰ τὴν ὑποκειμένην ὕλην διασαφηθεῖη, “That is well enough proved, that is proved according to the subject matter.”—For there is not the same exactness to be looked for in all disciplines, any more than in all manufactures. But in those things which are honest and just, and which concern the public, τοσαύτην ἔχει διαφορὰν καὶ πλάνην, “There is so much dissension and deception,” that things are good or bad not by themselves, but as they are in law; πεπαιδευμένος οὖν ἐστὶ ἐπὶ τοσούτον τ’ ἀκριβὲς ἐπιζητεῖν κατ’ ἕκαστον γένος, ἐφ’ ὅσον ἡ τοῦ πράγματος φύσις ἐπιδέχεται: “He is well instructed who expects that manner of proof for things, which the nature of the things will bear,” said Aristotle.^b And in moral things, it is sufficient that a thing is judged true and certain, though by an uncertain argument; and the opinion may be practically certain, when the knowledge of it is in speculation only probable.

2. It hath two sorts of motives, intrinsical and extrinsical. That is reason, this is authority; and both of them have great considerations in order to practice, of which I am to give account in the following rules.

^a Eccl. xi. 4.^b Ethic. lib. i. c. 1.

RULE II.

A Conscience that is, at first, and in its own Nature, probable, may be made certain by Accumulation of many Probabilities operating the same Persuasion.

1. EVERY probable argument hath in it something of persuasion and proof, and although it cannot produce evidence and entire conviction to a wise and a discerning spirit, yet it can effect all that it ought; and although, if the will list, or if passions rule, the understanding shall be made stubborn against it, and reject it easily; yet if nothing be put in bar against it, it may bring a man to adhere to it beyond the evidence. But in some cases there are a whole army of little people, heaps of probable inducements which the understanding amasses together, and from every side gathers all that can give light and motion to the article in question; it draws auxiliaries from every thing, fights with every weapon, and by all means pursues the victory; it joins line to line, and precept to precept, reason to reason, and reason to authority; the sayings of wise men with the proverbs of the people; consent of talkers and the arguings of disputers; the nature of the thing and the reasonableness of its expectations; the capacities and possibilities of men and of accidents; the purposes and designs, the usefulness and rewards; and by what all agents are and ought to be moved; customs are mingled with laws, and deficiencies with consideration of profit; the understanding considers the present state and heap of circumstances, and by prudence weighs every thing in its own balance; it considers the consequent of the opinion it intends to establish, and well weighs the inconvenience of the contrary. But from the obscurity and insufficiency of these particulars, there cannot come a perfect light; if a little black be mingled with white, the product must have something of every influence that can be communicated from its principle, or material constitution; and ten thousand millions of uncertain cannot make one certain.

2. In this case, the understanding comes not to any certainty by the energy of the motives and direct arguments of probability, or by the first effort and impresses of their strength; but by a particular reflection which it makes upon the heap, and by a secondary discoursing extracted from the whole; as being therefore convinced, because it believes it to be impossible, that so many considerations, that no way conspire either in matter or design, should agree in the production of a lie. It is not likely that so many beams of light should issue from the chambers of heaven for no other reason but to lead us into a precipice. Probable arguments and prudential motives are the great hinges of human actions; for as a pope once said, "It is but a little wit that governs the world;" and the uncertainty of arguments is the great cause of contingency in events; but as uncertain as most counsels are, yet all the great transactions of the affairs of the world are resolved on and acted by them; by suspicions and fears and probable apprehensions infinite evils are prevented; and it is not, therefore, likely to be an error by which so perpetually so many good things are procured and effected. For it were a disparagement to the wise providence of God, and a lessening the rare economy of the Divine government, that he should permit almost all the world, and all reglements, the varieties of event, and all the changes of kingdoms, and all counsels and deliberations, to be conducted by moral demonstrations, and to be under the power of probabilities, and yet, that these should be deceitful and false. Neither is it to be imagined, that God should permit wise men and good,—men that on purpose place their reason in indifference, that abate of their heats, and quench their own extravagant fires,—men that wipe away all clouds and mists from their eyes, that they may see clearly,—men that search as they ought to do, for things that they are bound to find, things that they are commanded to search, and upon which even all their interests depend, and yet, inquiring after the end whither they are directed, and by what means it is to be required, that these men should be inevitably abused by their own reason, by the best reason they have; and that when concerning the thing which cannot be demonstrated by proper and physical arguments, yet we are to enter into a persuasion so great, that for the verification of it men must venture their lives and their souls;—I say, if this kind of proof be not sufficient to effect all this, and sufficiently to assure such men, and competently to affirm and strengthen such resolutions, salvation and damnation must be by chance, or, which is worse, it must be impossible to be well, but when it cannot choose to be otherwise: and this, I say, is not to be imagined that God will or does permit, since all these intercourses so much concern God's glory and our eternal interest. The main events of heaven and hell do, in some regards, depend, as to us, upon our faith, whose objects are represented with such lights from God and right reason, as are sufficient to persuade, not to demonstrate; they are such which leave something to us of choice and love, and every proposition of Scripture, though it be as sure, yet it is not so evident as the principles of geometry; and the Spirit of God effects his purposes with an influence as soft and placid as the warmth of the sun,—while a physical demonstration blows hard and high as the north wind; indeed a man must use rudeness, if he does not quit his garment at so loud a call, but we are more willing to part with it, when the sun gently requires us: so is a moral demonstration, it is so human, so persuasive, so complying with the nature and infirmities of man, with the actions of his life and his manner of operation, that it seems to have been created on purpose for the needs and uses of man in this life, for virtue and for hopes, for faith and for charity, to make us to believe by love, and to love by believing; for in heaven they that see and love, cannot choose but love, and see, and comprehend; for it is a reward, and fills all their faculties, and is not possessed by us, but itself possesses us. In this world where we are to do something ourselves, though all by the grace of God,— that which we do of ourselves is nothing else but to work as we ourselves can,—which indeed happens to be in propositions, as it is in the love of God; this cannot fail us, but we may fail of it: and so are the sentences of religion, infallible in themselves, but we may be deceived, while by a fallible way we proceed to infallible notices, for nothing else could endear our labour and our love, our search and our obedience; and therefore, this must be sufficient and acceptable, if we do what we can: but then this also will secure our confidence: and in the noises of christendom, when disputing fellows say their brother is damned for not believing them, we need not to regard any such noises, if we proceed prudently as we can, and honestly as we ought; probable motives of our understanding are our sufficient conduct, and then we have this warrant: “Brethren, if our hearts condemn us not, then have we peace towards God.”^c And God would never have inspired his church with prudence, or made any such virtue, if the things which were put under the conduct of it, that is, probabilities, were not instrumental to the service of God, and to the verification of all its just and proper productions.

3. Probable arguments are like little stars, every one of which will be useless as to our conduct and enlightening; but when they are tied together by order and vicinity, by the finger of God and the hand of an angel, they make a constellation, and are not only powerful in their influence, but like a bright angel, to guide and to enlighten our way. And although the light is not great as the light of the sun or moon, yet mariners sail by their conduct: and though with trepidation and some danger, yet very regularly they enter into the haven. This heap of probable inducements is not of power as a mathematical and physical demonstration, which is in discourse as the sun is in heaven, but it makes a milky and a white path, visible enough to walk securely.

4. And next to these tapers of effective reason, drawn from the nature and from the events, and the accidents and the expectations and experiences of things, stands the grandeur of a long and united authority; the understanding thus reasoning, That it is not credible that this thing should have escaped the wiser heads of all the great personages in the world, who stood at the chairs of princes, or sat in the ruler’s chair, and should only appear to two or three bold, illiterate, or vicious persons, ruled by lusts, and overruled by evil habits; but in this we have the same security and the same confidence that timorous persons have in the dark; they are pleased, and can see what is and what is not, if there be a candle,—but in the dark they are less fearful, if they be in company.

5. This way of arguing some are pleased to call a moral demonstration: not that it can make a proposition clear and bright, and quit from clouds and obscurity, as a natural demonstration can; for I may in this case use Aristotle’s saying, τοῦτο μὲν ἀληθές, ἀλλ’ οὐ σαφές, “Things of this nature may be very true, but are not very evident;” but it can produce the same effect, that is, it can lead into truth, not with as much brightness, but with as much certainty and infallibility in the event of things. For a man may as prosperously and certainly arrive at his journey’s end, though but conducted by him that went the way but once before him, as if he had a straight path walled in on both sides; so may we find truth as certainly by probabilities, as by demonstrations: we are not so sure that we find it, but it is oftentimes as surely found. And if the heap arrive at that which we call a moral demonstration, it is as certain that no moral demonstration can be opposed against it, as that no natural demonstration can be brought in contradiction to a natural. For the understanding cannot call any thing a moral demonstration, till, by considering the particulars on both sides, the reasonableness of one, and the unreasonableness of the other, with a cold scent, and liberty of spirit, and an unbiassed will, it hath passed the sentence for the truth; and since, in this case, all the opposition is between strength and power on one side, and weakness and pretence on the other, it is impossible that the opposite parts should be demonstrations or seem so to the same man. And this appears by this also, that some propositions which are only proved by a conjugation of probable inducements, have yet obtained as certain and as regular events as a natural demonstration, and are believed equally, constantly, and perpetually by all wise men, and the understanding does regularly receive the same impression, and give the same assent, and for ever draws forth the same conclusions,—when it is not abused with differing prejudices and preoccupations, when its liberty and powers are not enfeebled with customs, example, and contrary breeding, while it is not bribed by interest, or hurried away by passion.

6. Of this I shall choose to give one instance, which as it is of the greatest concernment in the world in itself, so the gay impieties and bold wits of the world, who are witty against none more than God and God’s wisdom, have made it now to be but too seasonable, and that is, that “the religion of Jesus Christ,” or the “christian religion, is from God;” concerning which I will not now pretend to bring in all the particulars whereby each part of it can be verified, but by heaping together such heads of probabilities which are, or may be, the cause of an infinite persuasion; and this I had rather choose to do for these reasons:

7. (1.) Because many men excellently learned have already discoursed largely of the truth of christianity, and approved by a direct and close congression with other religions, by examination of the contrary pretences, refutation of their arguments, answering their objections, and have by direct force so far prevailed, that all the reason of the world appears to stand on the christian side: and for me to do it now, as there is no just occasion ministered by this argument, so neither can it be useful and necessary.

8. (2.) In that way of arguing, every man that is an adversary can answer one argument, and some can reprove many; and none can prevail singly to possess all the understanding, and to fill all the corners of consideration, but in a moral demonstration that can be supplied.

9. (3.) In the other way an adversary supposes himself to prevail, when he can answer the arguments singly: and the discourses in that method are like the servants sent singly to gather fruits of the husbandmen, they killed them as fast as they came, and a man may kill a whole kingdom over, if the opponents come by single persons; but a moral demonstration is like an army which can lose single persons, and yet prevail, but yet cannot be beaten, unless it be beaten all.

10. (4.) The few little things that atheistical persons prate against the holy Jesus and his most excellent religion, are infinitely outweighed by the multitude and variety of things to be said for it; and let the others stand, (as if they meet with persons that cannot answer them,) yet they are sure this greater ought to prevail, because it possesses all the corners of reason, and meets with every instance, and complies with the manner of a man, and is fitted to the nature of things, and complies with the will, and persuades the understanding, and is a guard against the tricks of sophisters, and does not only effect its purpose by direct influence, but is secured by reflection upon itself, and does more by its indirect strength, and by a back blow, than by its first operations: and, therefore,

11. This instance and this way of argument may be of more use to those persons who cannot so dispute, but that they are apt to be abused by little things, by talkings and imperfect arguings; it may be a defensative against trifling objections, and the impious pratings of the "nequam ingeniosi," "the witty fools," while the men are armed by love and prudence, and wise securities, to stand with confidence and piety against talkings and intrigues of danger; for by this way best, "Wisdom is justified of all her children."

An Instance of moral Demonstration, or a Conjugation of Probabilities, proving that the Religion of Jesus Christ is from God.

12. This discourse, of all the disputables in the world, shall require the fewest things to be granted; even nothing but what was evident, even nothing but the very subject of the question, viz. That there was such a man as Jesus Christ, that he pretended such things and taught such doctrines: for he that will prove these things to be from God, must be allowed that they were from something or other. But this postulate I do not ask for need, but for order's sake and art; for what the histories of that age reported as a public affair, as one of the most eminent transactions of the world, that which made so much noise, which caused so many changes, which occasioned so many wars, which divided so many hearts, which altered so many families, which procured so many deaths, which obtained so many laws in favour, and suffered so many rescripts in the disfavour of itself; that which was not done in a corner, but was thirty-three years and more in acting; which caused so many sects, and was opposed by so much art, and so much power, that it might not grow; which filled the world with noise; which effected such great changes in the bodies of men, by curing the diseased, and smiting the contumacious or the hypocrites; which drew so many eyes, and filled so many tongues, and employed so many pens, and was the care and the question of the whole world at that time, and immediately after; that which was designed by public acts and records of courts, which was in the books of friends and enemies; which came accompanied and remarked with eclipses, and stars, and prodigies of heaven and earth, that which the Jews, even in spite, and against their wills, confessed, and which the witty adversaries intending to overthrow, could never so much as challenge of want of truth in the matter of fact and story; that which they who are infinitely concerned that it should not be believed,—or more, that it had never been,—do yet only labour to make to appear not to have been Divine: Certainly, this thing is so certain that it was, that the defenders of it need not account it a kindness to have it presupposed; for never was any story in the world that had so many degrees of credibility, as the story of the person, life, and death of Jesus Christ: and if he had not been a true prophet, yet that he was in the world, and said and did such things, cannot be denied; for, even concerning Mahomet, we make no question but he was in the world, and led a great part of mankind after him, and what was less proved we infinitely believe; and what all men say, and no man denies, and was notorious in itself, of this we may make further inquiries whether it was all that which it pretended: for that it did make pretences, and was in the world, needs no more probation.

13. But now, whether Jesus Christ was sent from God, and delivered the will of God, we are to take accounts from all the things of the world which were on him, or about him, or from him. Consider, first, his person: he was foretold by all the prophets: he, I say, for that appears by the event, and the correspondencies of their sayings to his person: he was described by infallible characterisms which did fit him, and did never fit any but him; for when he was born, then was the fulness of time, and the Messias was expected at the time when Jesus did appear, which gave occasion to many of the godly then to wait for him, and to hope to live till the time of his revelation: and they did so, and with a spirit of prophecy which their own nation did confess and honour, glorified God at the revelation: and the most excellent and devout persons that were conspicuous for their piety, did then rejoice in him, and confess him; and the expectation of him, at that time, was so public and famous, that it gave occasion to divers impostors to abuse the credulity of the people in pretending to be the Messias. But not only the predictions of the time, and the perfect synchronisms, did point him out, but at his birth a strange star appeared, which guided certain Levantine princes and sages to the inquiry after him; a strange star which had an irregular place, and an irregular motion, that came by design, and acted by counsel, the counsel of the Almighty Guide; it moved from place to place, till it stood just over the house where the babe did sleep; a star of which the heathen knew much, who knew nothing of him; a star which Chalcidius affirmed to have signified the descent of God for the salvation of man; a star that guided the wise Chaldees to worship him with gifts, as the same disciple of Plato does affirm, and as the Holy Scriptures deliver. And this star could be no secret: it troubled all the country; it put Herod upon strange arts of security for his kingdom; it effected a sad tragedy accidentally, for it occasioned the death of all the little babes in the city and voisinage of Bethlehem. But the birth of this young child, which was thus glorified by a star, was also signified by an angel, and was effected by the Holy Spirit of God, in a manner which was in itself supernatural; a virgin was his mother, and God was his Father, and his beginning was miraculous; and this matter of his birth of a virgin was proved to an interested and jealous person, even to Joseph, the supposed father of Jesus; it was affirmed publicly by all his family, and by all his disciples, and published in the midst of all his enemies, who by no artifice could reprove it; a matter so famous, that when it was urged as an argument to prove Jesus to be the Messias, by the force of a prophecy in Isaiah,—“A virgin shall conceive a Son,”—they who obstinately refused to admit him, did not deny the matter of fact, but denied that it was so meant by the prophet; which, if it were true, can only prove that Jesus was more excellent than was foretold by the prophets, but that there was nothing less in him than was to be in the Messias. It was a matter so famous, that the Arabian physicians, who can affirm no such things of their Mahomet, and yet not being able to deny it to be true of the holy Jesus, endeavour to alleviate and lessen the thing by saying, “it is not wholly beyond the force of nature that a virgin should conceive:” so that it was on all hands undeniable, that the mother of Jesus was a virgin, a mother without a man. This is that Jesus, at whose presence, before he was born, a babe in his mother’s belly also did leap for joy, who was also a person extraordinary himself, conceived in his mother’s old age, after a long barrenness, signified by an angel in the temple, to his father officiating his priestly office, who was also struck dumb for his not present believing: all the people saw it, and all his kindred were witnesses of his restitution, and he was named by the angel, and his office declared to be the forerunner of the holy Jesus; and this also was foretold by one of the old prophets; for the whole story of this Divine person is a chain of providence and wonder, every link of which is a verification of a prophecy, and all of it is that thing which, from Adam to the birth of Jesus, was pointed at and hinted by all the prophets, whose words in him passed perfectly into the event. This is that Jesus, who, as he was born without a father, so he was learned without a master, he was a man without age, a doctor in a child’s garment, disputing in the sanctuary at twelve years old. He was a sojourner in Egypt, because the poor babe, born of an indigent mother, was a formidable rival to a potent king; and this fear could not come from the design of the infant, but must needs arise from the illustriousness of the birth, and the prophecies of the child, and the sayings of the learned, and the journey of the wise men, and the decrees of God: this journey, and the return, were both managed by the conduct of an angel and a divine dream,—for to the Son of God all the angels did rejoice to minister. This blessed Person,—made thus excellent by his Father, and glorious by miraculous con-signations, and illustrious by the ministry of heavenly spirits, and proclaimed to Mary and to Joseph by two angels, to the shepherds by a multitude of the heavenly host, to the wise men by a prophecy and by a star, to the Jews by the shepherds, to the gentiles by the three wise men, to Herod by the doctors of the law, and to himself perfectly known by the incasing his human nature in the bosom and heart of God, and by the fulness of the Spirit of God,—was yet pleased, for thirty years together, to live an humble, a laborious, a chaste and a devout, a regular and an even, a wise and an exemplary, a pious and an obscure life, without complaint, without sin, without design of fame or grandeur of spirit, till the time came that the clefts of the rock were to open, and the diamond give its lustre, and be worn in the diadems of kings, and then this Person was wholly admirable; for he was ushered into the world by the voice of a loud crier in the wilderness,—a person austere and wise, of a strange life, full of holiness and full of hardness, and a great preacher of righteousness,—a man believed by all the people that he came from God,—one who in his own nation gathered disciples publicly, and (which amongst them was a great matter) he was the doctor of a new institution, and baptized all the country. Yet this man, so great, so revered, so followed, so listened to by king and people, by doctors and by idiots, by Pharisees and Sadducees, this man preached Jesus to the people, pointed out the Lamb of God, told that he must increase, and himself from all that fame must retire to give him place; he received him to baptism after having with duty and modesty declared his own unworthiness to give, but rather a worthiness to receive baptism from the holy hands of Jesus; but at the solemnity God sent down the Holy Spirit upon his holy Son, and by a voice from heaven, a voice of thunder, (and God was in that voice,) declared that “this was his Son, and that he was delighted in him.” This voice from heaven was such, so evident, so certain a conviction of what it did intend to prove, so known and accepted as the way of Divine revelation under the second temple, that at that time every man that desired a sign honestly, would have been satisfied with such a voice; it being the testimony by which God made all extraordinaries to be credible to his people, from the days of Ezra to the death of the nation; and that there was such a voice, not only then, but divers times after, was as certain, and made as evident as things of that nature can ordinarily be made. For it being a matter of fact, cannot be supposed infinite, but limited to time and place, heard by a certain number of persons, and was as a clap of thunder upon ordinary accounts, which could be heard but by those who were within the sphere of its own activity; and reported by those to others, who are to give testimony as testimonies are required, which are credible under the test of two or three disinterested, honest, and true men; and though this was done in the presence of more, and oftener than once, yet it was a Divine testimony but at first, but is to be conveyed by the means of men: and as God thundered from heaven at the giving of the law,—though that he did so, we have notice only from the books of Moses received from the Jewish nation,—so he did in the days of the Baptist, and so he did to Peter, James, and John, and so he did in the presence of the Pharisees and many of the common people: and as it is not to be supposed that all these would join their divided interests, for and against themselves, for the verification of a lie, so if they would have done it, they could not have done it without reproof of their own parties, who would have been glad by the discovery only to disgrace the whole story; but if the report of honest and just men so reputed, may be questioned for matter of fact, or may not be accounted sufficient to make faith when there is no pretence of men to the contrary,—besides that we can have no story transmitted to us, nor records kept, no acts of courts, no narratives of the days of old, no traditions of our fathers; so there could not be left in nature any usual instrument whereby God could, after the manner of men, declare his own will to us, but either we should never know the will of heaven upon earth, or it must be that God must not only tell it once but always, and not only always to some men, but always to all men; and then, as there would be no use of history, or the honesty of men, and their faithfulness in telling any act of God in declaration of his will, so there would be perpetual necessity of miracles, and we could not serve God directly with our understanding, for there would be no such thing as faith, that is, of assent without conviction of understanding; and we could not please God with believing, because there would be in it nothing of the will, nothing of love and choice; and that faith which is, would be like that of Thomas, “to believe what we see or hear,” and God should not at all govern upon earth unless he did continually come himself: for thus, all government, all teachers, all apostles, all messengers, would be needless, because, they could not show to the eye what they told to the ears of men. And it might as well be disbelieved in all courts and by all princes, that this was not the letter of a prince, or the act of a man, or the writing of his hand; and so all human intercourse must cease, and all senses but the eye be useless as to this affair, or else to the ear all voices must be strangers but the principal, if, I say, no reports shall make faith. But it is certain, that when these voices were sent from heaven and heard upon earth, they prevailed amongst many that heard them not, and disciples were multiplied upon such accounts; or else it must be that none that did hear them could be believed by any of their friends and neighbours; for if they were, the voice was as effective at the reflex and rebound as in the direct emission, and could prevail with them that believed their brother or their friend, as certainly as with them that believed their own ears and eyes.

14. I need not speak of the vast numbers of miracles which he wrought; miracles which were not more demonstrations of his power than of his mercy; for they had nothing of pompousness and ostentation, but infinitely of charity and mercy, and that permanent, and lasting, and often: he opened the eyes of the blind; he made the crooked straight; he made the weak strong; he cured fevers with the touch of his hand, and an issue of blood with the hem of his garment, and sore eyes with the spittle of his mouth and the clay of the earth; he multiplied the loaves and fishes; he raised the dead to life, a young maiden, the widow's son of Nain, and Lazarus; and cast out devils by the word of his mouth; which he could never do but by the power of God. For Satan does not cast out Satan, nor a house fight against itself, if it means to stand long; and the devil could not help Jesus, because the holy Jesus taught men virtue, called them from the worshipping devils, taught them to resist the devil, to lay aside all those abominable idolatries, by which the devil doth rule in the hearts of men: he taught men to love God, to fly from temptations to sin, to hate and avoid all those things of which the devil is guilty. For christianity forbids pride, envy, malice, lying, and yet affirms that the devil is proud, envious, malicious, and the father of lies; and therefore, wherever christianity prevails, the devil is not worshipped: and therefore he that can think, that a man, without the power of God, could overturn the devil's principles, cross his designs, weaken his strengths, baffle him in his policies, befool him and turn him out of possession, and make him open his own mouth against himself as he did often, and confess himself conquered by Jesus and tormented, as the oracle did to Augustus Cæsar, and the devil to Jesus himself;—he, I say, that thinks a mere man can do this, knows not the weaknesses of a man, nor the power of an angel; but he that thinks this could be done by compact and by consent of the devil, must think him to be an intelligence without understanding,—a power without force,—a fool and a sot to assist a power against himself, and to persecute the power he did assist, to stir up the world to destroy the christians, whose Master and Lord he did assist to destroy himself; and when we read that Porphyrius,^d a heathen, a professed enemy to christianity, did say, Ἰησοῦ τιμωμένου, τίς θεῶν δημοσίας ὠφελείας οὐκ ἤσθετο, that “since Jesus was worshipped, the gods could help no man,” that is, the gods which they worshipped; the poor, baffled, enervated demons; he must either think that the devils are as foolish as they are weak, or else that they did nothing towards this declination of their power; and therefore, that they suffer it by a power higher than themselves, that is, by the power of God in the hand of Jesus.

^d Euseb. lib. 5. c. 1. præp. Evang.

15. But besides that God gave testimony from heaven concerning him; he also gave this testimony of himself to have come from God, because that "he did God's will;" for he that is a good man, and lives, by the laws of God and of his nation, a life innocent and simple, prudent and wise, holy and spotless, un-reproved and unsuspected,—he is certainly by all wise men, said, in a good sense, to be the son of God; but he who does well and speaks well, and calls all men to glorify and serve God, and serves no ends but of holiness and charity, of wisdom of hearts and reformation of manners, this man carries great authority in his sayings, and ought to prevail with good men in good things, for good ends, which is all that is here required. But his nature was so sweet, his manners so humble, his words so wise and composed, his comportment so grave and winning, his answers so seasonable, his questions so deep, his reproof so severe and charitable, his pity so great and merciful, his preachings so full of reason and holiness, of weight and authority, his conversation so useful and beneficent, his poverty great but his alms frequent, his family so holy and religious, his and their employment so profitable, his meekness so incomparable, his passions without difference, save only where zeal or pity carried him on to worthy and apt expressions, a person that never laughed, but often wept in a sense of the calamities of others; he loved every man and hated no man, he gave counsel to the doubtful and instructed the ignorant, he bound up the broken hearts and strengthened the feeble knees, he relieved the poor and converted the sinners, he despised none that came to him for relief, and as for those that did not, he went to them; he took all occasions of mercy that were offered him, and went abroad for more; he spent his days in preaching and healing, and his nights in prayers and conversation with God; he was obedient to laws, and subject to princes, though he was the prince of Judea in right of his mother, and of all the world in right of his Father; the people followed him, but he made no conventions, and when they were made, he suffered no tumults; when they would have made him a king, he withdrew himself; when he knew they would put him to death, he offered himself; he knew men's hearts, and conversed secretly, and gave answer to their thoughts, and prevented their questions; he would work a miracle rather than give offence, and yet suffer every offence rather than see God his Father dishonoured; he exactly kept the law of Moses, to which he came to put a period, and yet chose to signify his purpose only by doing acts of mercy upon their sabbath, doing nothing which they should call a breach of a commandment, but healing sick people, a charity which themselves would do to beasts, and yet they were angry at him for doing it to their brethren. In all his life, and in all his conversation with his nation, he was innocent as an angel of light; and when, by the greatness of his worth, and the severity of his doctrine, and the charity of his miracles, and the noises of the people, and his immense fame in all that part of the world, and the multitude of his disciples, and the authority of his sermons, and his free reproof of their hypocrisy, and his discovery of their false doctrines and weak traditions, he had branded the reputation of the vicious rulers of the people, and they resolved to put him to death,—they who had the biggest malice in the world, and the weakest accusations, were forced to supply their want of articles against him by making truth to be his fault, and his office to be his crime, and his open confession of what was asked him, to be his article of condemnation: and yet, after all this, they could not persuade the competent judge to condemn him, or to find him guilty of any fault; and therefore they were forced to threaten him with Cæsar's name, against whom then they would pretend him to be an enemy, though in their charge they neither proved, nor indeed laid it against him; and yet, to whatsoever they objected he made no return, but his silence and his innocence were remarkable and evident, without labour and reply, and needed no more argument than the sun needs an advocate to prove that he is the brightest star in the firmament.

16. Well, so it was, they crucified him: and when they did, they did as much put out the eye of heaven as destroy the Son of God; for when, with an incomparable sweetness, and a patience exemplar to all ages and sufferers, he endured affronts, examinations, scorns, insolencies of rude ungente tradesmen, cruel whippings, injurious, unjust, and unreasonable usages from those whom he obliged by all the arts of endearment and offers of the biggest kindness,—at last he went to death as to the work which God appointed him, that he might become the world's sacrifice, and the great example of holiness, and the instance of representing by what way the world was to be made happy,—even by sufferings, and so entering into heaven:—that he might, I say, become the Saviour of his enemies, and the elder Brother to his friends, and the Lord of glory, and the fountain of its emanation. Then it was that God gave new testimonies from heaven: the sun was eclipsed all the while he was upon the cross, and yet the moon was in the full; that is, he lost his light, not because any thing in nature did invest him, but because the God of nature (as a heathen at that very time confessed, who yet saw nothing of this sad iniquity) did suffer. The rocks did rend, the veil of the temple divided of itself and opened the enclosures, and disparked the sanctuary, and made it pervious to the gentiles' eye: the dead arose, and appeared in Jerusalem to their friends; the centurion and divers of the people smote their hearts, and were by these strange indications convinced that he was the Son of God. His garments were parted, and lots cast upon his inward coat: they gave him vinegar and gall to drink; they brake not a bone of him, but they pierced his side with a spear, looking upon him whom they had pierced; according to the prophecies of him, which were so clear, and descended to minutes and circumstances of his passion, that there was nothing left, by which they could doubt whether this were he or no, who was to come into the world. But after all this, that all might be finally verified and no scruple left, after three days' burial, a great stone being rolled to the face of the grave, and the stone sealed, and a guard of soldiers placed about it, he arose from the grave, and for forty days together conversed with his followers and disciples, and beyond all suspicion was seen of five hundred brethren at once, which is a number too great to give their consent and testimony to a lie, and it being so publicly and confidently affirmed at the very time it was done, and for ever after urged by all christians, used as the most mighty demonstration, proclaimed, preached, talked of, even upbraided to the gainsayers, affirmed by eye-witnesses, persuaded to the kindred and friends, and the relatives and companions of all those five hundred persons who were eye-witnesses, it is infinitely removed from a reasonable suspicion; and at the end of those days was taken up into heaven in the sight of many of them, as Elias was in the presence of Elisha.

17. Now he of whom all these things are true, must needs be more than a mere man; and that they were true, was affirmed by very many eye-witnesses, men who were innocent, plain men, men that had no bad ends to serve, men that looked for no preferment by the thing in this life; men to whom their Master told they were to expect not crowns and sceptres, not praise of men or wealthy possessions, not power and ease, but a voluntary casting away care and attendance upon secular affairs that they might attend their ministry; poverty and prisons, trouble and vexation, persecution and labour, whippings and banishment, bonds and death; and for a reward they must stay till a good day came, but that was not to be at all in this world; and when the day of restitution and recompence should come, they should never know till it came, but upon the hope of this and the faith of Jesus, and the word of God so taught, so con-signed, they must rely wholly and for ever. Now let it be considered, how could matters of fact be proved better? and how could this be any thing, but such as to rely upon matters of fact? What greater certainty can we have of any thing that was ever done, which we saw not, or heard not,—but by the report of wise and honest persons? especially since they were such, whose life and breeding was so far from ambition and pompousness, that as they could not naturally and reasonably hope for any great number of proselytes, so the fame that could be hoped for amongst them, as it must be a matter of their own procuring, and consequently uncertain,—so it must needs be very inconsiderable, not fit to outweigh the danger and the loss, nor yet at all valuable by them whose education and pretences were against it. These we have plentifully. But if these men are numerous and united, it is more. Then we have more; for so many did affirm these things which they saw and heard, that thousands of people were convinced of the truth of them: but then if these men offer their oath, it is yet more, but yet not so much as we have, for they sealed those things with their blood; they gave their life for a testimony; and what reward can any man expect, if he gives his life for a lie? Who shall make him a recompence, or what can tempt him to do it knowingly? But after all, it is to be remembered, that as God hates lying, so he hates incredulity: as we must not believe a lie, so neither stop up our eyes and ears against truth; and what we do every minute of our lives in matters of little and of great concernment, if we refuse to do in our religion,—which yet is to be conducted as other human affairs are, by human instruments and arguments of persuasion proper to the nature of the thing,—it is an obstinacy that is as contrary to human reason as it is to Divine faith.

18. These things relate to the person of the holy Jesus; and prove sufficiently that it was extraordinary,—that it was Divine,—that God was with him,—that his power wrought in him; and, therefore, that it was his will which Jesus taught, and God signed. But then if nothing of all this had been, yet even the doctrine itself proves itself Divine and to come from God.

19. For it is a doctrine perfective of human nature, that teaches us to love God and to love one another, to hurt no man, and to do good to every man; it propines to us the noblest, the highest, and the bravest pleasures of the world; the joys of charity, the rest of innocence, the peace of quiet spirits, the wealth of beneficence, and forbids us only to be beasts and to be devils; it allows all that God and nature intended, and only restrains the excrescencies of nature, and forbids us to take pleasure in that which is the only entertainment of devils, in murders and revenges, malice and spiteful words and actions; it permits corporal pleasures where they can best minister to health and societies, to conversation of families and honour of communities; it teaches men to keep their words that themselves may be secured in all their just interests, and to do good to others that good may be done to them; it forbids biting one another, that we may not be devoured by one another; and commands obedience to superiors, that we may not be ruined in confusions; it combines governments, and confirms all good laws, and makes peace, and opposes and prevents wars, where they are not just, and where they are not necessary. It is a religion that is life and spirit, not consisting in ceremonies and external amusements, but in the services of the heart, and the real fruit of lips and hands, that is, of good words and good deeds; it bids us to do that to God which is agreeable to his excellencies,—that is, worship him with the best thing we have, and make all things else minister to it; it bids us to do that to our neighbour by which he may be better: it is the perfection of the natural law, and agreeable to our natural necessities, and promotes our natural ends and designs: it does not destroy reason, but instructs it in very many things, and complies with it in all; it hath in it both heat and light, and is not more effectual than it is beauteous; it promises every thing that we can desire, and yet promises nothing but what it does effect; it proclaims war against all vices, and generally does command every virtue; it teaches us with ease to mortify those affections which reason durst scarce reprove, because she hath not strength enough to conquer; and it does create in us those virtues, which reason of herself never knew,—and, after they are known, could never approve sufficiently: it is a doctrine in which nothing is superfluous or burdensome, nor yet is there any thing wanting, which can procure happiness to mankind, or by which God can be glorified: and if wisdom, and mercy, and justice, and simplicity, and holiness, and purity, and meekness, and contentedness, and charity, be images of God and rays of Divinity, then that doctrine in which all these shine so gloriously, and in which nothing else is ingredient, must needs be from God; and that all this is true in the doctrine of Jesus, needs no other probation but the reading the words.

20. For that the words of Jesus are contained in the Gospels, that is, in the writings of them who were eye-witnesses and ear-witnesses of the actions and sermons of Jesus, is not at all to be doubted; for in every sect we believe their own records of doctrine and institution; for it is madness to suppose the christians to pretend to be servants of the laws of Jesus, and yet to make a law of their own which he made not: no man doubts but that the Alcoran is the law of Mahomet, that the Old Testament contains the religion of the Jews; and the authority of these books is proved by all the arguments of the religion, for all the arguments persuading to the religion are intended to prove no other than is contained in those books; and these having been for 1500 years and more received absolutely by all christian assemblies, if any man shall offer to make a question of their authority, he must declare his reasons,—for the disciples of the religion have sufficient presumption, security and possession, till they can be reasonably disturbed; but that now they can never be is infinitely certain, because we have a long, immemorial, universal tradition that these books were written, in those times, by those men whose names they bear; they were accepted by all churches at the very first notice, except some few of the later, which were first received by some churches, and then consented to by all, they were acknowledged by the same, and by the next age for genuine, their authority published, their words cited, appeals made to them in all questions of religion, because it was known and confessed that they wrote nothing but that they knew, so that they were not deceived; and to say they would lie must be made to appear by something extrinsic to this inquiry, and was never so much as plausibly pretended by any adversaries, and it being a matter of another man's will, must be declared by actions, or not at all. But besides the men that wrote them were to be believed because they did miracles,—they wrote prophecies, which are verified by the event; persons were cured at their sepulchres, a thing so famous that it was confessed even by the enemies of the religion: and after all, that which the world ought to rely upon, is the wisdom, and the providence, and the goodness of God; all which it concerned to take care that the religion, which himself so adorned and proved by miracles and mighty signs, should not be lost, nor any false writings be obtruded instead of true, lest, without our fault, the will of God become impossible to be obeyed. But to return to the thing: all those excellent things which singly did make famous so many sects of philosophers, and remarked so many princes of their sects, all them united, and many more which their eyes, ὄμματα νυκτέριδων, dark and dim, could not see, are heaped together in this system of wisdom and holiness. Here are plain precepts full of deepest mystery; here are the measures of holiness and approaches to God described; obedience and conformity, mortification of the body and elevations of the spirit, abstractions from earth, and arts of society and union with heaven, degrees of excellencies, and tendencies to perfection, imitations of God, and conversations with him; these are the heights and descents, upon the plain grounds of natural reason, and natural religion,—for there is nothing commanded but what our reason by nature ought to choose, and yet nothing of natural reason taught but what is heightened and made more perfect by the Spirit of God; and when there is any thing in the religion, that is against flesh and blood, it is only when flesh and blood is against us and against reason, when flesh and blood either would hinder us from great felicity, or bring us into great misery. To conclude, it is such a law, that nothing can hinder men to receive and entertain, but a pertinacious baseness and love to vice, and none can receive it but those who resolve to be good and excellent; and if the holy Jesus had come into the world with less splendour of power and mighty demonstrations, yet even the excellency of what he taught, makes him alone fit to be the master of the world.

21. But then let us consider what this excellent Person did effect, and with what instruments he brought so great things to pass. He was to put a period to the rites of Moses, and the religion of the temple, of which the Jews were zealous even unto pertinacy; to reform the manners of all mankind, to confound the wisdom of the Greeks, to break in pieces the power of the devil, to destroy the worship of all false gods, to pull down their oracles, and change their laws, and by principles wise and holy to reform the false discourses of the world. But see what was to be taught, a trinity in the unity of the Godhead, τρία ἐν καὶ ἐν τρία, that is the christian arithmetic, “Three are one, and one are three,” so Lucian in his Philopatriss, or some other, derides the christian doctrine; see their philosophy, “Ex nihilo nihil fit.” No: “Ex nihilo omnia,” “all things are made of nothing:”—and a Man-God and a God-Man, the same person finite and infinite, born in time, and yet from all eternity the Son of God, but yet born of a woman, and she a maid, but yet a mother; resurrection of the dead, reunion of soul and body; this was part of the christian physies or their natural philosophy. But then certainly their moral was easy and delicious. It is so indeed, but not to flesh and blood, whose appetites it pretends to regulate or to destroy, to restrain or else to mortify: fasting, and penance, and humility, loving our enemies, restitution of injuries, and self-denial, and taking up the cross, and losing all our goods, and giving our life for Jesus: as the other was hard to believe, so this is as hard to do. But for whom and under whose conduct was all this to be believed, and all this to be done, and all this to be suffered? surely for some glorious and mighty prince, whose splendour as far outshines the Roman empire as the jewels of Cleopatra outshone the swaddling clothes of the babe at Bethlehem. No, it was not so neither. For all this was for Jesus, whom his followers preached; a poor babe born in a stable; the son of a carpenter, cradled in a cratch, swaddled in poor clouts; it was for him whom they indeed called a God, but yet who, all the world knew, and they themselves said, was whipped at a post, nailed to a cross; he fell under the malice of the Jews his countrymen, and the power of his Roman lords, a cheap and a pitiful sacrifice without beauty and without splendour. The design is great, but does not yet seem possible; but, therefore, let us see what instruments the holy Jesus chose to effect these so mighty changes, to persuade so many propositions, to endear so great sufferings, to overcome so great enemies, to master so many impossibilities, which this doctrine, and this law, from this master, were sure to meet withal.

22. Here, here it is that the Divinity of the power is proclaimed. When a man goes to war, he raises as great an army as he can to out-number his enemy; but when God fights, three hundred men that lap like a dog are sufficient; nay, one word can dissolve the greatest army. He that means to effect any thing, must have means of his own proportionable; and if they be not, he must fail, or derive them from the mighty. See then with what instruments the holy Jesus sets upon this great reformation of the world. Twelve men of obscure and poor birth, of contemptible trades and quality, without learning, without breeding; these men were sent into the midst of a knowing and wise world to dispute with the most famous philosophers of Greece, to out-wit all the learning of Athens, to out-preach all the Roman orators; to introduce into a newly settled empire, which would be impatient of novelties and change, such a change as must destroy all their temples, or remove thence all their gods: against which change all the zeal of the world, and all the passions, and all the seeming pretences which they could make, must needs be violently opposed; a change that introduced new laws, and caused them to reverse the old, to change that religion under which their fathers long did prosper, and under which the Roman empire obtained so great a grandeur, for a religion which in appearance was silly and humble, meek and peaceable, not apt indeed to do harm; but exposing men to all the harm in the world, abating their courage, blunting their swords, teaching peace and unactiveness, and making the soldiers' arms in a manner useless, and untying their military girdle; a religion which contradicted their reasons of state, and erected new judicatories, and made the Roman courts to be silent and without causes; a religion that gave countenance to the poor and pitiful (but in a time when riches were adored, and ambition esteemed the greatest nobleness, and pleasure thought to be the chiefest good); it brought no peculiar blessing to the rich or mighty, unless they would become poor and humble in some real sense or other; a religion that would change the face of things, and would also pierce into the secrets of the soul, and unravel all the intrigues of hearts, and reform all evil manners, and break vile habits into gentleness and counsel: that such a religion in such a time, preached by such mean persons, should triumph over the philosophy of the world, and the arguments of the subtle, and the sermons of the eloquent, and the power of princes, and the interest of states, and the inclinations of nature, and the blindness of zeal, and the force of custom, and the pleasures of sin, and the busy arts of the devil, that is, against wit, and power, and money, and religion, and wilfulness, and fame, and empire, which are all the things in the world that can make a thing impossible; this, I say, could not be by the proper force of such instruments; for no man can span heaven with an infant's palm, nor govern wise empires with diagrams. It were impudence to send a footman to command Cæsar to lay down his arms, to disband his legions, and throw himself into the Tiber, or keep a tavern next to Pompey's theatre; but if a sober man shall stand alone unarmed, undefended, or unprovided; and shall tell that he will make the sun stand still, or remove a mountain, or reduce Xerxes's army to the scantling of a single troop, he that believes he will and can do this, must believe he does it by a higher power than he can yet perceive, and so it was in the present transaction. For that the holy Jesus made invisible powers to do him visible honours, that his apostles hunted the demons from their tripods, their navels, their dens, their hollow pipes, their temples, and their altars, that he made the oracles silent, as Lucian, Porphyry, Celsus, and other heathens confess; that against the order of new things, which, let them be ever so profitable or good, do yet suffer reproach, and cannot prevail unless they commence in a time of advantage and favour,—yet that this should flourish like the palm by pressure, grow glorious by opposition, thrive by persecution, and was demonstrated by objections,—argues a higher cause than the immediate instrument. Now how this higher cause did intervene is visible and notorious: the apostles were not learned, but the holy Jesus promised that he would send down wisdom from above, from the Father of spirits; they had no power, but they should be invested with power from on high; they were ignorant and timorous, but he would make them learned and confident, and so he did: he promised that, in a few days, he would send the Holy Ghost upon them,—and he did so: after ten days, they felt and saw a glorious immission from heaven, lights of movable fire sitting upon their heads, and that light did illuminate their hearts, and the mighty rushing wind inspired them with a power of speaking divers languages, and brought to their remembrances all that Jesus did and taught,—and made them wise to conduct souls, and bold to venture, and prudent to advise, and powerful to do miracles, and witty to convince gainsayers, and hugely instructed in the Scriptures, and gave them the spirit of government and the spirit of prophecy. This thing was so public, that, at the first notice of it, three thousand souls were converted on that very day, at the very time when it was done; for it was certainly a visible demonstration of an invisible power, that ignorant persons who were never taught, should, in an instant, speak all the languages of the Roman empire; and indeed this thing was so necessary to be so, and so certain that it was so, so public and so evident, and so reasonable, and so useful, that it is not easy to say whether it was the indication of a greater power or a greater wisdom. And now the means was proportionable enough to the biggest end: without learning they could not confute the learned world, but therefore God became their teacher; without power they could not break the devil's violence, but therefore God gave them power; without courage they could not contest against all the violence of the Jews and gentiles, but therefore God was their strength, and gave them fortitude; without great caution and providence they could not avoid the traps of crafty persecutors, but therefore God gave them caution, and made them provident: and as Bezaleel and Aholiab^e received the Spirit of God, the spirit of understanding, to enable them to work excellently in the tabernacle, so had the apostles to make them wise for the work of God and the ministries of his diviner tabernacle, "which God pitched, not man." Immediately upon this, the apostles, to make a fulness of demonstration and an undeniable conviction, gave the Spirit to others also, to Jews and gentiles, and to the men of Samaria, and they spake with tongues and prophesied; then they preached to all nations, and endured all persecutions, and cured all diseases, and raised the dead to life, and were brought before tribunals, and confessed the name of Jesus, and convinced the blasphemous Jews out of their own prophets, and not only prevailed upon women and weak men, but even upon the bravest and wisest. All the disciples of John the Baptist, the Nazarenes and Ebionites, Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea, Sergius the president, Dionysius an Athenian judge, and Polycarpus, Justinus and Irenæus, Athenagoras and Origen, Tertullian and Clemens of Alexandria, who could not be such fools, as, upon a matter not certainly true, but probably false, to unravel their former principles, and to change their liberty for a prison, wealth for poverty, honour for disreputation, life for death, if by such exchange they had not been secured of truth and holiness and the will of God.

23. But above all these was Saul, a bold and a witty, a zealous and learned young man, who, going with letters to persecute the christians of Damascus, was, by a light from heaven, called from his furious march, reproved by God's angel for persecuting the cause of Jesus, was sent to the city, baptized by a christian minister, instructed and sent abroad; and he became the prodigy of the world for learning and zeal, for preaching and writing, for labour and sufferance, for government and wisdom; he was admitted to see the holy Jesus after the Lord was taken into heaven; he was taken up into paradise; he conversed with angels; he saw unspeakable rays of glory; and besides that himself said it, who had no reason to lie, who would get nothing by it here but a conjugation of troubles, and who should get nothing by it hereafter if it were false;—besides this I say, that he did all those acts of zeal and obedience for the promotion of the religion, does demonstrate he had reason extraordinary for so sudden a change, so strange a labour, so frequent and incomparable sufferings: and, therefore, as he did and suffered so much upon such glorious motives, so he spared not to publish it to all the world, he spake it to kings and princes, he told it to the envious Jews: he had partners of his journey who were witnesses of the miraculous accident, and in his publication he urged the notoriousness of the fact, as a thing not feigned, not private, but done at noon-day, under the test of competent persons: and it was a thing that proved itself, for it was effective of a present, a great, and a permanent change.

24. But now it is no new wonder, but a pursuance of the same conjugation of great and divine things, that the fame and religion of Jesus was, with so incredible a swiftness, scattered over the face of the habitable world, from one end of the earth unto the other: it filled all Asia immediately, it passed presently to Europe, and to the furthest Africans; and all the way it went, it told nothing but an holy and an humble story, that he who came to bring it into the world, died an ignominious death; and yet this death did not take away their courage, but added much: for they could not fear death for that Master, whom they knew to have, for their sakes, suffered death, and came to life again. But now infinite numbers of persons, of all sexes, and all ages, and all countries, came in to the holy crucifix; and he that was crucified in the reign of Tiberius, was, in the time of Nero, even in Rome itself, and in Nero's family, by many persons, esteemed for a God; and it was upon public record that he was so acknowledged; and this was by a christian, Justin Martyr, urged to the senate, and to the emperors themselves, who, if it had been otherwise, could easily have confuted the bold allegation of the christian, who yet did die for that Jesus, who was so speedily reputed for a God; the cross was worn upon breasts, printed in the air, drawn upon foreheads, carried on banners, put upon crowns imperial; and yet the christians were sought for to punishments, and exquisite punishments sought forth for them; their goods were confiscate, their names odious, prisons were their houses, and so many kinds of tortures invented for them, that Domitius Ulpianus hath spent seven books in describing the variety of tortures the poor christian was put to at his first appearing; and yet in despite of all this, and ten thousand other objections and impossibilities, whatsoever was for them, made the religion grow, and whatsoever was against them, made it grow; if they had peace, the religion was prosperous,—if they had persecution, it was still prosperous; if princes favoured them, the world came in because the christians lived holily; if princes were incensed, the world came in because the christians died bravely. They sought for death with greediness; they desired to be grinded in the teeth of lions: and with joy they beheld the wheels and the bended trees, the racks and the gibbets, the fires and the burning irons, which were like the chair of Elias to them, instruments to carry them to heaven, into the bosom of their beloved Jesus.

25. Who would not acknowledge the Divinity of this person, and the excellency of this institution, that should see infants to weary the hands of hangmen for the testimony of Jesus? and wise men preach this doctrine for no other visible reward, but shame and death, poverty and banishment? and hangmen converted by the blood of martyrs springing upon their faces, which their impious hands and cords have strained through their flesh? Who would not have confessed the honour of Jesus, when he should see miracles done at the tombs of martyrs, and devils tremble at the mention of the name of Jesus, and the world running to the honour of the poor Nazarene, and kings and queens kissing the feet of the poor servants of Jesus? Could a few fishermen and a publican effect all this for the son of a poor maiden of Judea? Can we suppose all the world, or so great a part of mankind, can consent by chance, or suffer such changes for nothing? or for any thing less than this? The son of the poor maiden was the Son of God, and the fishermen spake by a Divine spirit, and they caught the world with holiness and miracles, with wisdom and power bigger than the strength of all the Roman legions. And what can be added to all this, but this thing alone to prove the Divinity of Jesus? He is a God, or at least is taught by God, who can foretell future contingencies; and so did the holy Jesus, and so did his disciples.

26. Our blessed Lord, while he was alive, foretold that, after his death, his religion should flourish more than when he was alive: he foretold persecutions to his disciples; he foretold the mission of the Holy Ghost to be in a very few days after his ascension, which within ten days came to pass; he prophesied that the fact of Mary Magdalene in anointing the head and feet of her Lord, should be public and known as the gospel itself, and spoken of in the same place; he foretold the destruction of Jerusalem, and the signs of its approach, and that it should be by war; and particularly after the manner of prophets, symbolically named the nation should do it, pointing out the Roman eagles; he foretold his death, and the manner of it; and plainly, beforehand, published his resurrection, and told them it should be the sign to that generation, viz. the great argument to prove him to be the Christ; he prophesied that there should arise false Christs after him, and it came to pass, to the extreme great calamity of the nation; and lastly, he foretold that his beloved disciple, St. John, should tarry upon the earth till his coming again, that is, to his coming to judgment upon Jerusalem; and that his religion should be preached to the gentiles, that it should be scattered over all the world, and be received by all nations; that it should stay upon the face of the earth till his last coming to judge all the world, and that "the gates of hell should not be able to prevail against his church;" which prophecy is made good thus long, till this day, and is as a continual argument to justify the Divinity of the Author: the continuance of the religion helps to continue it, for it proves that it came from God, who foretold that it should continue; and therefore it must continue, because it came from God; and therefore it came from God, because it does and shall for ever continue, according to the word of the holy Jesus.

27. But after our blessed Lord was entered into glory, the disciples also were prophets; Agabus foretold the dearth that was to be in the Roman empire in the days of Claudius Cæsar, and that St. Paul should be bound at Jerusalem; St. Paul foretold the entering in of heretics into Asia after his departure; and he, and St. Peter, and St. Jude, and generally the rest of the apostles, had two great predictions, which they used, not only as a verification of the doctrine of Jesus, but as a means to strengthen the hearts of the disciples, who were so broken with persecution: the one was, that there should arise a sect of vile men, who should be enemies to religion and government, and cause a great apostasy, which happened notoriously in the sect of the Gnostics, which those three apostles and St. John notoriously and plainly do describe; and the other was, that although the Jewish nation did mightily oppose the religion, it should be but for a while, for they should be destroyed in a short time, and their nation made extremely miserable; but for the christians, if they would fly from Jerusalem, and go to Pella, there should not a hair of their head perish. The verification of this prophecy the christians extremely longed for, and wondered it staid so long, and began to be troubled at the delay, and suspected all was not well, when the great proof of their religion was not verified; and while they were in thoughts of heart concerning it, the sad catalysis did come, and swept away one million one hundred thousand of the nation, and from that day forward the nation was broken in pieces with intolerable calamities, they are scattered over the face of the earth, and are a vagabond nation, but yet like oil in a vessel of wine, broken into bubbles, but kept in their own circles, and they shall never be a united people till they are servants of the holy Jesus; but shall remain without priest or temple, without altar or sacrifice, without city or country, without the land of promise, or the promise of a blessing, till our Jesus is their High Priest, and the Shepherd to gather them into his fold: and this very thing is a mighty demonstration against the Jews by their own prophets; for when Isaiah, and Jeremiah, and Malachi, had prophesied the rejection of the Jews, and the calling of the gentiles, and the change of the old law, and the introduction of a new by the Messias,—that this was he, was therefore certain, because he taught the world a new law; and presently after the publication of this, the old was abrogate, and not only went into desuetude, but into a total abolition among all the world; and for those of the remnant of the scattered Jews, who obstinately blaspheme, the law is become impossible to them, and they placed in such circumstances that they need not dispute concerning its obligation: for it being external and corporal, ritual, and at last made also local, when the circumstances are impossible, the law that was wholly ceremonial and circumstantial must needs pass away; and when they have lost their priesthood, they cannot retain the law; as no man takes care to have his beard shaved when his head is off.

28. And it is a wonder to consider, how the anger of God is gone out upon that miserable people, and that so great a blindness is fallen upon them; it being evident and notorious, that the Old Testament was nothing but a shadow and umbrage of the New; that the prophecies of that are plainly verified in this; that all the predictions of the Messias are most undeniably accomplished in the person of Jesus Christ, so that they cannot, with any plausibleness or colour, be turned any other way, and be applied to any other person; although the Jews make illiterate allegations, and prodigious dreams, by which they have fooled themselves for sixteen hundred years together, and still hope without reason, and are confident without revelation, and pursue a shadow while they quit the glorious body; while, in the mean time, the christian prays for his conversion, and is at rest in the truth of Jesus, and hath certain inexpressible confidences and internal lights, clarities of the Holy Spirit of God, and loves to the holy Jesus produced in his soul,—that he will die when he cannot dispute, and is satisfied and he knows not how, and is sure by comforts, and comforted by the excellency of his belief, which speaks nothing but holiness, and light and reason, and peace and satisfactions infinite; because he is sure that all the world can be happy if they would live by the religion of Jesus, and that neither societies of men nor single persons can have felicity but by this,—and that, therefore, God, who so decrees to make men happy, hath also decreed that it shall for ever be upon the face of the earth, till the earth itself shall be no more. Amen.

29. Now if, against this vast heap of things, any man shall but confront the pretences of any other religion, and see how they fail both of reason and holiness, of wonder and divinity, how they enter by force, and are kept up by human interests, how ignorant and unholy, how unlearned and pitiful are their pretences, the darknesses of these must add great eminency to the brightness of that. For the Jews' religion, which came from heaven, is, therefore, not now to be practised, because it did come from heaven, and was to expire into the christian, it being nothing but the image of this perfection; and the Jews needed no other argument but this, that God hath made theirs impossible now to be done,—for he that ties to ceremonies and outward usages, temples and altars, sacrifices and priests, troublesome and expensive rites, and figures of future signification, means that there should be an abode and fixed dwelling, for these are not to be done by an ambulatory people; and, therefore, since God hath scattered the people into atoms and crumbs of society, without temple or priest, without sacrifice or altar, without Urim or Thummim, without prophet or vision, even communicating with them no way but by ordinary providence, it is but too evident, that God hath nothing to do with them in the matter of that religion, but that it is expired, and no way obligatory to them or pleasing to him, which is become impossible to be acted: whereas the christian religion is as eternal as the soul of a man, and can no more cease than our spirits can die, and can worship upon mountains and caves, in fields and churches, in peace and war, in solitude and society, in persecution and in sunshine, by night and by day, and be solemnized by clergy and laity in the essential parts of it, and is the perfection of the soul, and the highest reason of man, and the glorification of God.

30. But for the heathen religions, it is evidently to be seen, that they are nothing but an abuse of the natural inclination which all men have to worship a God, whom because they know not, they guess at in the dark; for that they know there is and ought to be something that hath the care and providence of their affairs. But the body of their religion is nothing but little arts of governments, and stratagems of princes, and devices to secure the government of new usurpers, or to make obedience to the laws sure, by being sacred, and to make the yoke that was not natural, pleasant by something that is. But yet for the whole body of it, who sees not that their worshippings could not be sacred, because they were done by something that is impure? They appeased their gods with adulteries and impure mixtures, by such things which Cato was ashamed to see, by gluttonous eatings of flesh, and impious drinkings: and they did "litare in humano sanguine," they sacrificed men, and women, and children to their dæmons,—as is notorious in the rites of Bacchus Omesta amongst the Greeks, and of Jupiter, to whom a Greek and a Greekest, a Galatian and a Galatess, were yearly offered; in the answers of the oracles to Calchas, as appears in Homer and Virgil; who sees not that crimes were warranted by the example of their immortal gods, and that what did dishonour themselves, they sang to the honour of their gods, whom they affirmed to be passionate and proud, jealous and revengeful, amorous and lustful, fearful and impatient, drunken and sleepy, weary and wounded; that the religions were made lasting by policy and force, by ignorance and the force of custom, by the preferring an inveterate error, and loving of a quiet and prosperous evil, by the arguments of pleasure and the correspondences of sensuality, by the fraud of oracles and the patronage of vices; and because they feared every change as an earthquake, as supposing overturnings of their old error to be the eversion of their well established governments; and it had been ordinarily impossible that ever christianity should have entered, if the nature and excellency of it had not been such as to enter like rain into a fleece of wool, or the sun into a window without noise or violence, without emotion and disordering the political constitution, without causing trouble to any man but what his own ignorance or peevishness was pleased to spin out of his own bowels: but did establish governments, secure obedience, made the laws firm, and the persons of princes to be sacred; it did not oppose force by force, nor "strike princes for justice; it defended itself against enemies by patience, and overcame them by kindness; it was the great instrument of God to demonstrate his power in our weaknesses, and to do good to mankind by the imitation of his excellent goodness.

31. Lastly; He that considers concerning the religion and person of Mahomet, that he was a vicious person, lustful and tyrannical,—that he propounded incredible and ridiculous propositions to his disciples,—that it entered by the sword, by blood and violence, by murder and robbery,—that it propounds sensual rewards, and allures to compliance by bribing our basest lusts, that it conserves itself by the same means it entered; that it is unlearned and foolish, against reason, and the discourses of all wise men,—that it did no miracles and made false prophecies: in short, that in the person that founded it, in the article it persuades, in the manner of prevailing, in the reward it offers, it is unholy, and foolish, and rude; it must needs appear to be void of all pretence, and that no man of reason can ever be fairly persuaded by arguments, that it is the daughter of God, and came down from heaven. Since, therefore, there is nothing to be said for any other religion, and so very much for christianity, every one of whose pretences can be proved as well as the things themselves do require, and as all the world expects such things should be proved; it follows, that the holy Jesus is the Son of God, that his religion is commanded by God, and is that way by which he will be worshipped and honoured, and that “there is no other name under heaven by which we can be saved, but only by the name of the Lord Jesus.” He that puts his soul upon this, cannot perish; neither can he be reproved, who hath so much reason and argument for his religion. “Sit anima mea cum christianis;” I pray God, “my soul may be numbered amongst the christians.”

32. This πᾶρεργον I have here brought as an instance of moral demonstration, not only to do honour to my dearest Lord, by speaking true and great things of his name, and endeavouring to advance and establish his kingdom, but to represent in order to the first intention, that a heap of probabilities may, in some cases, make a sure conscience: for, as Cicero says, “Probabile id est, quod habet in se quandam similitudinem, sive id falsum est, sive verum.” For probability is not in the thing properly, for every thing is true or false in itself, and even false things may have the face and the likeness of truth, and cozen even wise persons. It was said of Bias, in Diogenes Laertius, “Orator summus et vehemens, sed in bonam causam dicendi vim omnem exercuit;” he could speak excellently, but then he spake best when he had an ill cause. This Lactantius calls “argutam malitiam,” “a cunning and an eloquent malice.” But then as falsehood may put on the face of truth, so may truth also look like itself; and, indeed, every truth that men preach in religion is at least probable, that is, there is so much to be said for it, that wise and good men may be persuaded into every truth; and the cause that it is only probable is by reason of our want of knowledge of things; but if it so happen that there is much to be said for the truth, and little or nothing against it, then it is a moral demonstration, that is, it ought to persuade firmly, and upon it we may rest confidently.

33. This only I am to admonish, that our assent in these cases is not to be greater than the force of the premises; and therefore the church of Rome,—offering to prove all her religion as it distinguishes from the other divisions of christians only by some prudential motives, or probable inducements, and yet requiring that all her disciples should believe it with divine and infallible faith, as certainly as we believe a mathematical demonstration,—does unjustly require brick where she gives no straw, and builds a tower upon a bulrush, and confesses that her interest is stronger than her argument, and that where by direct proof she cannot prevail, she by little arts would affright the understanding. For to give a perfect assent to probable inducements can neither be reasonable nor possible for considering persons, unless these conditions be in it.

The Requisites or Conditions of a Moral Demonstration for the assuring our Conscience.

34. (1.) That the thing be the most probable to us in our present condition: for there are summities and principalities of probation proportionable to the ages and capacities of men and women. A little thing determines a weak person; and children believe infinitely whatsoever is told to them by their parents or tutors, because they have nothing to contest against it. For in all probable discourses, there is an allay and abatement of persuasion by the opposition of argument to argument; but they who have nothing to oppose, and have no reason to suspect, must give themselves up wholly to it; and then every thing that comes is equally the highest, because it fully and finally must prevail. But then that which prevails in infancy, seems childish and ridiculous in our youth; and then we are concluded by some pretences and pretty umbrages of things, which, for want of experiences, we think very well of; and we can then do no more; that is a demonstration to us, which must determine us: and these little things must then do it because something must be done, and we must do it as wisely as we may, but no man is bound to be wiser than he can. As the thing seems, either in its own light or in our position, so we are to give our assent unto it.

35. (2.) A heap of probable inducements ought to prevail, as being then a moral demonstration, when the thing is not capable of a natural; for then probabilities ought to prevail, when they are the best argument we have. For if any man shall argue thus: “It is not probable that God would leave his church without sufficient means to end controversies, and since a living infallible judge is the most effective to this purpose, it is therefore to be presumed and relied upon, that God hath done so.” This argument ought not to prevail as a moral demonstration; for though there are some semblances and appearances of reason in it, “Nihil enim est tam incredibile, quod non dicendo fiat probabile;” said Cicero in his Paradoxies; “there is nothing so incredible, but something may be said for it; and a witty man may make it plausible, yet there are certainties against it. For God hath said expressly, that "every man is a liar," and therefore we are commanded to "call no man master upon earth;" and the nature of man is weak, and his understanding trifling, and every thing abuses him, and every man that is wise sees his own ignorance, and he that is not wise is easily deceived,—and they who have pretended to be infallible, have spoken pitiful things, and fallen into strange errors, and cannot be guarded from shame without a whole legion of artifices and distinctions, and therefore, it is certain that no man is infallible; and where the contrary is certain, the probable pretence is but a fallacy and an art of illusion.

36. (3.) There can be no moral demonstration against the word of God, or Divine revelation. He that should flatter himself with thinking the pains of hell shall not be eternal, because it is not agreeable to the goodness of God to inflict a never-ceasing pain for a sudden and transient pleasure, and that there can be no proportion between finite and infinite, and yet God who is the fountain of justice will observe proportions; or if there could be ten thousand more little things said to persuade a sinning man into confidences of an end of torment:—yet he would find himself deceived, for all would be light when put into the balance against these words of our blessed Saviour, "Where the worm never dies, and the fire never goeth out."

37. (4.) Where there is great probability on both sides, there neither of them can pretend to be a moral demonstration, or directly to secure the conscience: for contradictions can never be demonstrated; and if one says true, the other is a fair pretender, but a foul deceiver; and, therefore, in this case the conscience is to be secured indirectly and collaterally by the diligence of search, the honesty of its intention, the heartiness of its assent, the infirmity of the searcher, and the unavoidableness of his mistake.

38. (5.) The certainty of a moral demonstration must rely upon some certain rule, to which, as to a centre, all the little and great probabilities, like the lines of a circumference, must turn; and when there is nothing in the matter of the question, then conscience hath ἓν μέγα, one great axiom to rely upon, and that is, that "God is just," and "God is good, and requires no greater probation than he hath enabled us to find."

39. (6.) In probable inducements, God requires only such an assent as can be effective of our duty and obedience, such a one as we will rely upon to real events, such as merchants have when they venture their goods to sea upon reasonable hopes of becoming rich, or armies fight battles in hope of victory, relying upon the strength they have as probable to prevail; and if any article of our religion be so proved to us as that we will reduce it to practice, own all its consequences, live according to it, and in the pursuance of it, hope for God's mercy and acceptance, it is an assent as great as the thing will bear, and yet, as much as our duty will require; for in these cases no man is wise but he whose ears and heart are open to hear the instructions of any man who is wiser and better than himself.

40. (7.) Rules of prudence are never to be accepted against a rule of logic, or reason, and strict discourses. I remember that Bellarmine, going to prove purgatory from the words of our blessed Saviour, "It shall not be forgiven him in this world nor in the world to come;" argues thus, "If this shall not be forgiven in the world to come, then it implies that some sins are there forgiven, and, therefore, there is a purgatory; because in heaven there are no sins, and in hell there are none forgiven. This (says he) concludes not by the rule of logicians, but it does by the rule of prudence." Now this to all wise men must needs appear to be an egregious prevarication even of common sense; for if the rules of logic be true, then it is not prudence, but imprudence that contradicts them, unless it be prudence to tell or to believe a lie. For the use of prudence is to draw from conjectures a safe and a wise conclusion, when there are no certain rules to guide us. But against the certain rule it is folly that declares, not prudence; and besides that this conjecture of Bellarmine is wholly against the design of Christ, who intended there only to say that "the sin against the Holy Ghost should never be pardoned;" it fails also in the main inquiry, for although there are no sins in heaven, and in hell none are forgiven, yet at the day of judgment all the sins of the penitent shall be forgiven and acquitted with a blessed sentence: but besides this, the manner of expression is such as may with prudence be expounded, and yet to no such purpose as he dreams. For if I should say, Aristobulus was taken away, that neither in this life, nor after his death, his eyes might see the destruction of the temple, does it follow by the rule of prudence, therefore, some people can see in their grave, or in the state of separation with their bodily eyes? But as to the main inquiry, what is to be the measure of prudence? For some confident people think themselves very prudent, and that they say well and wisely, when others, wiser than they, know they talk like fools: and because no established reason can be contradicted by a prudent conjecture, it is certain that this prudence of Bellarmine was a hard shift to get an argument for nothing, and that no prudential motives are to be valued because any man calls them so, but because they do rely upon some sure foundation, and draw obscure lines from a resolved truth. For it is not a prudential motive, unless it can finally rest upon reason, or revelation, or experience, or something that is not contradicted by any thing surer than itself.

RULE III.

Of two Opinions equally probable, upon the Account of their proper Reasons, one may be safer than another.

I. THAT is more probable, which hath fairer reasons; that is more safe, that is furthest distant from a sin : and although this be always considerable in the matter of prudence, and in the whole conjunction of affairs, yet it is not always a proper ingredient in the question. The abbot of Leriushath the patronage of some ecclesiastical preferments in the neighbourhood ; he, for affection, prefers to one of them an ignorant and a vicious clerk. But afterwards being troubled in conscience, inquires if he be not bound to restitution. He is answered, No ; because it is in the matter of distributive justice, which binds not to repair that which is past, any other ways but by repentance to God, and provisions for the future : yet he being perplexed and unsatisfied, does restore so much fruits to the next worthy incumbent, as the former unworthy clerk did eat. This was the surer course, and it procured peace to him ; but the contrary was the more probable answer. It is safer to restore all gains of usury ; but it is more probable that a man is not obliged to it. In which cases the advantage lies not on that side that is more probable, but on that which is more safe ; as in these sentences that oblige to restitution. For although either part avoids a formal sin, yet the safer side also persuades to an action that is materially good, such as restitution is ; but not to restore, although in these cases it may be innocent, yet, in no sense, can it of itself be laudable.

2. To which also in these cases it may be added, that on the safer side there is a physical, or natural and proper certainty, that we sin not : on the other, though there is a greater probability that there is no obligation, yet, at most, it can make but some degrees of moral certainty. But how far this course is to be chosen and pursued, or how far the other is to be preferred, will afterwards be disputed.

RULE IV.

An Opinion that is speculatively probable, is not always practically the same.

1. IN a right and sure conscience the speculative and the practical judgment are always united, as I have before^f explicated ; but in opinions that are but probable, the case is contrary. It is in speculation probable, that it is lawful to baptize in the name of the Lord Jesus ; but yet, he that shall do this practically, does improbably and unreasonably. If the opinion of the primitive christians had been probable that it is lawful to communicate infants, yet it were at no hand fitting to be done in the present constitution of affairs ; and it were highly useful, if men would consider this effectually ; and not from every tolerable opinion instantly run to an unreasonable and intolerable practice.

2. For a speculation considers the nature of things abstractedly from circumstances physically or metaphysically ; and yet when it comes to be reduced to practice, what, in the head, was innocent, will, upon the hand, become troublesome and criminal. If there were nothing in it but the disorder of the novelty of the disturbance of men's minds in a matter that is but probable, it were highly enough to reprove this folly. Every man's imperfect discourse or half reasons are neither fit to govern the actions of others or himself. Suppose it probable, (which the Greek church believes,) that the consecration of the blessed eucharist is not made by the words of institution, but by the prayers of the holy man that ministers, the bishop or the priest ; yet when this is reduced to practice, and that a man shall omit the words of institution or consecration, his practice is more to be reprov'd than his opinion could be possibly allowed. Some think churches not to be more sacred than other places : what degree of probability soever this can have, yet it is a huge degree of folly to act this opinion, and to choose a barn to pray in, when a church may be had.

3. For there are, in actions, besides the proper ingredients of their intrinsical lawfulness or consonancy to reason, a great many outsides and adherencies, that are considerable beyond the speculation. The want of this consideration hath done much evil in many ages ; and amongst us nothing hath been more usual than to dispute concerning a rite or sacramental, or a constitution whether it be necessary, and whether the contrary be not lawful ; and if it be found probably so as the inquirers would have it, immediately they reduced it to practice, and caused disorder and scandal, schism and uncharitableness amongst men, while they thought that christian liberty could not be preserved in the understanding, unless they disorder all things by a practical conclusion. "Videas quosdam, quibus sua libertas non videtur consistere, nisi per esum carnum die Veneris in ejus possessionem venerint ;"^g Calvin complains with reason. It is a strange folly that men will not think they have possession of christian liberty, unless they break all laws and all customs ; as if men could not prove things to be indifferent, and not obligatory, unless they certainly omit them. Christian liberty consists in the head, not in the hand ; and when we know we are free from the bondage, we may yet do the work ; and when our gracious Lord hath knocked our fetters off, we may yet think it to be fit to do what his stewards command us in order to his services. It is free to us to eat or to abstain, to contain or to marry ; but he that only marries because he would triumph and brag of his freedom, may get an imperious mistress instead of a gentle master. By the laws of christian liberty, indifferent things are permitted to my choice, and I am not under their power ; but no christian liberty says, that I am free from the power of a man, though I be from the power of the thing ; and although in speculation, this last was sufficient to be considered, yet when the opinion comes to be reduced to practice, the other also ought to have been thought upon. And besides this, it is a strange pertness and boldness of spirit, so to trust every fancy of my own, as to put the greatest interest upon it ; so to be in love with every opinion, and trilling conceit, as to value it beyond the peace of the church, and the wiser customs of the world, or the laws and practices of a wise and well instructed community of men. Nothing can make recompence for a certain change but a certain truth, with apparent usefulness in order to charity, piety, or institution.

^g Lib. iii. cap. 9. Instit.

4. These instances are in the matter of religion; it may also happen thus in the matter of justice. When Lamech perceived something stir in a bush, it was very probable it was a wild beast; but when he came to reduce his opinion to practice, he shot at it, and killed a man. And, in the matter of justice, there is a proper reason for this rule: because, in matters of right or wrong, possession is not to be altered without certainty, and therefore neither can I seize upon my goods in another man's hand, unless I be sure they are mine, though I were not otherwise restrained by human laws; neither may I expose any thing to danger, of which I am not certainly master.

5. This also is, with great caution, to be observed in the matter of chastity. Although it may be true, that, in many cases, such or such aspects or approximations may be lawful; that is, those things, so far as they are considered, have no dissonancy from reason: yet he that shall reduce this opinion to practice, must also remember, that he is to deal with flesh and blood, which will take fire, not only from permissions, but from prohibitions and restraints, and will pass instantly from lawful to unlawful: and although this may not be a sin in consideration and discourse, but is to be acquitted by the sentence of the schools and pulpit, yet when it comes to be viewed and laid before the judgment in the court of conscience, and as it was clothed with circumstances,—it will be found, that when it came to be practised, other parts or senses were employed, which cannot make such separations, but do something else.

6. But if it be asked, "To what purpose it can be, that any man should inquire of the lawfulness of such actions, which whether they be lawful or unlawful, yet may not be done?" I answer, that "the inquiry is necessary for the direct avoiding a sin in the proper matter of the instance;" for he that never inquires, sins for want of inquiry, and despises his soul, because he takes no care that it be rightly informed: but if he inquires, and be answered that the opinion is false, or the action criminal,—he finds by the answer, that it was worth his pains to ask, because by it he is taught to avoid a sin: but then, besides the question of lawful or unlawful, there are further inquiries to be made concerning fitting and unfitting, offensive or complying, safe or dangerous, abstractedly or in relation; for many things, which are lawful in themselves, become very bad to him that does them, and to him that suffers them.

RULE V.

The greater Probability destroys the less.

1. THAT is, it is not lawful "directly" to choose an opinion, that seems less probable, before that which is more probable; I say, "directly;" for if the less probable be more safe, it becomes accidentally more eligible; of which I have already^h given account, and shall add something afterward.ⁱ But without this accident, the degrees of safety are left to follow the degrees of probability. For when the safety does not depend upon the matter, it must depend upon the reasons of the inducement; and because the safety must increase consequently to the probability, it is against charity to omit that which is safer, and to choose that which is less safe.

2. For it is not in moral things as it is in natural, where a less sweet is still sweet, though not so sweet as that which is more: and the flowers of trefoil are pleasant, though honey be far more pleasant; and Phædon may be wise, though he be not so wise as Plato: because there are degrees of intension and remission in these qualities: and if we look upon two probable propositions, and consider them naturally, they are both consonant to reason in their appearances, though in several degrees. So that if Sempronius choose a less probable, before he hath learned what is more probable, he hath done well and safely. But when the two probabilities are compared, to reject that which is more probable is to do, 1. Unnaturally; 2. and unreasonably; 3. and imprudently.

(1.) Unnaturally.

3. In matters proposed to the will,—the will may choose a less good, and reject the greater; and though it is most commonly a great imperfection to do so, yet it is many times innocent; because it is in the choice of the will, to which it is propounded, and no commandment laid upon it. But in matters of opinion and intellectual notices, where there is no liberty, there is a necessity of following the natural proportions, that is, that the stronger efficient upon the same suscipient should produce the more certain and regular effect. "To think or to opine is not free," said Aristotle;^k and yet he that chooses the less probable, omitting that which is more, makes the determination by his will, not by his understanding; and, therefore, it is not an honest act or judgment of conscience, but a production of the will.

4. (2.) It is unreasonable: because in all those degrees of reasonableness, in which the less probable is excelled by that which is more probable, a man does wholly proceed without and against that reason. And why does he choose the less probable? I do not ask why he chooses the less probable opinion,—that, I mean, which is so in itself; for he may do that, because it seems more reasonable, or he knows nothing else: but I ask, why he proceeds according to a less probable conscience? that is, why does he choose that, which he believes to be less probable? for what reason does he choose that, for which he hath the least reason? If there be no reason to choose that rather than the other, then it is an unreasonable thing to do so. If there be a reason, which is not in the other, or which is not excelled or equalled by it,—then the case is altered, and this is not the less probable, but equally or more. But supposing it less probable, it is a contradiction to say a man can reasonably choose it. For if he could, there must be some greater reason in that which hath less reason; something there must be in it, whereby it can be preferred, or be more eligible, which is directly against the supposition and state of the question. The unreasonableness of this we may also perceive by the necessities of mankind, which are served by the more probable, and dis-served by that which is less. For thus judges are bound for the interest of all parties, and the reasonableness of the thing, to judge on that side where the sentence is most probable: and the physician, in prescribing medicines, must not choose that which he least confides in, and reject that which he rather trusts. And why do all the world, in their assemblies, take that sentence, which is chosen by the greater part? but because that is presumed more probable, and that which is so, ought to be followed; and why it ought not to be so in matters of our soul, is not easily to be told, unless our conscience may be governed by will rather than by reason, or that the interest of souls is wholly inconsiderable.

ⁱ Chap. 5. rule 4.

5. (3.) It is also imprudent: a man that believes a less probable, is light of heart, he is incurious of his danger, and does not use those means in order to his great end, which himself judges the most reasonable, effective, and expedient. He does as Rehoboam did, who rejected the wiser counsel of the seniors, and chose the less likely sentence of the young gallants, and does against the advice of all those rules which are prescribed us in prudent choice; and if no man ever advised another to choose that which is less reasonable,—he that does so, does against the wisdom and the interest of all the wise men in the world.

6. (4.) After all this, it is not honest to do it. For in two probables, only one of them is true; and which that is, he can only take the best way of the best reason to find out; and it is impossible he should believe that, which to him seems less likely, to be the more likely; and, therefore, so far as is in him, he chooses that which is false, and voluntarily abuses his conscience;—which, besides the folly of it, is also criminal and malicious.

7. This doctrine thus delivered was the opinion of the ancient casuists, Angelus, Sylvester, Cordubensis, Cajetan, and some others; but fiercely opposed by the latter, who are bold and confident to say, that their opinion is the common and more received, and it relies upon these reasons;

8. (1.) Because if it were unlawful to follow the less probable and to leave the greater, it is because there is danger in so doing, and no man ought to expose himself to a danger of sinning: but this pretence is nothing; for by the consent of all sides, it is lawful to follow the more probable, though it be less safe; and, therefore, all danger of sinning is not, under pain of sin, to be avoided.

9. (2.) The people are not tied to greater severity in their practices, than the doctors are in their sermons and discourses, nor yet so much: because, in these, an error is an evil principle, and apt to be of mischievous effect and dissemination; whereas an error in practice, because it is singular and circumstantiate, is also personal and limited. But the doctors may lawfully teach an opinion less probable, if they be moved to it by the authority of some more eminent person.

10. (3.) It is confessed to be lawful to follow the opinion that is more probable; but that it is lawful to leave the more probable and to follow the less, say they, is the more common and received opinion, and therefore also more probable; and therefore this opinion may be chosen and pursued; and then, because we may follow that opinion which is more probable, we may follow that which is less, because it is more probable that we may.

These objections I answer:

11. (1.) That the danger of sinning is not the only reason why we may not follow the less probable opinion; for it is not always unlawful to expose ourselves to a danger of sinning; for sometimes it is necessary that we endure a noble trial, and resist openly, and oppose an enemy, which cannot be done without danger, but is often without sin; but to leave the more probable for the less is not only a danger of sinning, but a sin directly, and beyond a danger; and if it were not more than a mere danger, it could not be a sin. For besides that this hath danger, it is a most unreasonable and a most unnatural thing, against the designs of God and the proper effects of reason. But besides, this way of arguing is neither good in logic nor in conscience. He that can answer one of my arguments, does not presently overthrow my proposition; and it is not safe to venture upon an action, because the contrary relies upon one weak leg. But then as to the instance in this argument, I answer, he that follows the more probable, though it be less safe, does not expose himself to any danger at all of sinning, because though he does not follow his greatest fears, yet he follows his greatest reason, and in that he is sometimes safest though he perceives it not: however, there is in this case no danger that is imputable to the man, that follows the best reason he hath. But this excuses not him, who follows that which seems to him to have in it less reason; for unless it be by some other intervening accident, which may alter the case, (of which I shall afterwards give account,) the less probable opinion hath in it a direct danger, and therefore to choose it, is ordinarily against charity, and, in some degree, against conscience itself.

12. (2.) To the second I answer, that both doctors and the people, though they may safely follow the less probable opinion, yet they may never directly follow a less probable conscience: that is, though a probable opinion is a sufficient guide of conscience, and it is sufficient both for publication and for practice that it is so; and, therefore, that we are not strictly tied to make a curious search into the two probables, which excels others in the degrees of reason, lest there should arise eternal scruples, perpetual restlessness and dissatisfaction in the minds of men; yet when of two probables there is an actual persuasion that this is more, and that is less, neither may the doctors teach, nor any man follow the less,—because here it is not the better opinion, but the better conscience that is despised. It may happen that what I believe more probable, is indeed less; and therefore it must be admitted to be safe to follow the less probable opinion, if it happen to stand on the fairest side of conscience,—that is, that it be better thought of than it deserves; but for the same reason it is also certain, that we must follow that which we think the more probable opinion, whether it be so or no,—because this is to be done, not for the opinion, but for conscience sake. And whereas it is said in the objection, that “a doctor may lawfully teach an opinion less probable, if he be moved to it by the authority of some more eminent person,” that is as much as to say, when the opinion which intrinsically, or at least in his private judgment, seems less probable, becomes extrinsically the more probable, he may follow either; of which in this chapter I am yet to give a more particular account; but it no ways rifles the present doctrine. Only this I add, if it were lawful and safe to follow the less probable opinion, and reject the greater, then in such questions, which are only determined by authority and sentences of wise men, it were lawful to choose any thing that any one of them permits, and every probable doctor may rescind all the laws in christendom, and expound all the precepts of the gospel in easy senses, and change discipline into liberty, and confound interests, and arm rebels against their princes, and flocks against their shepherds and prelates, and set up altar against altar, and mingle all things sacred and profane. Because if any one says it is lawful, all that have a mind to do evil things, may choose him for their guide, and his opinion for their warranty.

13. (3.) To the third, I answer, that the opinion which is more common, is not always the more probable; for it may be false and heretical: and if at any times it seems more probable, it is because men understand little or nothing of it. But then if it were so, yet this opinion, which is lately taught by the modern casuists, is not the more common, simply and absolutely; it was once the less common, and whether it be so now or no, it is hard to tell; but admit it be so, yet the community and popularity of opinion is but a degree of extrinsical probability, and is apt to persuade only in the destitution of other arguments, which because they are not wanting in this question, the trick in the objection appears trifling.

RULE VI.

When two Opinions seem equally probable, the last Determination is to be made by Accidents, Circumstances, and collateral Inducements.

1. IN the matter of this rule it is variously disputed; some affirming that the understanding must for ever remain suspended, and the action wholly omitted, as in the case of a doubting conscience. Others give leave to choose either part, as a man please, making the will to determine the understanding.

2. The first cannot be true, because while they both seem equally consonant to reason, it cannot be dishonest to choose that, which to me seems reasonable; and, therefore, the understanding may choose practically. They are like two things equally good, which alike move the will,—and the choosing of the one is not a refusing the other, when they cannot be both enjoyed: but like the taking one piece of gold, and letting the other, that is as good alone: and the action is determined by its own exercise, not by an antecedent reason.

But neither can it be, in all cases and questions, that the determination can be totally omitted; as if the question be whether this ought to be done, or ought to be let alone, and both of them seem equally probable; so also if the question be, whether it may be done, or may be let alone: in these cases, it is certain one part must be chosen; for the very suspending the act is not a suspending of the choice, the not doing it is a compliance with one of the probabilities. The lazy fellow in the apologue, that told his father he lay in bed in the morning, to hear Labour and Idleness dispute whether it were best to rise or to lie still, though he thought their arguments equally probable, yet he did not suspend his act, but, without determining, he put the sentence of Idleness in execution: and so it must be in all questions of general inquiry concerning lawful or unlawful, necessary or not necessary; the equal probability cannot infer a suspension or an equal noncompliance.

3. But neither can the second be true; for the will must not alone be admitted an arbitrator in this affair; for besides that it is of dangerous consequence to choose an opinion because we will, it is also unnatural, the will being no ingredient into the actions of understanding. The will may cause the understanding to apply a general proposition to a particular case, and produce a practical judgment by that general measure, without particular arguments in the question apportioned to the proper matter, as I before discoursed.¹ But when the understanding is wholly at dispute about the proper arguments of two propositions, if the will interposes, the error that happens, if the conclusion falls on the wrong side, is without excuse, because it is chosen; and the truth is not so safe and useful, because it came by an incompetent instrument, by that which was indifferent to this truth or the other.

Indeed, if there be no other way to determine the question, the will must do it, because there is no avoiding it; but if there be any other way, this must not be taken; but ordinarily there is.

4. The third way, therefore, is this: The determination may be made by any thing that can be added to either side "in genere rationis." As the action that is prepared, stands more ready for my circumstances; that which does me less violence, that which is more proportionable to any of those events, which in prudence are to me considerable. It is indifferent whether Paula Romana give her alms to the poor of Nicopolis, or to the poor dwelling near the monastery of Bethlehem; but because these dwelt nearer, and were more fitted for her circumstances, this was enough to turn the scale and make the determination. It is like putting on that garment that is nearest me; not this rather than the other, nor yet this because I will, but this because it is here. The use of this rule is, to prevent a probable conscience to become doubtful, and yet (as much as may be) to avoid the interposition of the will in the practical judgments of conscience.

5. This rule is to be enlarged with this addition; That if the conscience, by reason of the equal probability of two opinions so standing without any determining and deciding circumstances and accidents, cannot decree on any side neither by intrinsic nor extrinsic means, that is, neither by proper arguments nor collateral inducements, no action ought to follow: but the case of which the question is, if it can be, ought to be omitted, as in the case of a doubting conscience; which, though as I showed before, cannot happen when the question is general of lawful or unlawful, necessary or unnecessary, yet it it may happen in particular cases, as whether this thing be lawful or that, whether this is to be done or the other. It may happen that neither of them ought, and, in the present supposition, neither of them can; that is, if the man suffers his dispute to pass into a doubt.

6. In other cases, a man may safely take any course, which he finds probable, equally disputed, uncertain in itself, contrarily determined by doctors disputing with fair arguments. For in this case malice is no ingredient; and if interest be, it is therefore lawful, because it is an extrinsic motive, apt and reasonable to be considered, and chosen, and pursued by fair means, if the interest itself have no foulness in it.

7. But of all the external motives, that can have influence in the determination of a sentence between two probabilities, a relation to piety is the greatest. He that chooses this, because it is most pious, chooses his opinion out of consideration, and by the inducement of the love of God. That which causes more honour to God, that which happily engages men in holy living, that which is the most charitable, and the most useful,—that is to be preferred. But this is to be conducted with these cautions:

8. (1.) That the disposition to piety or charity be not made to contest an apparent truth. It is hugely charitable to some men, if it could be made true, to say that God is merciful to all sinners and at all times; and it is ten thousand pities to see a man made to despair upon his death-bed, upon the consideration of his past evil life; but this consideration must not, therefore, be pretended against the indispensable plain necessity of a holy life, since it is plainly revealed, that "without the pursuing of peace with all men, and holiness, no man shall see God."

9. (2.) If both the probabilities be backed and seconded by their proper relations to piety, to take one of them is not a competent way to determine the probability; but it must be wholly conducted by the efficacy of its proper reasons, or by some appendage in which one prevails above the other, when one opinion is valued because it is apt to make men fear, and not to be presumptuous; and another, because it is apt to make men hope, and never to despair; the balance is equal, and must be turned by neither of these. Scotus and Durandus, Gabriel and Almain, Medina, and some few others, taught, "That the death of Christ did not make satisfaction to God for the sins of the whole world, by the way of perfect and exact justice, but by God's gracious acceptance of it, and stipulation for it." This opinion does, indeed, advance the honour of God's mercy, but the contrary advances the dignity of Christ's suffering; and therefore it must be disputed and determined by some other instruments of persuasion. God the Father is on one side, and God the Son on the other; and though he who honours one, honours both, yet he that prefers one, may seem also to disparage both.

10. (3.) The relation to piety, and the advantages which come to it by the opinion, must not be fantastic, and relying upon a weak opinion and fond persuasion, but upon true reason or real effects. It is a common opinion among the ancients, that Anna, the mother of the blessed virgin-mother of God, had been married to three husbands successively, and that the blessed virgin was the second wife of Joseph; they who think that the second and third marriages are less perfect than the first, think it more pious to embrace the other opinions, viz. that Anna was married to none but Joachim, and that Joseph was only married to the holy Virgin Mary: but because this is to take measures of things, which God hath not given us, and to reckon purities and impurities by their own fancies, not by reason and revelation from God, therefore this fantastic relation to piety is not weight enough to carry the question along with it.

In other cases the rule holds: and by these measures our conscience can be supported in a storm, and be nourished and feasted every day, viz. if we take care:

1. That we avoid every thing that we know to be a sin, whether it be reproached by its natural impurity and unreasonableness, or, without any note of turpitude, it be directly restrained by a law.

2. That we fly every appearance of evil, or likeness of sin.^m

3. That we fly every occasion or danger of sin.ⁿ

4. That we avoid all society or communication with sin, or giving countenance and maintenance to ⁿ Matt. xxvi. 58, 69, 70. 1 Cor. vii. 5.

it. By these measures and analogies, if we limit our cases of conscience, we cannot be abused into danger and dishonour.

RULE VII.

'It is not lawful to change our practical Sentence about the same Object, while the same Probability remains.

1. A MAN may change his opinion as he sees cause, or alter the practice upon a new emergent reason; but when all things are equal without and within, a change is not to be made by the man, except it be in such cases in which no law, or vow, or duty, or the interest of a third, is concerned; that is, unless the actions be indifferent in themselves, or innocent in their circumstances, and so not properly considerable in the fears of conscience, in which cases a man's liberty is not to be prejudiced.

2. This stating of the rule does intimate the proper reasons of it, as appears in the following instances: Juan, a priest of Messina, having fasted upon the vespers of a holy day, towards the middle of the night hath a great desire to eat flesh; he, dwelling by the great church, observed that the clocks in the neighbourhood differed half an hour: he watches the first clock that struck midnight; and as soon as it had sounded, he ate his meat, because then he concluded that the ecclesiastical fasting-day was expired, and that, therefore, it was then lawful, by the laws of his church, to eat flesh. But being to consecrate the blessed eucharist the next morning, and obliged to a natural fast before the celebration of the holy sacrament, he changed his computation, and reckoned the day to begin by the later clock; so that the first day ended half an hour before the next day began, and he broke his fast because the eve was past, and yet he accounted that he was fasting, because the holy day was not begun. This was to cozen the law, and if it be translated to more material instances, the evil of it will be more apparent, but in this the unreasonableness is as visible. The like is the case of a gentleman living in the neighbourhood of Rome. Baptista Colonna happened to be in Rome on the three and twentieth of August, which is usually the eve of St. Bartholomew, but there it is kept on the twenty-fourth day: he refused to fast on the ordinary day of the vigils, as he used to do, because in Rome, where he then was, the custom was otherwise; he ate his meals, and resolved to keep it the next day: but on the morrow, being very hungry and desirous of flesh, he changed his sentence, and went out of Rome to the neighbourhood, and kept the feast of St. Bartholomew without the eves. This is to elude the duty, and to run away from the severity of the law, by trifling with the letter.

3. If the case be not complicated with a law, yet it is often infolded with the interest of a third person, and then is not to be changed, but remains invariable. Mævius promised to Sertorius to give him a servant, either Ephodius or Taranta, but resolves to give him Taranta; immediately after the resolution, Ephodius dies, and Mævius tells his friend he is disobliged, because he hath but one, and resolves not to part with Taranta, and it was in his liberty to give him either, and because he will not assign his part in this, it is wholly lost in the other; but this is unfriendly and unjust. To this sort of instance is to be reduced a caution against fraudulency in the matter of vows.

4. Vitellescus vows to fast upon the last of February, but, changing his mind, believes he may commute his fasting for alms; he resolves to break his fast, and to give a ducat to the poor. But when he had new dined, he discourses the question again, and thinks it unlawful to commute, and that he is bound to pay his vow in kind; but the fast is broken; and yet if he refuses, upon this new inquest, to pay his commutation, he is a deceiver of his own soul. For in the present case, if to commute were not lawful, yet it is certain he is not disobliged; and therefore he is to pay his commutation, because it was decreed in the time of a probable conscience; and not being in itself unlawful, though it be now supposed to be insufficient, yet it is to be accounted for, upon the stock of the first resolution of the conscience, because the state of things is not entire; and advantages are not to be taken against religion from the account and stock of our errors or delusions; and if, after this, the conscience be not at rest, it is to be quieted by other actions of repentance and amends.

5. Quest. But here also is to be inquired, whether a man may, to several persons, to serve distinct ends, in themselves lawful and honest, discourse of and persuade both the parts of a probability respectively? Titius woos Orestilla for his wife; she being sickly, and fearful lest she shall have no children, declines it; he, to persuade her, tells her it is very likely she will, and that it will cure her indisposition. But the interest of Titius is to have no children, as being already well stored, and therefore is dissuaded by them that have power over him, not to marry Orestilla. He, to answer their importunity, tells them, it is very likely Orestilla will be barren, and upon that account he marries her because she is sickly, and unlikely to become a mother. The question is, whether this be lawful?

6. I answer, (1.) If he be actually persuaded of that part of the probability when he urges it, and be changed into the other when he persuades the other, there is no question but it is as lawful to say both as one; for they are single affirmatives or negatives, and the time is but accidental to his persuasion; yesterday this, and to-morrow its contrary are alike, while in both, or each of them, his persuasion is hearty and sincere.

7. (2.) If Titius urges both parts severally, and yet remains actually persuaded but of one of them, he may urge them as probable in themselves, disputable, and of indifferent argument and inducement, for so they are. But,

8. (3.) He must not imprint them by the efficacy of his own authority and opinion, nor speak that as certain which is at most but probable, and to him seems false; for so to do is against ingenuity and christian sincerity; it is to make a lie put on the face of truth and become a craft; it is not honest nor noble, nor agreeing to the spirit of a christian, and is a direct deception on one side, and an indirect prosecution of a lawful end.

RULE VIII.

An Opinion relying upon very slender Probability is not to be followed, except in the Cases of great Necessity, or great Charity.

1. THAT it is not ordinarily to be followed is therefore certain, because it cannot be supposed, but that its contradictory hath greater probability; and either he that follows this trifle, is light of belief, or unreasonable in his choice, or his reason is to him but as eyes to an owl or bat, half-sighted and imperfect; and, at the best, not fit motive to the will. And if it could be lawful to follow every degree of probability, it were perfectly in any man's choice to do almost what he pleased, especially if he meets with an ill counsellor and a witty advocate. For, at this rate, all marriages may be dissolved, all vices excused, upon pretence of some little probable necessity; and drunkenness will be entertained as phisic, and fornication as a thing allowed by some vicious persons whose wit is better than their manners; and all books of conscience shall become patrons or "indices" of sins, and teach men what they pretend against, and there shall be no such thing as checks of conscience, because few men sin without some excuse, and it were no excuse, unless it were mingled with some little probabilities; and there were, in very many cases, no rule for conscience but a witty inventor of pretty little inducements, which rather than a man shall want, his enemy will supply to him out of his magazine of fallacies.

2. But that there are some cases, in which it is to be permitted, is therefore certain, because it may be necessary in some circumstances to do so, and in these cases the former impediments cannot intervene, because the cases of necessity or great charity, occurring but seldom, destroy all power or pretence of an easy deception. Anna Murrana was married to her near kinsman, Thomaso Grillo, but supposed him not to be so near. It was afterwards discovered to her, that the propinquity was so great, that the marriage was null and invalid: while this trouble was upon her, there happily comes a discreet old woman, who tells her, that, though it be true that Grillo's father was supposed to have lain with her mother, and that herself was born of that conjunction, yet she herself, being private to the transaction, did put another woman into the place of Murrana's mother, and that her mother was also deceived in the same manner; and though they thought they enjoyed each other, yet they were both cozened into more chaste embraces. Now upon this the question arises, whether or no Murrana may safely rely upon so slight a testimony as the saying of this woman, in a matter of so great difficulty and concernment. Here the case is favourable. Murrana is passionately endeared to Grillo, and, besides her love, hath a tender conscience, and if her marriage be separated, dies at both ends of the evil, both for the evil conjunction, and for the sad separation. This, therefore, is to be presumed security enough for her to continue in her state.

3. Like to this is that of a woman in Brescia. Her husband had been contracted to a woman of Panormo, "per verba de præsenti;" she taking her pleasure upon the sea, is, with her company, surprised by a Turk's man of war, and is reported, first to have been deflowered, and then killed. When the sorrow for this accident had boiled down, the gentleman marries a maid of Brescia, and lives with her some years; after which she hears that his first spouse was not killed, but alive and in sorrow in the isle of Malta, and therefore that herself lived in a state of adultery, because not she, but the woman in Malta, was the true wife to her husband. In this agony of spirit, a mariner comes to her house, and secretly tells her, that this woman was indeed at Malta, but lately dead, and so the impediment was removed. The question now arises, whether, upon the taking away this impediment, it be required that the persons already engaged should contract anew? That a new contract is necessary, is universally believed, and is almost certain (as in its proper place will be made to appear); for the contrary opinion is affirmed but by a very few, and relies but upon trifling motives, requiring only the consent of either of the parties as sufficient for renewing of the contract. But this being but a slender probability, ought not to govern her; she must contract anew by the consent of her husband, as well as by her own act. But now the difficulty arises; for her husband is a vicious man, and hates her, and is weary of her, and wishes her dead; and if she discover the impediment of their marriage, and that it is now taken away, and, therefore, requires him to recontract himself, that the marriage which was innocently begun, may be firm in the progression, and legally valid, and in conscience; she hath great reason to believe that he will take advantage of it, and refuse to join in a new contract. In this case, therefore, because it is necessary she should, some way or other, be relieved, it is lawful for her to follow that little probability of opinion which says, that the consent of one is sufficient for the renovation of the contract. And in this case, all the former inconveniences mentioned before do cease: and this is a case of favour in behalf of an innocent marriage, and in favour of the legitimation of children, and will prevent much evil to them both. So that although this case hath but few degrees of probability from its proper and intrinsical causes, yet by extrinsical and collateral appendages, it is grown favourable, and charitable, and reasonable: it is almost necessary, and, therefore, hath more than the little probabilities of its own account.

4. One case more happens, in which a small probability may be pursued, viz. when the understanding hath not time to consider deeply, and handle the question on all sides; then that which first offers itself, though but mean and weak, yet if it be not against a stronger argument at the same time presented, it may suffice to determine the action; for in case the determination prove to be on the wrong side, yet the ignorance is involuntary and unchosen.

These rules are concerning a conscience that is probable by intrinsical motives, that is, by reason, whether the reason be direct or collateral. But because the conscience is also probably moved in very many cases, by authority, which is an extrinsical motive, this is also to be guided and conducted.

RULE IX.

Multitude of Authors is not ever the most probable Inducement, nor doth it in all Cases make a safe and probable Conscience.

1. FOLLOWING a multitude is sometimes like the grazing or running of a herd, "Non quo eundum est, sed quo itur," "not where men ought, but where they use to go:" and therefore Justinian,^o in compiling of the body of the Roman laws, took that which was most reasonable, not that which was most followed; "Sed neque ex multitudine auctorum quod melius et æquius est judicabile: cum possit unius forsitan, et deterioris sententia multos et majores aliquâ in parte superare:" "The sentence of one, and of a meaner man, may sometimes outweigh the sayings of a multitude of greater persons." "Nam testibus se, non testimoniis crediturum rescripsit imperator." Sometimes one witness is better than twenty testimonies; that is, one man, good and pious, prudent and disinterested, can give a surer sentence than many men, more crafty and less honest. And in the Nicene council,^p when the bishops were purposing to dissolve the priests' marriages, Paphnutius did not follow the common vote, but gave them good reason for his single opinion, and they all followed him. This rule is true, and to be practised in the following cases:

2. (1.) When against the common opinion, there is a strong or a very probable reason, then the common opinion is not the more probable: because a reason is an intrinsical, proper, and apportioned motive to the conscience, but human authority, or citation of consenting authors, is but an extrinsical, accidental, and presumptive inducement, and a mere suppletory in the destitution of reason; and therefore Socrates^q said, "Veritatem in disputando, non ex teste aliquo, sed ex argumento esse ponderandam;" "Truth is to be weighed by argument, not by testimony;" and it is never otherwise, but when men are ruled by prejudice, or want reason to rule them in that particular.—"Tantum opinio præjudicata poterat, ut etiam sine ratione valeret auctoritas," said Cicero.^r And this is to be extended to all sorts of authors that are not canonical, or Divine.

"Meum propositum est antiquos legere, probare singula, retinere quæ bona sunt, et à fide ecclesiæ catholicæ non recedere," said St. Jerome: "My purpose is to read the fathers, to try all things, to retain that only which is good, and never to depart from the faith of the catholic church,"—that is, from the creeds, which all christendom professes. And at another time when himself asked leave, in discourse with St. Austin, "Patiaris me cum talibus errare," "Suffer me to go along with such great men, though to an error," it would not be permitted,^s but reason was chosen, and the authority neglected. And this course all men have followed when they pleased, and knew they might and ought.

3. (2.) When the multitude of doctors are reducible to a single, or an inconsiderable principle and beginning. Thus an opinion entertained by a whole family and order of clerks, while they either generally do follow, or think themselves bound to follow, the leading man in their own order, is to be reckoned but as a single opinion. The millenary opinion was driven to a head in Papias; the condemning unbaptized infants, in St. Austin, or St. Ambrose; and, therefore, their numerous followers are not to be reckoned into the account. For if they that follow consider it not, the case is evident; if they do, then their reasons are to be weighed, not their authority.

4. (3.) When it is notorious that there is or may be a deception in that number, by reason of some evil ingredient in the production of the opinion; as if it be certain that the opinion was taken up because it serves an interest, the same men having been on the other side when their interest was there. That it is lawful to put heretics or disagreeing persons to death, is generally taught by the followers of Calvin and Beza where they do prevail: and yet no man that lives under them, hath warrant to rely upon their authority in this question, because it is only where and when they have power; themselves having spoken against it in the days of their minority and under persecution. Under the same consideration it is, if there be any other reason against the men, not relating to their manners, but to their manner of entering or continuing in the persuasion.

5. (4.) But when these cautions are provided for, the multitude of authors hath a presumptive authority; that is, when there is no reason against the thing, nor against the men, we may presume upon the multitude of learned men in their proper faculty, that what they teach is good and innocent, and we may proceed to action accordingly. It can never make a conscience sure, but it may be innocent, because it is probable; but he that relies upon authority alone, is governed by chance. Because, if the more be against him, he is prejudiced by multitude; if the fewer be against him, yet they may be the wisest: and whether they be or not, yet a tooth-drawer may sometimes speak a better reason; and one may carry it against multitudes, and neither one nor the other can justly induce a belief, unless they have considered all things; and if I can tell who hath done so, I am myself as well able to answer as they: for he that can judge who speaks best reason, or who is most fit to be trusted in the particular, must be able in himself to consider the particulars by which that judgment is to be made; if he can and does, he hath reason within him, and needs not follow authority alone; if he cannot, then he is governed by chance, and must be in the right or in the wrong, according as it happens. For in many cases both sides have many advocates and abettors, and no man can tell who hath most, and each side says that their opinion is the most commonly received. In Venice there is a law, that any man may kill his father if he be banished; some affirm this also to be lawful where such a law is in force, and they affirm this to be the common opinion. Julius Clarius says that it is the common opinion, that though there be such a law, yet that it is unlawful to do it. It is commonly affirmed that it is lawful for such a banished person to defend himself, and, if he can, in his own defence to kill the invader. It is also a common opinion, that this is as unlawful as for a condemned man to kill his executioner; because no war can be just on both sides. It is very commonly taught, that it is lawful by fraud, by surprise, by treason, to slay the banditti. It is also very commonly taught, that this is absolutely unlawful. Sometimes that which was the common opinion an age ago, is now rarely maintained but by a few persons. It was a common opinion in Tertulian's time, that the souls departed are in outer courts, expecting the revelation of the day of the Lord; in the time of Pope Leo, and Venerable Bede, and after, it was a common opinion that they were taken into the inner courts of heaven. Sometimes the place diversifies the opinion. In Germany and France, the Romanists worship the cross with a religious worship of the lowest kind of their own distinction; but in Spain they worship it with that which they call λατρεία, or the highest kind; and this is commonly done in the several countries respectively. When this, or any thing like this shall happen, unless by reason men be determined, they may draw lots for their opinion. But since the better part is not always the greater, it is left to me to choose which I will; and it is ten to one but I call the men of my own communion or my own acquaintance, "the best;" and it is certain I cannot judge of those, with whom I do not converse.

6. For these and many other concurrent causes, the proceeding is inartificial and casual, and fit to lead the ignorant, but not the learned; and concerning the ignorant he can so little skill to choose his authority, that he must lie under that where he dwells, and where his fortune hath placed him. If he goes any whither else, he hath no excuse, because he hath no sufficient inducement; and where a man cannot go alone, it is best for him to sit still where God's providence hath placed him, and follow the guides provided by the laws of his country where he was born, or where he lives:

Πολύποδός μοι, τέκνον, ἔχων νόον ———
Τοῖσιν ἐφαρμόζων ὧν καὶ πρὸς δῆμον ἔκειαι. CLEARCH.

Conform yourself to the laws of the people with whom you must abide.

7. This is the most proper way to conduct the ignorant in their cases of conscience, in which themselves have no skill. They must believe one, and if they have a better way to proceed, let them pursue it: if they have not, this is certainly safe, because it is their best: and no man is tied to make use of better than he hath. And if they could fall into error, yet it could not be imputed to them with justice while "bonâ fide" they fall into heresy, and are honestly betrayed. This only is to be added:

8. They must make it as good as they can by inquiry, (according to their circumstances, opportunities, and possibilities,) and by prayers, and by innocent and honest purposes: for these only will secure our way, by means of God's providing. In this case there is no irregularity, because it is the best obedience which can be expressed by subordinate and weak understandings, and there is in it no danger, because the piety and the prayers of the man will obtain God's blessing upon his innocent well-meaning soul. It was well said of Hesiod,

Οὗτος μὲν πανάριστος, ὃς αὐτὸς πάντα νοήσῃ,
[Φρασσάμενος τὰ κ' ἐπειτα καὶ ἐς τέλος ἦσιν ἀμείνω·]
Ἐσθλὸς δ' αὖ κάκεινος, ὃς εὖ εἰπόντι πίσηται·
Ὅς δέ κε μήτ' αὐτὸς νοήῃ, μήτ' ἄλλου ἀκούων
Ἐν θυμῷ βάλληται, ὃδ' αὖ τ' ἀχρήσιος ἀνὴρ.

"He is the best and wisest man, who in himself knows what he ought to do, discerning what is best, and seeing unto the end of things. He also is good, who obeys the sayings of wise men, that counsel well; but he is a fool, who, not being able to advise or determine himself, refuses to be conducted by others." Here only are the evils to be complained of.

9. In some places there are a great many articles put into their public confessions, and a great many teachers of unnecessary propositions, and a great many idle and impertinent guides, who multiply questions lest themselves should seem useless; and amongst men, there are many orders, and families, and societies, all which are desirous to advance themselves, and to get disciples and reputation; and on the other side, there are very many that are idle, and rather willing to trust others, than to be troubled themselves; and many choose teachers for interest, and some have men's persons in admiration because of advantage; and princes have designs of state, and they would have religion minister to them: and there are a great many ecclesiastical laws made, and some of these pass into dogmatical propositions, and they "teach for doctrines the commandments of men;" and there are very many sects of men, and confident fools, who use to over-value their trifles, and teach them for necessary truths, and in all this incertainty of things, men are in the dark, and religion is become an art of wrangling; and the writers of controversies are oftentimes abused themselves, and oftener do abuse others; and, therefore, men are taught certain little rules to grope by, and walk in seas and upon rocks. But the things themselves are oftentimes so indifferent, and the reasons of either side so none at all, or so inconsiderable, that it comes to pass that the testimony of doctors is the guide that men choose (as they list) to follow: who because they teach contrary things cannot be followed by their authority, —and for reason, sometimes themselves have none, sometimes their disciples have not leisure to examine them, or judgment to discern them.

10. Quest. Here, therefore, is to be inquired, How shall the ignorant and vulgar people proceed in such cases, where their teachers are divided?

(1.) I answer, that in most cases it is best for them to let them alone, and let them be divided still, and to follow them in those things where they do agree; but if it be in such cases where they must declare or act on one side, let them take that which they think to be the safest, or the most pious, the most charitable, and the most useful; that so by collateral considerations they may determine that, which by the authority seems equal and indeterminable.

The collateral considerations are commonly these:

1. That which is more agreeable to the letter of Scripture.

2. That which does most agree with the purpose and design of it.

3. That which saints have practised.

4. That which whole nations have approved.

5. That which is agreeable to common life.

6. That which is best for the public.

7. That which is most for the glory of God, for the reputation of his name, and agreeing with his attributes.

8. That which is more holy.

9. That which gives least confidence to sin and sinners.

10. That which is most charitable to others.

11. That which will give least offence.

12. And (in destitution of all things else) that which is most useful to ourselves. All these are good considerations, and some of them intervene in most cases, and can be considered by most men. But where nothing of these can be interwoven in the sentence, but that the authority of the teacher is the only thing that can be considered, the following measures are to be added.

11. (2.) The authority of one man wise and good, that is, who is generally so reputed, is a probable argument, and a sufficient guide to ignorant persons in doubtful matters, where there is no clear or known revelation to the contrary. When it is his best, there is no disputing whether it be good or no: only in this case, he is so far to suspend his consent, till his guide hath considered, or answered deliberately; for if his guide vomit out answers, it is better to refuse it, till it be digested better. This hath been highly abused in some places; and permissions have been given or taken to do acts of vile impiety, or horrible danger, where by interest they were persuaded; and being desirous for some pretence to legitimate the act, or to invite their conscience to it, they have been content with the opinion of one probable doctor. Such was he, whose testimony being required in a matter of right concerning his college, swore to a thing as of his certain knowledge, of which he had no certain knowledge, but a probable conjecture; only because he had read or been told, that one doctor said it was lawful so to do. This is to suborn a sentence, and to betray a conscience; for the sentence of one doctor is only a good or a tolerable guide, when there is no better guide for us, and no reason against us; that is, it is to be used only, when it is the best, but not when it is the worst.

12. (3.) But if divers men equally wise and good speak variously in the question, and that the inquirer cannot be indifferent to both, but must resolve upon one, he is first to follow his parish-priest, rather than a stranger in the article, who is equal in all things else; his own confessor, his own bishop, or the laws and customs of his own country: because, next to reason, comes in place that which in order of things is next to it; that is, the proper advantages of the man, that is, learning and piety; and next to them succeed the accidental advantages of the man, that is, his authority and legal pre-eminence. There is no other reason for these things, but that which is in the proper and natural order of things: this is the natural method of persuasion, direct and indirect.

13. (4.) Where it can certainly be told that it is the more common, there the community of the opinion hath the advantage, and is in the same circumstance still to be preferred; because where reason is not clear and manifest, there we are to go after it, where it is more justly to be presumed. Τά τοι κάλ' ἐν πολλοῖσι κάλλιον λέγειν, said Euripides; "it is good, when good things are attested by many witnesses." ὁ μὲν πᾶσι δοκεῖ, τοῦτο εἶναι φαιμέν, said Aristotle; "that which seems so to all men, this, we say, is as it seems:" and so it is in proportion from some to many, from many to all. The sum of all these things is this: 1. God is to be preferred before man. 2. Our own reason, before the sayings of others. 3. Many, before few. 4. A few, before one. 5. Our superiors, or persons in just authority over us, before private persons. "cæteris paribus." 6. Our own, before strangers. 7. Wise men, before the ignorant. 8. The godly and well meaning, and well reputed, before men of indifferent or worse lives. That is, they must do as well and wisely as they can, and no man is obliged to do better; only this is to be observed:

14. That, in this case, it is not necessary that truth should be found, but it is highly necessary it should be searched for. It may be, it cannot be hit, but it must be aimed at; and therefore they, who are concerned, are not to be troubled and amazed at the variety of opinions that are in the world: "There must be heresies," that is, sects and differing opinions, "that they who are faithful may be approved." Now they can be approved in nothing but what is in their power, that is, diligence to inquire, and honesty in consenting; both which may very well be, and yet the man be mistaken in his particular sentence, in a matter not simply necessary, not plainly revealed.

15. There is but one thing more that concerns his duty, and that is, that in all his choices he prefer the interest of peace, and of obedience; for it ought to be a very great cause that shall warrant his dissent from authority which is appointed over him. Such causes may be, but the unskilled multitude (of whom we now treat) seldom find those causes, and seldom are able to judge of them; and therefore this rule is certain.

16. Whoever blows a trumpet, and makes a separation from the public, they who follow his authority, and know not, or understand not, a sufficient reason for the doing it, they are highly inexcusable upon this account,—because they, following the less probable authority, have no excuse for the matter of their sin; and, therefore, if it happen to be schism, or rebellion, or disobedience, or heresy in the subject-matter, it is, in the very form of it, so imputed to the consenting person: for, though great reason may be stronger than authority, yet no private authority is greater than the public. But of this I shall have further occasion to discourse in its proper place.

17. Although this is the best, and therefore a sufficient advice for the ignorant, yet for the learned and the wise, there are other considerations to be added:

(1.) They who are to teach others, may not rely upon single testimonies, or the slight probability of one doctor's opinion. This is true ordinarily and regularly, because such persons are supposed more at leisure, more instructed, better able to inquire; and to rely finally upon such single and weak supports, is to do the work of the Lord negligently.

18. (2.) If the opinion be probable upon the account of a more general reception, and be the more common, and allowed by wise and good men, they who are learned, and are to teach others, may lawfully follow the opinion, without examining the reasons for which it is by those wise men entertained. For the work of learning and inquiry is so large, and of immense extension, that it is impossible all men should perfectly inquire of all things: but some especially attend to one thing, some to another: and where men have best considered, they consider for themselves and for others too, and themselves are helped by those others, in the proper matter of their consideration. A man's life is too short, and his abilities less, and it may be, his leisure is least of all, and unable so to consider all that is fit to be believed and taught, that it will be necessary we should help one another; and the great teachers and doctors in several instances may ordinarily be relied upon without danger and inconvenience.

19. (3.) But if it happens, that, by circumstances and accidents, the particular question be drawn out into a new inquiry; if a new doubt arise, or a scandal be feared, or the division of men's minds in the new inquest, then the reasons must be inquired into, and the authority is not sufficient.

1. Because the authority is, by the new doubt, made less probable, and is part of the question: and therefore ought not to be presumed right in its own case.

2. Because the duty of teachers is, by this accident, determined to this special inquiry, and called from their inactive rest, and implicit belief; because the inquirers upon this new account will be determined by nothing but by that reason that shall pretend strongest; and therefore they who are thus called upon, can no other ways "give answer to them that ask." It was the universal doctrine of the church of God for many ages, even for fourteen centuries of years, that episcopacy is of Divine or apostolical institution: it was a sufficient warranty for a parish-priest to teach that doctrine to his parishioners, because he found it taught every where, and questioned no where. But when afterwards this long prescribing truth came to be questioned, and reasons and Scriptures pretended and offered against it, and a schism likely to be commenced upon it, it is not sufficient then to rely upon the bare word of those excellent men, who are able to prove it, as it is supposed; but they who are to teach others, must first be instructed themselves in the particular arguments of probation, that, according to the precepts apostolical, they may "render a reason of the hope that is in them,"^t and may be able "both to exhort and to convince the gainsayers;"^u who, because they expressly decline the authority, and the weight of testimony, cannot be convinced but by reason, and the way of their own proceeding.

RULE X.

In following the Authority of Men, no Rule can be antecedently given for the Choice of the Persons, but the Choice is wholly to be conducted by Prudence, and according to the Subject-matter.

1. ANCIENT writers are more venerable, modern writers are more knowing; they might be better witnesses, but these are better judges. Antiquity did teach the millenary opinion; that infants were to be communicated, and that without baptism they were damned to the flames of hell; that angels are corporeal; that the souls of saints did not see God before doomsday; that sins once pardoned did return again upon case of relapse; that persons baptized by heretics were to be rebaptized; and they expounded Scripture, in places innumerable, otherwise than they are at this day, by men of all persuasions: and therefore no company of men will consent that in all cases the fathers are rather to be followed than their successors. They lived in the infancy of christianity, and we in the elder ages; they practised more and knew less, we know more and practise less; passion is for younger years, and for beginning of things: wisdom is by experience, and age, and progression. They were highly to be valued, because, in more imperfect notices, they had the more perfect piety; we are highly to be re-proved, that in better discourses we have a most imperfect life, and an unactive religion; they in their cases of conscience took the safest part, but the moderns have chosen the most probable. It was the opinion of the ancient divines and lawyers, that every man is bound to make restitution of all that which he gains by play, by cards and dice, and all such sports as are forbidden by human laws. The modern casuists, indeed, do often reprove the whole process, and condemn the gamesters in most circumstances; but do not believe them tied to restitution, but to penance only. The first is the safer and the severer way; but the latter hath greater reasons, as will appear in its own place. All contracts of usury were generally condemned in the foregoing ages of the church; of late, not only the merchant, but the priest, and the friar, puts out money to increase, and think themselves innocent; and although commonly it happens, that our ignorance and fears represent one opinion to be safe, when the other is more reasonable,—yet, because men will be fearful, and very often are ignorant and idle in their inquiries, there will still remain this advantage to either side, that one is wiser, and the other, in his ignorance, is the more secure, because he does more than he needs. And therefore it often happens, that though we call the ancient writers fathers, yet we use them like children, and think ourselves men rather than them; which is affirmed by some, but in effect practised by every man when he pleases.

^t 1 Pet. iii. 15.

2. But if any one shall choose the later writers, he must first choose his interest and his side; I mean, if he chooses to follow any upon their authority or reputation, without consideration of their reasons, then he must first choose his side, for he can never choose his side by the men, because most authors are of it themselves by interest. But because all probability is wholly derived from reason, every authority hath its degree of probability, according as it can be presumed or known to rely upon reason. Now in this both the ancients and the moderns excel each other respectively. “The ancients were nearer to the fountains apostolical; their stream was less puddled; their thread was not fine, but plain and strong; they were troubled with fewer heresies; they were not so wittily mistaken as we have been since; they had better and more firm tradition; they had passed through fewer changes, and had been blended with fewer interests; they were united under one prince, and consequently were not forced to bend their doctrines to the hostile and opposite designs of fighting and crafty kings; their questions were concerning the biggest articles of religion, and therefore such in which they could have more certainty and less deception; their piety was great, their devotion high and pregnant, their discipline regular and sincere, their lives honest, their hearts simple, their zeal was for souls, and the blood of the martyrs made the church irriguous, and the church was then a garden of the fairest flowers, it did daily germinate with blessings from heaven, and saints sprung up, and one saint could know more of the secrets of Christ’s kingdom, the mysteriousness of godly wisdom, than a hundred disputing sophisters; and, above all, the church of Rome was then holy and orthodox, humble and charitable, her authority dwelt in the house of its birth; that is, in the advantages of an excellent faith and a holy life; to which the advantages of an accidental authority being added by the imperial seat, she was made able to do all the good she desired, and she desired all that she ought; and the greatness of this advantage we can best judge by feeling those sad effects which have made christendom to groan, since the pope became a temporal prince, and hath possessed the rights of some kings, and hath invaded more, and pretends to all, and is become the great fable, and the great comet of christendom, useless and supreme, high and good for nothing, in respect of what he was at first, and still might have been, if he had severely judged the interest of Jesus Christ to have been his own.”

3. But then, on the other side, the modern writers have considered all the arguments and reasons of the ancients: they can more easily add, than their fathers could find out; they can retain their perfect issues, and leave the other upon their hands; and what was begun in conjecture, can either be brought to knowledge, or remanded into the lot and portion of deceptions. “Omnibus enim hic locus feliciter se dedit, et qui præcesserunt, non præripuisse mihi videntur quæ dici poterant, sed aperuisse. Conditiō optima ultimi est,” said Seneca; “They who went before us, have not prevented us, but opened a door, that we may enter into the recesses of truth; he that comes last, hath the best advantage in the inquiry:”—“Multum egerunt qui ante nos fuerunt, sed non peregrerunt: multum adhuc restat operis, multumque restabit: nec ulli nato post mille secula præcludetur occasio aliquid adhuc adjiciendi;”^a “They who went before us, have done wisely and well in their generations, but they have not done all; much work remains behind, and he that lives a thousand ages hence, shall not complain that there are no hidden truths fit for him to inquire after.” There are more worlds to conquer:

*Multa dies variusque labor mutabilis ævi
Retulit in melius.—— VIRG.*

Every day brings a new light, and by hearty and wise labour we improve what our fathers espied, when they peeped through the crevices. Every art, every manufacture was improved,

*Venimus ad summum fortunæ: pingimus, atque
Psallimus, et luctamur Achivis doctius unctis.
HORAT. Ep. ii. 1.*

The Romans outdid the Greeks, even in things which they were taught in Athens, or on their hills of sport. But to proceed in the comparing the ages: these latter ages have more heresies, but the former had more dangerous; and, although the primitive piety was high and exemplary, yet the effect of that was, that in matters of practice they were more to be followed, but not in questions of speculation; these later ages are indeed diseased, like children that have the rickets, but their upper parts do swell, and their heads are bigger; “sagaciores in dogmate, nequiores in fide;” and if they could be abstracted from the mixtures of interest, and the engagement of their party, they are in many things better able to teach the people, than the ancients; that is, they are best able to guide, but not always safest to be followed. If all circumstances were equal, that is, if the later ages were united, and governed, and disinterested, there is no question but they are the best instructors; there is certainly more certain notice of things, and better expositions of Scriptures now than formerly; but because he that is to rely upon the authority of his guide, cannot choose by reasons, he can hardly tell now where to find them upon that account. There is more gold now than before, but it is more allayed in the running, or so hidden in heaps of tinsel, that when men are best pleased now-a-days, they are most commonly cozened.

4. If a man will take the middle ages, he may if he will, and that is all that can be said in it; for there can be no reason for it, but much against it. "Ego sane veteres veneror, et tantis nominibus semper assurgo.^x Verum inter externa ætatem esse scio, omniaque non esse apud majores meliora;" "I, for my part, do more reverence the ancients, and use to rise up" and bow my head to such reverend names as St. Irenæus, St. Cyprian, Origen, St. Jerome, St. Austin; but I reckon age amongst things that are without, it enters not into the constitution of truth; and this I know, that amongst these ancients, not all their sayings are the best. And on the other side, although antiquity is a gentle prejudice, and hath some authority, though no certainty or infallibility; so I know that novelty is a harder prejudice, and brings along with it no authority, but yet it is not a certain condemnation.

Quod si tam Graiis novitas invisa fuisset
Quam nobis, quid nunc esset vetus? aut quid haberet
Quod legeret tereretque viritum publicus usus?
HORAT. lib. ii. ep. 1.

If our fathers in religion had refused every exposition of Scripture that was new, we should by this time have had nothing old; but in this case what Martial said of friendships, we may say of truths:

Nec me, quod novus sum, tibi recuses:
Omnes hoc veteres tui sodales fuerunt.
Tu tantum inspicere, qui novus paratur,
An possit fieri vetus sodalis.

Refuse nothing only because it is new.^y For that which pretends to age now, was once in infancy; only see if this new thing be fit to be entertained, and kept till it be old; that is, as the thing is in itself, not as it is in age, so it is to be valued, and so also are the men; for in this, as in all the other, the subject-matter will help forward to the choice of a guide.

1. The analogy of faith.
2. The piety of a proposition.
3. The safety of it, and its immunity from sin; these are right measures to guess at an article, but these are more intrinsical, and sometimes so difficult, that they cannot be made use of but by those who can judge of reason, and less need to be conducted by authority. But for these other who are wholly to be led by the power and sentence of their guide, besides what hath been already advised;—

4. The faculty and profession of men is much to be regarded; as that we trust divines in matters proper to their cognizance, and lawyers in their faculty; which advice is to be conducted by these measures:—

When the Authority of Divines is to be preferred, when that of Lawyers.

5. (1.) The whole duty of a christian consists in the laws of faith or religion, of sobriety, and of justice; and it is so great a work, that it is no more than needs, that all the orders of wise and learned men should conduct and minister to it. But some portions of our duty are personal, and some are relative, some are private, and some are public; some are limited by the laws of God only, and some also by the laws of men; some are directed by nature, some by use and experience; and to some of these portions contemplative men can give best assistances, and the men of the world and business can give best help in the other necessities. Now, because divines are therefore, in many degrees, separate from an active life, that they may with leisure attend to the conduct of things spiritual, and are chosen as the ministers of mercy, and the great reconcilers of the world, and therefore are forbidden to intermeddle in questions of blood: and because the affairs of the world, in many instances, are so entangled, so unconducting to the affairs of the spirit, so stubborn, that they are hardly to be managed by a meek person, carried on by so much violence, that they are not to be rescued from being injurious but by a violence that is greater but more just; and because the interests of men are complicated and difficult, defended by customs, preserved in records, secured by sentences of judges, and yet admit variety by so many accidents, circumstances, and considerations, as will require the attendance of one whole sort of men, and, of all men in the world, divines are the least fit to be employed in such troubles and contracts, such violences and oppositions, and yet they are so necessary, that without them the government of the world would be infinitely disordered, it is requisite that these should be permitted to a distinct profession. In particular matters of justice, ordinarily, and regularly, lawyers are the most competent judges: in matters of religion and sobriety, the office of divines is so wholly or principally employed, that it ought to be chosen for our guide.

6. (2.) In matters of justice, which are to be conducted by general rules, theology is the best conductress; and the lawyers' skill is but subservient and ministering. The reason for both is the same, because all the general measures of justice are the laws of God, and therefore cognizable by the ministers of religion; but because these general measures, like a great river into little streams, are deduced into little rivulets and particularities by the laws and customs, by the sentences and agreements of men, therefore they must slip from the hands of the spiritual man to the prudent and secular. The divine can condemn all injustice, murder, incest, injurious dealing; but whether all homicide be murder, all marriage of kindred be incest, or taking that which another man possesses be injustice,—must be determined by laws, and the learned in them; and though divines may rule all these cases as well as any of the long robe, yet it is by their prudence, and skill in law, not by the proper notices of theology.

7. (3.) But justice is like a knife, and hath a back and an edge, and there is a letter and a spirit in all laws, and justice itself is to be conducted with piety, and there are modalities, and measures, and manners of doing or suffering in human intercourses, and many things are just which are not necessary, and there are excesses and rigours in justice which are to be moderated, and there are evil and entangling circumstances which make several instances to jostle one another; and one must be served first, and another must stay its season; and in paying money there is an “ordo ad animam,” and justice is to be done for God’s sake, and at some times and in some circumstances for charity’s sake; and the law compels to pay him first that requires first; but in conscience, justice is oftentimes to be administered with other measures: so that as prudence sometimes must be called to counsel in the conduct of piety, so must piety oftentimes lead in justice, and justice itself must be sanctified by the word of God and prayer, and will then go on towards heaven, when both robes, like paranymphs attending a virgin in the solemnities of her marriage, helped to lead and to adorn her.

8. (4.) Sometimes human laws and Divine stand face to face and oppose each other, not only in the direct sanction, (which does not often happen,) but very often in the execution. Sometimes obedience to a human law will destroy charity, sometimes justice is against piety, sometimes piety seems less consistent with religion. The church is poor, our parents are necessitous, the fabrics of the houses of prayer are ruinous, and we are not able to make supplies to all these; here what is just, and what is duty,—not the law, but theology will determine. I owe Sempronius a small sum of money; it happens that he comes to demand it when the gatherers of gabels are present to demand an equal sum for taxes; here I am to ask my confessor, not my lawyer, whether of the two must be served, since I cannot pay both: and in this case the ministers of religion are the guards and defensatives of her interest; concerning which, for the present, I only insert this caution; that when religion and justice are in contest, the ministers of religion are not always bound to give sentence on the side of religion, but to consider which is the more necessary, and where the present duty stands; for sometimes it is absolutely necessary to do justice, and actions of particular religion must attend their season. But then even justice turns into religion, and when it does so, theology must conduct her into action.

9. (5.) When the question concerns an interest, relative to either faculty, it is hard choosing the authority on either part, for one judges for itself, and the other against his adversary; that is, in effect they are both judges in their own cause. It is notorious in the church of Rome, where the canonists say, that a canon lawyer is to be preferred before a divine in elections to bishoprics; but you must think, the divines say that themselves are far the fitter. The canonists say that predial tithes are due by Divine right. The divines say they are only due by positive constitution. The secret of that is, because most of the divines that write books, are monks and friars, and such which are no friends to parishes, that the pope may be allowed to have power to take tithes from the parish priests, and give them to the monasteries; which he could not do, if by Divine right they were annexed to their proper cures. Amongst us the tables are turned, and the lawyers take the friars’ part, and the divines generally affirm the Divine right of tithes. Concerning which it is to be considered, that though the authority of either part is not of itself sufficient to determine a doubting person, and where interest is apparent, the person persuading loses much of his authority, yet the proposition itself ought not to lose any thing. The interest appearing is no more warrant to disbelieve the proposition, than it is to believe it. In this case there is interest on both sides, and, therefore, as to that the case is indifferent. The way to proceed is to consider the proper instruments of persuasion, and because a truth is not the worse for serving his ends that teaches it, I am to attend to his arguments without any prejudice. But if I am not able to judge of the reasons, but must be led by authority, the presumption lies for the divines: I am to believe them rather than the lawyers in such questions, because there is some religion in doing so, and a relation to God, for whose sake it is, that I choose to obey their proposition.

10. (6.) Where, by the favour of princes or commonwealths, any matters of justice are reserved to ecclesiastical cognizance, in those affairs the authority of divines is to be preferred before that of lawyers, because the personal capacities of the men being equal in all things, the divines are exercised in the same matters, and, therefore, are both concerned and able, instructed and engaged, and though the lawyers are to be supposed honest, and just, and wise, yet all that also is to be supposed in divines, with some advantages of religion, and tenderness which is bred in them by their perpetual conversation with the things of God. But in all things he comes the nearest to a sure way of being guided, who does his best, and with greatest honesty of heart and simplicity of pious desires, to be truly informed. It was well said of Socrates, “An placeant Deo, quæ feci, nescio; hoc certo scio, me sedulo hoc egisse ut placerent.” “The things which I have done, whether they please God or no, I know not; but this I know assuredly, that I did earnestly desire and diligently take care that they might please him.”

11. If the question be concerning other divisions of men, as of schoolmen and casuists, critics or preachers, the answer can be no other, but that in all faculties relating to any parts of religion, as there are very wise men, and very weak men, so there are some to be preferred in each faculty, if we could find out who they are: but this prelation is relative to the men, not to the faculty, if they were rightly handled. For the several faculties are nothing but the proper portion of matter assigned to the consideration of an order of men, in a proper method: but the great end is the same, only the means of persuading the same truth is different. But in the church of Rome they are made several trades, and have distinct principles, and serve special and disunited ends and interests; and therefore, which of them is to be preferred, as to the making a probable opinion, is just to be answered, as if we should ask which is best of feathers or wool; they both of them have their excellencies in order to warmth, and yet if you offer to swallow them down, they will infallibly choke you.

RULE XI.

He that hath given Assent to one part of a probable Opinion, may lawfully depose that Conscience and that Opinion upon Confidence of the Sentence of another.

1. THE curate of St. Martin being sent for to do his last offices to a dying man, finds him speechless, but yet giving signs of his penitence, as beating his breasts, weeping and groaning, holding up his hands, and looking pitifully, and in a penitent posture: the curate having read it, disputed whether such a person may be absolved, concerning whose repentance he can have no other testimony but mute signs, which may be produced by other causes, and finding arguments on both sides, consents to the negative as probable; and yet finding learned persons there who are of another opinion, lays aside the practices of his own opinion, and in compliance with the other, absolves the sick man. One that was present, and understood the whole process, inquires whether he did well or no, as supposing that to do against his own opinion is to do against his conscience; and a man's own conscience "is more to him than ten watchmen that keep a city."

2. In answer to this, it is to be considered there is a double consent to a proposition, the one is direct, the other a reflex; the first is directly terminated upon the honesty or dishonesty of the object, the other upon the manner of it, and modality. For instance, the curate does not directly consent to that part of the question which he hath chosen, as that which he will finally rely upon, but he consents to it only as a thing that is probable. If he were fully persuaded of the article as a thing certain, or as necessary, (though of itself it be not so,)—or if he thinks it is not to be altered, then to do against his opinion were to do against his conscience, because the opinion were passed the region of speculation and ineffective notion, and is become a rule and immediate measure of action. But because he believes it only probable, that is, such, in which he is not certain, but may be deceived, and may use liberty,—he may as well choose that part of the probability which derives from the reputation and abilities of other men, as that which proceeds from considerations of those little intrinsic arguments which moved his assent lightly, like a breath upon the waters, or the smile of an undiscerning infant. His own opinion is well enough concerning the honesty of the object; but yet he that chooses the other part, may make an honest election; for his own opinion reflecting upon itself, not going beyond the stage of uncertainty and probability, does openly challenge its own right of choosing another part: the conscience is no ways entangled and determined, but so chooses that it may choose again, if she sees cause for it,—a cause in the particular case, which she espied not in the abstracted question.

3. For he may prudently suppose, that in what he is not certainly persuaded, another may be wiser and know more, and can judge surer: and if he have reason to think so, it may be a greater reason than that is, by which himself did choose his own opinion and part of the probability; and he may have reason to think meanly of himself, and he may remember sad stories of his frequent deception, and be conscious of his own unaptness to pass an honest unbiassed sentence, and hath no reason to trust himself in matters of proper interest or relation.

4. This rule hath no other variety in it but that it be managed by these cautions.

1. That the man upon whom we rely, be neither ignorant nor vicious, so far as we can judge, and so far as relates to the present question, that is, that he be a person fit to be a guide of others.

2. That relying on others proceed not out of idleness, and impatience to inquire ourselves.

3. That the opinion of the other be not chosen because it better serves my ends or humour, but upon the preceding grounds of humility and mean opinion of myself, and great opinion of the other.

4. That it be only against his own probable persuasion so known, so considered, not against a sure conscience; that is, that it be in such a matter, in which the assent is but imperfect, and relying upon unsure inducements. For then he may as honestly trust the other's prudence as his own weakness, the other's leisure and consideration, as his own want of time and aptness to consider: and since the actions of most men in the world are conducted by the wit of others in very many things, and of all men in some things, it cannot be imprudence to take a guide to direct the conscience in what it is not sufficiently instructed by its own provisions.

5. If the intercourse happen between the superior and the inferior, the liberty of changing our part of the probability is confirmed by a want of liberty to dissent. The subject may change his opinion, because he must obey wherever it is possible that he should; and that is in this case: in which it is not only true that the opinion is probable in itself, but that it and its contrary be both apprehended as probably true, and safely practicable. For then there is no excuse to the man, and the conscience of the article cannot be pretended against the conscience of obedience; and if it be lawful to obey, it is necessary to obey. "Hoc amo quod possum qualibet ire via;" every man loves his liberty, but this liberty does engage our obedience; we might not obey our superior if God had engaged us in the contrary; but we may, when we are persuaded that the contrary opinion is probable, that is, conformable to reason, and fit enough to guide him that is not finally determined in his conscience to the contrary. For if it could be otherwise, then there were nothing to be given to authority; for in equal probabilities, it is likely, if I choose one part, I am determined by a little thing, by a trifle, by a chance, by a humour; and if I be weighed down by never such a trifle, yet I am determined to the choice of one side, and it will be but an evil portion to authority, if it cannot be permitted to outweigh a humour, and a chance; an ignorant confidence, or a vain presumption; and although it will be hard sometimes for a man to be convinced of the vanity of his argument, yet when his opinion is not only speculatively but practically probable, that is, when it is considered only as probable, and the contrary altogether, or almost as well thought of, the arguments of the present persuasion are confessed to be but little, because they neither persuade, nor abuse beyond a probability; and therefore, in this case, to outface authority is without pretence, as much as it is without warrant. And this is affirmed by St. Austin^z in the case of soldiers under a king, taking pay in a cause which either is just, or that they are not sure it is unjust. "Ergo vir justus, si forte etiam sub rege, homine sacrilego, militet, recte potest, illo jubente, bellare, si vice pacis ordinem servis, a quod sibi jubetur, vel non esse contra Dei præceptum certum est, vel utrum sit, certum non est."

6. But if the intercourse happen between a physician and a patient, it is made to differ. For, 1. A physician may not leave a certain way, and take an uncertain, in the question of life or health. In matters of mere opinion, the very persuasion and probability of assent is warrant enough for the man, and the effect is innocent; but when so great an interest is engaged, the man becomes faster bound by the stricter ties of charity. It was a complaint that Pliny made of physicians in his time, "Discunt periculis nostris, et experientiam per mortes agunt, medicoque tantum occidisse impunitas summa est." It is hard that a physician should grow wiser at no cheaper rate than the deaths of many patients. Now to do the thing directly is intolerable, but to do that which is not our best, and which is not safe, when we have by us that which is safe, and which we know is useful, is directly against charity, and justice, and prudence, and the faithfulness of a good man.

But, 2. When a physician hath no better, he may take that course which is probable, for that is his best; he cannot be required to more, and he is excused, because he is required to minister. And this is yet more certain, if the sick person shall die without physic: but it is a venture whether the medicament may prevail for his cure or no. For then all the hazard is on the favourable side, and if it fails, the event is no worse; and it is charity to offer at a cure that is uncertainly good, but is certainly not evil.

3. When the opinions are on both sides probable, he may take that which is in any sense safer, or in any degree, or by any means more probable, that is, for the community of the opinion, or the advantage it hath by the learning and reputation of them that hold it; so that he may leave his own opinion which is overcome by the greater argument, or the greater authority of another, though both the authority be less than that which binds, and the argument less than that which is certain.

RULE XII.

He that inquires of several Doctors until he find one answering according to his Mind, cannot by that Inquiry make his Conscience safe; but according to the Subject-matter, and other Circumstances, he may.

1. SAINT Paul remarks the folly of such men who "heap up teachers of their own," that is, such who preach what they desire, and declare things lawful which God never made so; and he that hath entertained an opinion, and is in love with it, and will seek out for a kind and an indulgent nurse for it, cannot ordinarily be the more secure for the opinion of his guide, because the intrinsic motive of his assent is not his guide, but his own purposes and predisposing thoughts and resolutions; and the getting of a learned man to say so, is but an artifice to quiet the spirit, and make it rest in the deception, if it so happens to be. This determination from without may, possibly, add a fantastic peace, but no moment to the honesty of the persuasion or conscience; because the conscience was not ready to rely upon the authority, but resolved to go somewhere else for an authority, if here it could not be had: and therefore the conscience could not be made probable by the authority, because the resolution of the conscience was antecedent to it.

2. This is true ordinarily and regularly, and there are usually many appendant deceptions; as an impatient desire to have that true which I desire, a willingness to be deceived, a resolution to bring our ends about, a consequent using means of being pleased and cozened, a concealing some circumstances and a false stating of the question, which is an infallible sign of an evil conscience, and a mind resolved upon the conclusion, desirous of a security or sleepy quietness, and incurious of truth. But yet there are some cases in which this changing of guides and inquiries is not only innocent, but an instrument of a just confidence.

3. (1.) When the inquirer hath very probable inducements for his opinion, and remains really unsatisfied in the answers and accounts of the first doctors.

(2.) When he hath an indifferency to any part that may appear true, but it falls out that nothing does seem true to him, but what he hath already entertained.

^z Lib. xxii. contra Faustum, cap. 71. et habetur cap. Quid culpatur, 23. qu. 1.

(3.) When the assent to our own proposition is determined, so as to avoid a real doubt or perplexity, but a scruple remains, that is, some little degrees of confidence are wanting, which cannot be better supplied than by an extrinsical argument, the authority of a wise man.

(4.) When the inquiring person is under a weakness and temptation, and wants some to apply his own notices to him, and to make them operative and persuasive upon his spirit; as it happens to very many men always, and to all men sometimes.

(5.) When the case is favourable and apt for pity and relief, as in the dangers of despair; then the inquirer not only may, but ought to go, till he find a person that can speak comfort to him upon true grounds of Scripture and revelation.

(6.) When the purpose of the inquirer is to be landed upon any virtue, and pious state of life or design, he may receive his encouragement and final determination from him, whom he chooses for his opinion's sake, and conformity to his own pious intentions.

4. The reason of these exceptions is this: Because the matter being just, favourable, and innocent, the man goes right,—and by being confirmed in his way, receives no detriment to his soul or his duty; and because they are tendencies to duty, it is to be presumed that the inquirer intends honestly and piously: and now since the way is secure, and the person well intending, if the instrument of establishing this good course were very incompetent, it might be an imperfection in nature, but not in morality.

RULE XIII.

He that is asked concerning a Case that is on either side probable, may answer against his own Opinion, if the contrary be probable and more safe, or more expedient and favourable.

1. THE reason is, because he that holds an opinion which himself believes only to be probable, knows also there is no necessity in counselling it to another, because it is not certainly true; and he may rather counsel the contrary to another than follow it himself, because himself is already determined, which the other is not, but is indifferent.

2. But why he should rather do so than counsel his own opinion, there is no reason in the thing, but something relating to the person inquiring; as if the opinion which he maintains not, be more agreeable with the other circumstances and necessities. Codrus inquires if he be tied to restitution of all the fruits of a field, which he held in a dubious title. The curate thinks it to be a probable opinion, that he is bound; but because Codrus is poor, or apt to break the bridle of religion if it holds him too hard, he may counsel him according to the opinion of them, that affirm that he is not bound to restitution. If he be asked what his own opinion is, he must not speak contrary to it: but when the question only is asked in order to a resolution, he may point to go that way, where by his own sentence he may be safe, and by reason of the other's necessities he may be more advantaged. The reason of this is, because when two opinions are equally probable, the scales are turned by piety, or charity, or any good thing that is of collateral regard,—and, therefore, makes a greater degree of artificial probability, and is, in such cases, sufficient for determination. For in direct reason, the case is equal, and in the indirect, there is great advantage on the side of charity, or accidental necessity, or compliance with any fair and just interest. Christian religion is the best natured institution in the world.

The like case it is, when the opinion of the curate is such, that the inquirer will probably abuse it to licentiousness and evil mistake; for then the curate may prudently conceal his own sentence, and borrow his brother's candle to light a person that is in danger.

RULE XIV.

When the Guide of Souls is of a different Opinion from his Charge or Penitent, he is not bound to exact Conformity to his own Opinion that is but probable, but may proceed according to the Conscience of the Penitent.

1. THAT is, supposing the opinion of the penitent to be probable, and that he did the action “bonâ fide,” and as an act commendable or permitted; he is not to be troubled with what is past, lest that be turned into a scruple which was no sin, and lest the curate judge unrighteous judgment, and prescribe afflictions for that for which God shall never call him to judgment; for in this case it is, that no man can be the judge of another man's conscience.

2. But if the opinion of the penitent be certainly false, or the parent, or protector, or the occasion of a sin, the guide of his soul must not comply at all with it, but discover the error and the danger. He that kills his brother because he is zealous in another opinion, and thinks he does God good service, must not be permitted in his erring conscience, and criminal persuasion; for the matter hath altered the case, and in the relations of duty, the error is always vincible, and, therefore, intolerable: and, therefore, Peter Lombard's mother, upon her death-bed, was admonished to confess her sin in having three children by illegal mixtures, though she was foolishly persuaded it was no sin, because her sons did prove to be such excellent persons, and instruments of Divine glory.

RULE XV.

The Sentence and Arbitrement of a prudent and good man, though it be of itself but probable, yet is more than a probable Warranty to Actions otherwise undeterminable.

“Sicut vir prudens eam definierit,” is the great measure, which Aristotle and all the moral philosophers assign to very many cases and questions. If two cases, that seem equally probable, have in them different degrees of safety, that the safest is to be chosen is certain; but oftentimes the sentence and opinion of a good man is the only rule by which we judge concerning safety. When piety and religion are in competition for our present attendance, sometimes piety to our parents is to be preferred, sometimes an action of religion in its own season; but what portion of our services is to be allowed to the one and the other, is, "sicut vir prudens defini-erit," "according as a good and a prudent man shall determine." To bury the dead is good, to relieve the living poor is ordinarily better; but yet there was a time in which there was a proper season for that, and not for this; and our blessed Saviour commended Mary's devotion and choice in so doing; but when we also may do one or the other, depends upon circumstances and accidents, which are not immediately the subject of laws, but of prudent consideration. Human laws bind the consciences of their subjects, but yet give place to just and charitable causes; but which are competent and sufficient is not expressly and minutely declared, but is to be defined by the moderation and prudence of a good man. That we are to be careful in the conduct of our temporal affairs, in paying of our debts, in making provisions for our children, is certain and confessed: but besides the general measures and limits of carefulness described by our blessed Saviour, our earnestness of prosecution, our acts of provision and labour, are to be esteemed regular or irregular by the sentence of a wise and a good man. The significations of love to our children and nearest relatives, the measures of compliance with the fashions of the world, the degrees of ornament or neglect in clothing, intention of our actions and passions, and their degrees, the use, and necessities, and pretences for omissions in good things, and generally all the accidental appendages of action, are determinable only this way: and a probability is enough to determine us; but that this is the way of introducing the probability is upon this reason; because next to the provision of laws, stands the man who is obedient to laws and understands them, and next to the reason of the law stands the analogy and proportion of those laws; and, therefore, this is the next best to the laws, it stands nearest to reason, is the best guide that is left us, and therefore a proper measure of conscience in the destitution of that which is most proper.

There are many other rules concerning the exercise of a probable conscience, in the cases and questions of kings and priests, of advocates and judges, in matters of sacraments and government, which are to be referred to the place of their proper matter; but this is also to be determined by the rules here assigned, and have no particular consideration, except what merely relates to the matter.

CHAPTER V.

OF A DOUBTFUL CONSCIENCE.

RULE I.

A doubtful Conscience assents to neither Side of the Question, and brings no direct Obligation.

1. THE conscience being, in its proper operations, positive and practical; when it is neither, it is not properly and directly conscience; and because it binds to obedience by its determination and assent, and its consequent inclining the will when the understanding is not determined nor the will inclined, there can no action follow, but a total suspension of action is its proper consequent.

2. Upon this there is only a reflex act of conscience and understanding; for by considering that our conscience is doubtful and indeterminable, we are obliged to suspend our action; but then this is the act, not of a doubtful but of a right conscience, because in this we are certain, and right, and determined: so that a doubtful conscience is but an equivocal and improper conscience; like an unresolved will, or an artist with his hands bound behind him; that is, the man hath a conscience, but it is then in chains and fetters, and he wears a hood upon his eye, and his arm in a string, and is only to be taught how to cut the knot, and to do some little things of advantage, or security to his intermedial state of impediment; but a doubtful conscience can be no rule of human actions.

3. But yet some collateral and indirect obligations are passed upon the man by that state of infelicity, according to the nature of the doubt.

4. In order to which, doubts are considered, either as relating to the law, or as relating to matters of fact, viz. whether such a thing be lawful or not? or whether I did such an action or no, by which I am bound to restitution or repentance?

5. Doubts also are negative or positive, that is, they are still upon us, because there is no means to determine the understanding; as no man can ever be resolved whether the number of the stars be even or odd; when is the precise minute in which a man first comes to the use of reason: and this is called a negative doubt. The positive enters by the indifferency of the arguments, and their equal weight on both sides : as if it be doubted, whether the souls departed enjoy the beatific vision before the day of judgment ? whether residence on a benefice be an indispensable precept, or in what cases it obliges not ? whether ecclesiastical persons be bound, by justice or by charity, to give all that they can prudently spare to the poor ? These are positive doubts, because there are many arguments on either side.

6. The negative doubt is either metaphysical or moral, or it is only a suspicion ; that is, these are several degrees of such a doubt, for the determination of which there is no sufficient instrument.

7. Lastly, sometimes a doubt is placed only in the understanding, without any other effect but the trouble of thoughts ; and then for method's sake, and right understanding of the rules of practice, it is called a speculative doubt. Sometimes this doubt passes on to the conscience, and hath influence upon the action or event ; so as to be an impediment to it, or the spoil of it, that is, so as to cause that it shall not be done, or, if it be done, that it becomes a sin : and this is called a practical doubt.

According to these distinctions, the following rules are useful in order to practice.

RULE II.

A negative Doubt neither binds to Action, nor Inquiry, nor Repentance ; but it binds only to Caution and Observance.

1. (1.) "THAT it binds not to action," I affirm upon the same ground, by which the same is affirmed concerning all doubting consciences. It binds from action ; for whatsoever is done with a doubting conscience, (that is, without faith, or fulness of persuasion that it is lawful to do it,) is a sin. St. Paul gave us the rule, "Whatsoever is not of faith, is sin."^a "Quod dubitas, nē feceris," said Cicero. For if we do it with a doubting conscience, we do it without our rule, which is the dictate of our conscience ; and since no action is indifferent between lawful and unlawful, (though between good and bad there may,) to do without our rule of lawful and permitted is to do against it, even that which is not permitted, and therefore is unlawful. Add to this,

2. He that does not know whether it be lawful or no, does that which he is not sure but it may be forbidden by God, and displeasing to him : and to do that which I know not but may grieve my friend, or trouble him, cannot consent with my love to him ; and therefore every act of a doubting conscience is against charity. In the question of lawful or unlawful, not to know it to be lawful, is to enter upon it with a mind willing to admit the unlawful ; it is all one to be in the dark, as to be without a candle or a star, and either of them is as bad, as full of ignorance and obscurity, as if we shut our eyes, or put the candle out. When, therefore, it happens that our conscience doubts whether such an act be a sin or no, a good man will be sure not to sin ; but in that case, and while the doubt remains, he can have no security, but by not doing it.

2. (2.) "It binds not to inquiry," because there is no competent means to find out a resolution ; for that is the state of the question, that is the definition of a negative doubt. Fabiola doubts whether in her childhood she did ever take God's name in vain ; and although she be bound to inquire in all the reasonable and remembered parts of her life, because of them she may find some records, and in that case the doubt is not negative ; yet of the state of childhood she cannot be obliged to make inquiry, because there was then no law, no register, no court kept, no judgment, no choice ; that is, she cannot be obliged to an effect that is impossible, and to an act that is to no purpose.

3. (3.) "It binds not to repentance : " In case she fears exceedingly, supposing this still to be a negative doubt, that is, such a one, for the proper resolution of which there are no competent arguments or instruments. Fabiola not knowing whether she did or no, and it being impossible afterwards to find it out, Fabiola is not tied to ask forgiveness for the blasphemies of her childhood ; for no obligation can come from what is not, or cannot be, known.

4. This is to be understood to be true of that sort of negative doubt which is called metaphysical, when there is no possibility of knowing ; as it is impossible to know what little pretty fantasm made us to smile when we hanged upon our mothers' breasts ; and the doubt is only founded upon the possibility that the thing might have been, though now it be impossible to find out whether it was or no. It is possible that being a child I might laugh at Scripture, or mock an apostle ; but if this could bring an obligation to an act of repentance, then the same obligation passes upon all men in all actions and periods of their lives, for all things, and in all cases in which they do not remember all, or did not observe every circumstance, or did not consider every minute, or weigh every degree. For in every thing there is a possibility that I might have done something very ill.

5. But there is a negative doubt which is called morally negative ; that is, when there is no way of being readily and clearly determined, but yet the doubt is founded upon some light conjecture, and no more. I was tempted,—or I had an opportunity,—or an evil thought came cross me,—and I know my own infirmity ; and this, according to the degrees of the conjecture, can oblige us to a general and conditional repentance : thus, if I did amiss, God of his mercy impute it not unto me. "I know not, my conscience does not accuse me," so St. Paul, "but I am not hereby justified ; God is greater than my conscience." By this set the words of St. John, and they will determine the case : "If our hearts condemn us not, then have we peace towards God ;" that is, the doubt in this matter ought to be laid down, if our hearts do not pass sentence against us ; but not so wholly but that we may provide against a danger not actually felt : we ought to be peaceful, but not too confident, when there is any probability of error and deception. The peace is warranted by St. John; the wariness is exemplified in St. Paul.

6. (4.) "It doth bind to caution and observance." Every thing does so, where either there is a danger, or any is suspected, or any is possible, or any ever was: and therefore, for this there needs no peculiar reason, only according to the approach of the negative doubt to any degrees of its being positive; that is, to a probability that it is as we doubt, the observance ought to be stricter, and the caution more severe, which happens in that imperfect kind of imperfection, in suspicion, which is but the image of doubting.

7. For there is yet another sort of doubting, which may be called a privative doubt. Titius is invited to eat with one of another communion. First he checks at it, but because he knows no reason against it, nor indeed did ever dispute, or hear the question disputed, whether it be lawful or no, he goes. The question is, whether he did well or no?

8. Concerning which the case is evident, that whatsoever is not of faith is sin, that is, if it be not done with a persuasion that it is lawful. But if a man be persuaded that he may lawfully do any thing against which he knows no law, no commandment, no reason; this is not a doubting conscience, but a probable, and therefore need not to abate the action. But if this also turn into a doubt, the case is altered. For he that thinks he may not do it, or doubts whether he may or no do a thing for which he hath no command, or no positive and affirmative warrant, and that it is no sufficient reason or warrant for the doing it that he knows nothing against it, unless he also have something for it;—this man, thus persuaded or abused, may not proceed to action. For in this case he hath nothing for it, and one great thing against it, even this proposition,—that a thing is not to be done in such a case,—which is the case of a privative doubt. But for the thing itself, the next rule gives an account of it.

RULE III.

A privative Doubt cannot of itself hinder a Man from acting what he is moved to by an extrinsic Argument, or Inducement that is in itself prudent or innocent.

1. (1.) "It cannot of itself hinder," that is, abstracting from the circumstance of accidental doubting or not doubting. The reason is, because there being no law against it by which he is actually ruled, and no reason appearing in defiance of it, that is, there being no intrinsical dissuasive, the conscience is only left to be conducted or persuaded by the extrinsical.

2. For all actions are left indifferent, till, by a superinduced law, they are restrained; which superinduced law wants its publication, if inculpably I have no notice of it in my conscience. But this is to be allowed with this caution: That this entering upon actions, against which we know no reason or law, be not sudden, and violent, and careless, like the rushing of a horse into a battle without consideration; but that we consider according to our strength, and to our time, whether there be any reasons for or against the act in question, and if we find none, let us make none; that is, let us not, by our unreasonable and impertinent doubting, place a snare for our own feet there, where none is placed by the prohibition.

3. (2.) If it be a matter that concerns the interest of another, let us always be the more wary, and remember, if there be nothing against it, there must be something for it either in the matter or in the manner, either in justice or in charity, or at least by the securities of the safer part, by which, if we find no reward, yet we are sure to find indemnity.

4. This whole advice is of great use in the circumstances of the duty that concerns the married pairs; in which the doctors of cases of conscience have spoken what they please, and in many things wholly by chance or fancy: and the holy state of marriage ought to be rescued from many of their snares and intricacies by which they have troubled it, as will appear when I shall speak to the rules of that affair.

RULE IV.

In Doubts of Right, or Law, we are always bound to inquire; but in Doubts of Fact not always.

1. THE reason is, because ignorance of our duty is always a sin; and, therefore, when we are in a perceived, discernible state of danger, he that refuses to inquire after his duty, does not desire to do it.

2. In matters of fact we are bound ordinarily to inquire, because we must not be ignorant of the state of our consciences, and what obligation there is to restitution, or repentance,—which the more particular it is, the more perfect it is. But this I say, that though ordinarily it be true that we are obliged, yet in some cases it may happen, that it is safer to trust the event of things with a general repentance, than that the conscience of some men be tempted with a particular notice of the fact.

3. (1.) This happens in those that are weak-hearted, soft, and apt to every impression in too deep a regard. A Castilian gentleman being new recovered from the sad effects of a melancholy spirit, and an affrighting conscience, and being entertained by some that waited on him with sports and innocent pastimes to divert his scaring thoughts; he with his company shot many arrows in a public field at rovers: at that time there was a man killed, whether by his arrows or no, he knew not, and is forbidden to inquire; and his case had in it reason enough to warrant the advice. The knowledge of it could not have done him so much good, as it would have done him hurt; and it was better he should be permitted to a doubting than to a despairing conscience, as in his case it was too likely to have happened. It is better to be suspected than to be seen.

4. (2.) This also is so to be advised, when the inquiry into the doubt of fact may be prejudicial to a third person. A priest going to the West Indies, by misfortune wounds one of his company, whom, with much trouble and sorrow, he leaves to be cured of his hurt, but passes on to his voyage, which he finished at a huge distance from the place of his misfortune. The merchants come the next year that way, and he is unwilling to inquire concerning his sick friend; desirous he was to know good of him, but infinitely fearful lest he be dead: consulting, therefore, with his superior in the case, was directed not to inquire, upon this account; because, if the man were dead, the priest would be irregular, and a whole parish unprovided for, and left without rites and sacraments, and public offices, which then and there could not easily be supplied.

5. But in matters of right or duty, inquiry must be made, ever, when the question is of the lawfulness or unlawfulness of what is to be done; because we enter upon danger, and despise our own safety, and are careless of our duty, and not zealous for God, nor yet subjects of conscience, or of the Spirit of God, if we do not well inquire of an action we are to do, whether it be good or bad. But when the act is done, and done with an actual persuasion that it was lawful, the conscience of that person is not easily to be disturbed, which is to be understood with these cautions:

6. (1.) When the question was probable on either side, and, at the time of action, was chosen with its just measures and provisions; then, although the complice or partner of the act do change his opinion, and think himself bound to repent, yet he is not bound to trouble the other. Antony, a gentleman of Parma, being in love with Maria de Rupe, being moved with great interests of his person, and a great necessity, consummates his marriage before publication, they both of them being persuaded that it is lawful. He afterwards changes his opinion, thinks it a sin, and repents and begs pardon; but being also in doubt whether he ought to tell his wife of it, was advised to the contrary, upon this, amongst many other concurrent reasons, because what was innocently done, cannot be condemned in that in which it was innocent: for the man himself ought to be sorrowful for his being deceived, (if he thinks he was,) but he cannot be tied to repent of the act, which, supposing his then present persuasion, was lawful, because done according to a probable conscience: and, therefore, much less ought he to disturb the peace of his wife, whose persuasion remains the same as at first. What was not a sin at first, cannot, in that individual act, become a sin afterwards.

7. (2.) This is also to be understood, when the act leaves no evil effect, or hath done no hurt to a third person; but if it do, then my peace is not to be bought at the expense of another's evil. No man is to be made better or left so, by another's detriment; and, therefore, if a child were begotten in that unripe and hasty consummation, and that child should be declared bastard, then the peace is to be disturbed, and the inquiry on all hands to be curious and busy, because in all such cases there is something of duty for the future concerned in it; sometimes restitution, but always repentance in particular.

8. (3.) This is also true when the fact that is past is not introductive of more and new instances; for if it was the wrong side of the probability which was chosen, and the same kind of action is to return often,—there the conscience, though heartily persuaded, must be awakened from its security by him that believes it to be a sin that was done, and then the interested party must inquire: the reason of this is, because this concerns the future, and all the world, when they enter upon action, must inquire anew, when they have reason to doubt anew, and they may be called upon, and must be better informed by them that can and are concerned. For the honour of God and the interest of his service is in this case concerned, which in the other is not, when it only relates to a single and a past action, which was then lawful, and, therefore, will not afterwards be imputed.

9. (4.) When the person interested does of himself doubt whether the past act was lawful or not, and desires to be satisfied, and that there will be no evil effect in the alteration of his persuasion, then it is fit he be complied with in that which he judges to be for the interest of his soul, for this is certainly the better; the other way of concealing and not inquiring being only permitted in some cases, and with so many cautions and reservations as are before expressed.

RULE V.

In Doubts the safer Part is to be chosen.

1. WHEN the conscience is doubtful, neither part can be chosen till the doubt be laid down; but to choose the safer part is an extrinsical means instrumental to the deposition of the doubt, and changing the conscience from doubtful to probable. This rule, therefore, does properly belong to the probable conscience: for that the conscience is positively doubtful is but accidental to the question and appendant to the person. For the reasons on either side make the conscience probable, unless fear, or some other accident, make the man not able to rest on either side. For in matters of conscience, it is as hard to find a case so equally probable that a man shall find nothing without or within to determine him, as it is to find that which the philosophers call “temperamentum ad pondus,” “a constitution so equal that no part shall excel the other.” For if there were nothing in the things to distinguish them, yet in the man there is a natural propensity, which will make him love one sort of arguments more than another. What can be more indifferent than to see two dogs fight? and yet no man sees their cruelty, but he wishes better to one than to another: and although no opinions are so very even, yet if they were, the man hath an acquisite, or else a natural bias, or something of contingency that will determine him: and if the conscience remains undetermined, so that he may not, or dare not, venture upon either part, it is certainly a disease, or a direct infirmity. And because such persons can do nothing at all, till their doubtful is changed into a probable conscience, this discourse must relate to that conscience that is probable, though, in compliance with the usual ways of speaking, I have placed it here.

2. (1.) The rule, therefore, is to be understood to be good advice, but not necessary in all cases. For when the contrary opinion is the more probable, and this the more safe, to do this is a prudent compliance, either with a timorous or with an ignorant conscience; it is always an effect of piety, and a strong will to good, but very often an effect of a weak understanding; that is, such an one which is inclined to scruple, and dares not trust the truth of his proposition, or God with his soul in the pursuance of it. And, indeed, sometimes there is in this some little suspicion of the event of things, which must needs reflect upon the goodness of God, under whom we fancy we cannot be so safe by pursuing that rule and guide that he hath given us, that is, the best reason, and the fairest inducement, as we may be by relying upon the sureness of the matter. Indeed, we ourselves are so wholly immersed in matter that we are conducted by it, and its relations, in very many things: but we may as well rely upon formalities and spiritual securities (if we understood them) as upon the material; and it is as safe to rely upon the surer side of reason as upon the surer side of the thing. Now that which is the more probable, hath the same advantage in constituting a conscience formally safe, as the other less probable but surer side hath for the making the conscience safe materially.

3. (2.) If the conscience be probable, and so evenly weighed that the determination on either side is difficult, then the safer side is ordinarily to be chosen, because that helps to outweigh and determine the scale; that is, when reason and the proper motives of the question are not sufficient to determine it, let auxiliaries be taken from without; and if the conscience be not made securer by its rule, let it be made safe by the material. It is just as the building of a house. If the architect be not wise and knowing how to secure the fabric by rules of art, and advantages of complication, and the contexture of parts, let him support it with pillars great and massy; for if the other be wanting, these will sustain the roof sure enough, but with some rudeness in the thing, and imperfection in the whole.

4. (3.) If to that, which is the surer side, there be a great inconvenience consequent, the avoiding of that inconvenience, being laid on the opposite even part, will outweigh the consideration of the safety. Quintus Milo commands his servant Anfidius, whom he had taken for the teaching grammar and rhetoric to his children, that he would learn the trade of a shoemaker. Anfidius doubts whether his master, Quintus Milo, hath power to command him to do that which was no part of the employment for which he was entertained, and yet because the thing is of itself lawful and honest, he considers it is the safest course for him to obey, for, certainly, in so doing he sins not: and thus far he is bound, and was in the right. But if to learn that mean trade will dishonour and disable him, make him a fool and contemptible, and ruin his hopes and his interests when he leaves the service of Milo, the servant is not tied to follow that which is more safe, but that which is more charitable and prudent: "In dubiis juris tutior pars sequenda est, et obedire teneor, si commode possim," was the rule: because the reason, abstractedly considered, makes the question safe on either side, as the determination happens; and the avoiding an intolerable inconvenience is as considerable as the accidental security, and in many cases more complying with charity; because in a question, in which the conscience is probable, there is a great safety without taking in the advantage of a safe matter, by the proper efficacy and influence of the reason making a probable and an honest conscience: but then when the safety is provided fairly for otherways, and for the most part sufficiently, and the inconvenience on the other side is not provided for; in all such cases we must leave that, which is materially sure, for the choice of that, which, in its formality, is equally sure, and, in its matter, more charitable. A little child came to my door for alms, of whom I was told he was run from his mother's house, and his own honest employment; but in his wandering he was almost starved: I found that, if I relieved him, he would not return to his mother; if I did not relieve him, he would not be able. I considered, that indeed his soul's interest were more to be regarded and secured than his body, and his sin rather to be prevented than his sickness, and, therefore, not to relieve him seemed at first the greater charity. But when I weighed against these considerations, that his sin is uncertain, and future, and arbitrary, but his need is certain, and present, and natural; that he may choose whether he will sin or no, but cannot, in the present case, choose whether he will perish or no: that if he be not relieved, he dies in his sin, but many things may intervene to reform his vicious inclination; that the natural necessity is extreme, but that he will sin is no way necessary, and hath in it no degrees of unavoidable necessity; and above all, that if he abuses my relief to evil purposes, which I intended not, it is his fault, not mine; but the question being concerning my duty, not his, and that to relieve him is my duty, and not his, and that therefore, if I do not relieve him, the sin is also mine, and not his; and that, by bidding of him to do his duty, I acquit myself on one side, but by bidding him to be warm and fed, I cannot be acquitted on the other; I took that side, which was at least equally sure, and certainly more charitable.

5. This also happens in the matter of justice very often. It is the surer side in many cases to restore, and is a testimony of an honest mind, that, to secure its eternal interest, will quit the temporal. But if to restore will undo a man, and the case is indifferent, or at least probable that he is not bound, then it is not necessary to restore, though to restore be the surer side; and if the interest of a third person, as of wife, or children, be also involved in the question, then the inquiring person is bound not to restore. Because in the present case there is a certain uncharitableness, and but an uncertain justice, that is, a duty certainly omitted, for the securing of another that is not certain.

6. (4.) When the more probable is also the more safe, there is no question but the safer is to be chosen. For so the conscience is made the more sure both materially and formally; that is, by the better reason, and the more advantageous matter; and he that does otherwise, exposes himself to an evident danger of sinning, having nothing to outbalance either the direct reason or the accidental safety.

7. (5.) Sometimes it happens, that what is safe in one regard is dangerous in another, and on each side of the probability there is a danger and a safety. Vittoria Columbina, a Venetian lady, was married to five magnificoes successively; and they all being dead, and she left very rich, young, and tempted to a sixth marriage, advises with her confessor whether or no she may lawfully do it? He tells her, that it is not only probable, but certain that she may; but it were better if she kept her widowhood, and after so much sense of mortality, retire to religion. But that he may determine her case with more certainty, she tells him, she had once resolved with herself to live a widow, but finds she shall not be free from temptation in that state, and desires him to tell her if she may lawfully marry notwithstanding that resolution, which now to be something altered he perceives by her question. He answers, that it is the surest course to determine for chastity and abstinence, her state of widowhood being more certainly pleasing than the other. But then she hints her temptation, and asks, if some sure course is not to be taken for her being secured in that point too? This arrests his thoughts upon a new consideration, but the result is this:

8. (1.) When there are two securities to be provided for, one of the thing, and the other of the person; that of the person is first to be provided for. It is the safer part of the question to determine on the side of chastity or virginity, or widowhood; but this may be the unsafer side to the person, who, if he suffers temptation, is to be provided for by that answer which gives him remedy and ease.

9. (2.) But if it happens that there is danger on either side to the person, that is the surer side which provides against that temptation, which is strongest and most imminent, and which, if it prevails, is of the worst consequence.

10. (3.) This is also to be understood in those cases when temporal life is offered in question against the danger of a sin. Michael Verinus, a young gentleman of Spain, by reason of his living a single life, was pressed with so great inconvenience, that he fell into a lingering and dangerous sickness. The physicians advise him to use his remedy, though he be not married, and being it was in order to his health, which was not else to be recovered, they presumed it lawful, or did not care whether it were or no; but, however, they advise him to it. He doubts of it, and dares not be uncharitable and die for want of remedy, if he might have it, and yet dares not commit an act of uncleanness; but finding on either hand a sin threatening him, and if he flies from a lion he meets a bear,—or is told that a bear is in the way: he at last flies from the evil beast that stood before him, and chooses that way which was evidently the safest, not to his health, but to his salvation; not to his body, but his soul; and chose rather to die, than to do that which he was certainly persuaded to be a sin, and of the other he was not so sure.

Ne se pollueret, maluit ille mori.*

In other things, the prudence of a guide must be his only rule.

The sum is this:

11. (1.) If the doubt be equal and the danger equal, the doubt must be laid aside, or there can be no action consequent: and for the danger, if you choose one, you may choose either, for there is no difference; a dagger or a sword is all one to him that must die by one.

12. (2.) If the doubt be unequal and the danger equal, the resolution must be on that side where there is the most confidence; that is, where the less cause of doubting is apprehended, as if I have but enough to give one alms, and I see two ready to perish, and I can relieve but one; the danger is equal, for "pasce fame morientem; si non pavisti, occidisti," said St. Ambrose; but one is my friend, and the other is a stranger; in this case the doubt is unequal, and I ought to prefer my friend.

13. (3.) If the danger be unequal and the doubt equal, the resolution must be made in compliance with our safety. For there is nothing to weigh down in the doubt, yet there is something to weigh down in the danger, and that is sufficient.

14. (4.) If the doubt be unequal and the danger unequal, there we must take the least danger, though on the least side of the probability, because there can no degree of sin be consented to; and, therefore, when by our own fault or infelicity we must be forced to fall upon one, we must take the less, by the same reason for which we are to refuse all that we can. Mævius Caligarius, a Roman gentleman, and newly converted to christianity, observes that his friend Agricola was pursued by his enemies unto death, and was by them asked concerning him, whether he were in his house or no. He knew he was, but knows also that if he confesses it, he shall die. He doubts whether it be lawful to lie to save his friend's life or no, and cannot resolve whether it be or no, but inclines rather to think it is not lawful. But he considers if it be lawful, then he is guilty of his friend's death, who refused to save him at an innocent charge. But if it be not lawful, he does but tell an officious lie; so long as the doubt remains, he must rather venture upon an uncertain sin in the officious lie, than the uncertain but greater sin of homicide. These are the cases in which the danger is on both sides.

15. (5.) But if there be danger on one side only, and a doubt on both sides, there is no question but that side is to be chosen, where there is no danger; unless the doubt on one side be contemptible and inconsiderable, and the other not so.

RULE VI.

It is lawful for the Conscience to proceed to Action against a Doubt that is merely speculative.

1. IN a sure conscience the speculative and the practical are the same in certain consequence, as I have already^b proved in its own place; but in a doubting conscience the case is differing. For though it be ordinarily true here also, that he that doubts speculatively does also doubt practically; as if he doubts concerning all usurious contracts, whether it be lawful or no to use any, he doubts all concerning this which himself uses, if it be usurious. But because there may intervene a special case, and that which is true in general may be altered in the particular, it may happen that he may be certain and determined in the particular when he is not so in the general; that is, when the case is special, by privilege, or exemption, or the ceasing of the reason, or by any other special case he may think himself acquitted, when yet the action is culpable in its whole kind.

2. But by a speculative doubt sometimes is meant not the general, but the question abstracted from circumstances; and in this it sometimes happens, that though the conscience doubt concerning the question, yet it does not doubt concerning the practice. Titius is possessed of a field on which he entered by inheritance, and wholly without fraud and violence; but yet upon some supervening notices he afterwards doubts, whether the field be his own by a just title; but because he is informed by his confessor and others on whom he does and may rely, that possession is a collateral title, and that what he so possesses, he may still dwell upon, till it be certain that it is not his own; he rests at quiet in his mind, because possession is stronger than his doubt, though it cannot prevail against demonstration.

3. Mary of Rheims, the wife of a soldier, is told by his captain that her husband was killed at the battle of Pavia; after her year of mourning was expired she marries again to a citizen of Rheims, and cohabits with him two years; after which she is told that her first husband escaped to Tarentum, and there lives in obscurity. Upon this she doubts whether the citizen be really her husband or no; yet living with him he demands her to pay her conjugal duty; she inquires whether during this doubt she may or no, and is answered affirmatively upon the same grounds: the citizen is in possession of the marriage, and this is not to be disturbed by a doubt, but by a certainty, especially since the doubt is but a speculative doubt, not a practical. For it is no good argument to say, I doubt whether this man be my husband or no, therefore if I consent to him I commit adultery; for the presumption lying upon the possessor, though his title be dubious, yet his possession is not, and either of them both are to have a portion in the effect, and therefore the certain possession in a dubious title is to be preferred before a dubious title without possession, and therefore this kind of doubt ought not to hinder the effect of the present duty. For in this case it is not true; the antecedent is doubtful, therefore so is the consequent. For as out of falsehood truth may come, so out of doubts may come certainty. I see a great way off Father Grimaldi moving his lips; I suppose he is disputing, whom yet I was told not to be alive. I argue thus: "He disputes, therefore he is not dead." The consequent is certain, but the antecedent doubtful; so it is in the present case. I doubt whether this woman be and ought to be my wife, but because she is legally so, and so reputed, and in possession, I do infer that therefore I must pay my duty to her, till it be certain that she is not my wife. For though I doubt of the person whether or no she be my wife,—yet I am certain, or I may be certain of this, that he that approaches to her who is in possession of marriage, may do it lawfully; he only does fornicate who approaches to her, of whom I am certain that she is not my wife. But if of this proposition also I doubt, the doubt is practical,—and I may not do it, till by some means the doubt be resolved or laid aside. But so long as it is a question speculative, the action may be determinate and lawful, and introduced upon many accounts.

4. For the fuller manifestation of which secret, because it is of great concernment, and hath influence upon the conscience in many great actions and intercourses of human society, it is remarkable that we cannot argue thus; this man is not "bonæ fidei possessor," a possessor by a just faith, therefore he possesses it "mala fide," by an unjust: so neither does this follow,—this man possesses it not with an evil faith, therefore he possesses it with a good faith. It does neither way follow negatively. But this consequence is good; he is a possessor by a good faith, therefore he does not possess it by an evil. Or, he is a possessor by an evil faith, therefore he does not possess it by a good; it follows either way affirmatively. The reason of the difference is this; if it be good, it cannot be bad,—and if it be bad, it cannot be good; if it be one, it cannot be the other; but it may happen that it may be neither good nor bad, for there is a medium or a third between good and bad faith or honesty of possession; and this consists in a speculative doubt, by which the possessor doubts whether that which is in his hands, be in his right, or belongs to him or to another; and that he who so doubts hath neither good nor bad faith, is expressed by the gloss.^c

5. The consequent of which is this, that because that he who so doubts, is not "bonæ fidei possessor,"

^a Ch. 2. Rule 3.

^c In lib. i. C. de acq. poss. gl. in lib. ii. ff. pro solut. et gl. in lib. iii. sect. generaliter ff. de acq. poss.

therefore he cannot from thence begin to prescribe or to acquire a just title, because of the rule of the law, "Quod ab initio non valuit, progressu temporis valere non debet;" and it cannot by time get strength to walk, which enters into the world without feet; now the doubting conscience is but a lame supporter. But yet because such a conscience, which only hath this speculative doubt, is not "malæ fidei possessor,"—therefore he may lawfully still retain the possession, till the contrary be evicted.

There is this only to be added, that although prescription or other ways of just title cannot begin with a doubting conscience, yet if it entered with a thoroughly persuaded conscience, it may go on, though it be disquieted by a supervening doubt. The reason is, because it having lawful parents of its birth and first production, cannot be killed and destroyed by a suit at law; it began well, and therefore had just principles of its progression; and whatsoever hath the first advantage of just and reasonable, is always to be so presumed till the contrary be proved; a doubt, therefore, may make the man unquiet, and tie him to inquire, but cannot interrupt the possession or the beginning and growing title. Besides the reason, this sentence is confirmed by the concurring testimonies of Bartolus, Imola, Sylvester, Fêlinus, Balbus, and Johannes Hannibal, under their titles, "de præscriptionibus et usucapionibus."

6. There are some accidental hardnesses to the conscience which are innocent, and because, besides the even measures of good and evil by lawful and unlawful, there are some paths chalked out to us by necessities, by conveniences, by presumptions, by securities, and other indefinite aims at things, which can sometimes weigh down the best of our imperfect conjectures in some obscure cases, we may as well walk by the light of the stars, and better too, than to walk quite in the dark: and not only the sun is appointed to rule the day, but there are the moon and the stars to govern the night: plain and easy rules make a sure conscience, but the doubtful and the dark must be content with a less light.

7. For, unlearned men are oftentimes beset with the arguments of a talking man, which they cannot answer, but create a speculative doubt, and such as destroys all the certainty of evidence which they had; but if they should not stick to their own conclusion in despite of all the objections, by a certainty of adhesion, they might be disturbed in every thing, and confident in nothing, and might, if they met with a heretic, be fooled out of their religion, and quit the most material parts of their belief. And even the learned have, in many articles, a presumptive assent to their propositions; and if they be made to doubt in their understanding by the opposition of an adversary, they are not instantly to change their practice, but to inquire further. For if after every such doubting, their practice must be insecure or criminal, they might be forced to a lightness greater than that of Egyptian priests: and some men can believe well and dispute ill, but yet their faith must not change at the argument of every sophister. In these cases the practice is made secure by a collateral light, and he is defended from change by reputation and custom, by fear of scandal and the tie of laws, and by many other indirect instruments of determination, which although they cannot outwit the contrary arguments, yet they ought to outweigh the doubt, and guide the will, and rule the conscience in such cases.

8. There is nothing but a weak man may doubt of; but if he be well, he must not change his foot, till it be made certain to him that he is deceived; let him consider what he please, and determine at leisure; let him be swift to hear, but slow to speak, and slower yet in declaring, by his action and changed course, that his doubt hath prevailed upon him. I knew a scholar once, who was a man of a quick apprehension, and easy to receive an objection; who when he read the Roman doctors, was very much of their opinion, and as much against them when he read their adversaries, but kept himself to the religion of his country, concerning which at all times he remembered that there were rare arguments and answers respectively, though he could not then think upon them. There are temptations of faith and opinion, and they are to be resisted sometimes by indirect ways of proceeding, and artifices of the spirit; and sometimes men in sickness are afflicted with doubting and trembling consciences, but yet are supported only with general remembrances; they consider that there are comforts, and excellent promises, and instruments of hope, and wise and holy sayings by which they were nursed up to that height of strength, that they are now able to fight in the dark: if the speculative doubting conscience should always prevail in practice, the ignorant might be abused and miserable in all things, and the learned in most.

RULE VII.

Every Dictate and Judgment of the Conscience, though it be little and less material, is sufficient and may be made use of for the Deposition of a Doubt.

1. EVERY little reason is not sufficient to guide the will, or to make an honest or a probable conscience, as I have proved in the foregoing chapter;^d but in a doubting conscience, that is, where there are seemingly great reasons of either side, and the conscience not able to determine between them, but hangs like a needle between two loadstones, and can go to neither, because it equally inclines to both; there it is, that any little dictate, that can come on one side and turn the scale, is to be admitted to counsel and to action; for a doubt is a disease in conscience, like an irresolution in action, and is therefore to be removed at any just rate, and any excuse taken rather than have it permitted. For even to wash in Jordan may cure a leprosy, and a glass of wine may ease the infirmities of the stomach; and he is too ceremonious in the matter of life and death, that stands upon punctilios with nature, and will not be cured but by rich medicines. For in a doubting conscience the immediate cure is not to choose right, that is the remedy in an erring conscience; but when the disease or evil is doubting or suspension, the remedy is determination; and to effect this, whatsoever is sufficient may be chosen and used.

2. Every conscience that proceeds probably, proceeds honestly, unless by a greater probability it be engaged against the less; now to make a conscience that is probable yet even more probable, a little advantage is sufficient; which is to be understood with these cautions:

3. (1.) When the doubt is equal and the danger alike on either side, then a smaller superfetation of argument will do the work, that is, cure the doubting; for though a little argument is not alone a ground for the action of a wise man, yet a little overplus of reason will take off this calamity of irresolution and trepidation; it is not enough to outweigh any danger, but it can, with the portion of the equal measures which stand on its own side, by its little weight cast the balance.

4. (2.) This is not so easily to be admitted when the judgment of the man is discernibly and perceivably little and not to be trusted, for then the superaddition that is made by him to any part of the doubt, may be as wholly inconsiderable as the doubt itself is troublesome; and though this may make the doubt to be laid aside, as it will also determine such a man in the whole traverse of the question, yet it is the worst remedy of the doubt, and an insufficient introduction of the probability. In this case the doubt is to be laid aside by the advice and authority of some person fit to lead him, rather than by the confidence of his own little superadded impertinency. For indeed it is not good to have the sacredness of a conscience governed by weakness and contingency.

5. (3.) When the doubting person is inconstant, let him not speedily act what he lightly determines by the sudden intervening humour; for he that changes quickly, judges lightly, but fancies strongly, and acts passionately, and repents speedily and often; therefore let such a man when he perceives his own infirmity stop at the gates of action, lest the laying down one doubt multiply many, and he become more miserable in his remedy than in his sickness.

6. In pursuance of this rule it is to be taken care of, that fear be not mistaken for doubt; for there is oftentimes a doubt no where but in the will, and the more slender and weak the judgment is, oftentimes the fear is greater; and sometimes they fear because they fear, and not because they have reason; when therefore the doubt does not rely upon such a reason as can be formed into an argument and discourse, but is an unreasonable trouble, and an infinite nothing; the doubt ought directly to be laid aside, for it is no way considerable, but only that it is a considerable trouble.

RULE VIII.

When two Precepts contrary to each other meet together about the same Question, that is to be preferred which binds most.

1. This rule we learn from the eighth council of Toledo;^e “Ubi periculi necessitas compulerit, id debemus resolvere, quod minori nexu noscitur obligari. Quid autem ex his levius, quidve sit gravius, pietatis acumine investigemus.” The council instances in the keeping wicked oaths and promises; where though the instance be mistaken, and that in the matter of wicked promises the case is not perplexed, and it is no sin to break them, but a sin to keep them; yet upon supposition that the conscience is doubtful whether it be lawful to break them, and whether it be lawful to keep them, and fears a sin on either side, the council hath given a right answer; the evil that is least, is to be chosen. “Etenim dum perjurare compellimur, creatorem quidem offendimus, sed nos tantummodo maculamur. Cum vero noxia promissa complemus, et Dei jussa superbe contemnimus, et proximis impiâ crudelitate nocemus, et nos ipsos crudeliori gladio trucidamus.” “He that having sworn to do an evil turn, breaks his oath, offends God by putting his name to a lie and a villany, and he pollutes his own soul: but he that keeps his oath when he hath so sworn, despises the commandments of God, and hurts his neighbour with an impious cruelty, and destroys himself with a worse.” On this side, therefore, there being the more and worse evils than on the other, we must decline furthest from this. For if all evil is to be avoided, then all degrees of evil are; and when we cannot avoid as much as we should, we must avoid as much as we can. We must choose none directly, but when we are forced upon some by our own infelicity or fault; it is the best remedy for the gangrene that we lose our arm or leg: and he that is in the fatal necessity, no otherwise can be permitted to choose a sin, than he is supposed to be desirous to be cut of the stone, when upon any terms he resolves he never will or can endure the torments of the disease. The great reason of this rule is that which was given by Aristotle,^f ἐν ἀγαθοῦ γὰρ λόγῳ γίνεται τὸ ἑλαττον κακὸν πρὸς τὸ μείζον κακὸν· ἐστὶ γὰρ τὸ ἑλαττον κακὸν μᾶλλον αἰρετον τοῦ μείζονος· τὸ δὲ αἰρετον, ἀγαθὸν, καὶ τὸ μᾶλλον μείζον· “the less evil in respect of the greater evil is to be accounted good; because the less evil is rather to be chosen than the greater; and what is in any sense eligible, is in some sense good, and that which is more eligible is a greater good.”

2. But it seems something harder to inquire concerning this case when it relates to others: for so it uses to be asked;

Quest. Whether it be lawful to advise, to counsel, to petition, to determine, to make use of the doubt of another, or his necessity, or perplexity, and to call upon him to do that which is a sin? The case is this; Pollio, an intemperate and wanton young man, falls into adulteries and unnatural lusts; his friend Publius Asinius advises him, not so,—but if he will not leave his vileness, better it is to satisfy his lust by single fornication, and the less harmful complications:

^e Concil. Tolet. 8. Can. 2. temp. Martini P.

^f Lib. v. cap. 7. Ethic.

Et quas Euphrates, et quas mihi mittit Orontes, Me capiant: nolo furta pudica thori. PROPERTIUS.

Whether or no Publius does well in giving this advice, is the question. The reasons of doubting are these: because he that advises evil, is guilty of the sin which he procures; and he that any way consents or induces another to sin, shall be partner in the punishment.

3. To this I answer, that, in the whole intercourse, there are to be considered the formal sin, the material part of the action, and the degrees of the obliquity. The formal part, or the sinfulness, cannot, must not be countenanced, or assisted at all, directly or indirectly; and in the present case it is so far from being countenanced, that it is reduced to as little a proportion as it can, as near to a destruction as the present necessity or perplexity will permit, and it is out of hatred to the obliquity or sinfulness that this lesser way is propounded. Pilate, seeing the Jews resolved to do a spite to the holy and most innocent Jesus, propounded to them a lesser way than murdering him: “I will scourge him, and let him go.” Pilate’s conscience was not perplexed, though his interest was; and therefore there was no necessity for him to do either, and neither ought he to have propounded the lesser evil, which, it may be, themselves did not design: indeed if they were resolved to do one, he might have persuaded the less, not absolutely, (for nothing could have made that lawful,) but comparatively; that is, rather that than the other, if ye will do one.

4. (2.) But for the material part of the action, if it be already prepared, and the malice known and declared, it is lawful to propound a less instance of the sin without persuading to it; which is to be understood with these cautions:

1. That it be only with a purpose of hindering a greater.

2. When the lesser cannot be hindered, but at least so much must be done by way of redemption. As if Caius resolves to ravish a matron to satisfy his lust, it is lawful to divert his lust upon a common prostitute, who sells her soul for bread; because her malice is always ready and watches for an opportunity, and sins no less, if she wants opportunity which she thirsts after.

3. That it be ever without the prejudice of a third person: as if one of the banditti intends to kill one man, and this happens to be offered to a public and a brave man, it is not lawful to point out his sword to the striking of a mean person to save the other; because, though, in respect of the effect, it be a less evil, yet it is a direct uncharitableness to a third, which can receive no warrant or legitimation by the intention of the propounder; for although he intends that a less evil be done for the public, yet he intends a greater evil to the particular.

4. That it be in a case certainly known where the malice is apparent and declared, and the matter prepared; for thus we see that God, who sees the hearts of men, diverts their prepared malice upon some special matter, which serves the ends of his providence, and verifies the prophecies of God, and so brings his designs to effect, and a certain event by contingent or voluntary instruments. But we may no further imitate this, than we can attain to little portions of the knowledge of men’s private and particular purposes.

5. (3.) But as for the degrees of the obliquity or irregularity, it is certain none is to be persuaded or assisted directly, but suffered in the whole, and persuaded in the instance, by way of remedy against the greater, and more intolerable. Thus Moses permitted divorces, that the Jews might not commit open and frequent adulteries, or kill their wives when they grew weary of them. Thus an inconvenience is suffered, rather than a mischief shall be introduced; and some fooleries and weak usages are suffered in some churches, rather than, by reforming them, make the ignorant people think all religion is indifferent: and if all the people of the Greek church did perceive that any of their old customs were fit to be rescinded, they would, upon the same easiness, quit their whole religion, and turn Turks. And though an error is not to be permitted in any church, when it can be peaceably amended, and when it cannot, it is, as often as it can be, peaceably to be discouraged; yet when the necessity is great, and the evil feared is certain, and felt, and is intolerable; it is a sad necessity, but no man can help it, and therefore it must be as it may,—the lesser error is to be endured, till it can be remedied, with a remedy that is not worse than the disease.

6. Quest. Upon this occasion, and for the reducing the rule to practice, and to regulate a case which now-a-days happens too frequently, it is not amiss to inquire concerning the necessities of women married to adulterous and morose vile-natured husbands; whether it be lawful for a wife, out of a desire to live with some degree of a tolerable comfort, to connive at her husband’s stolen pleasures, and to permit him quietly to enjoy his folly? and what is a woman’s duty, and what were her most prudent course, and manner of deportment?

7. Some of great reputation in the church of God, both of old and later times, put a speedy period to this inquiry, and absolutely condemn it as unlawful for a man or woman to live with their husband or wife respectively, if either of them be notoriously guilty of adultery. Of this opinion was St. Jerome,^g saying, “That a man is ‘sub maledictione si adulteram retineat;’ ‘under a curse if he retains an adulteress in his embraces.’” And St. Chrysostom,^h “Sicut crudelis et iniquus est qui castam dimittit, sic fatuus et iniquus, qui retinet meretricem. Patronus enim turpitudinis est, qui celat crimen uxoris;” “As he is cruel and unjust, who puts a chaste wife from him,—so he is unjust and a fool, that keeps a harlot. For he is a patron of his wife's turpitude, who conceals his wife's adultery." And this they prove out of Solomon: "Qui tenet adulteram, stultus est;" almost the words which St. Chrysostom uses: "He is a fool that keeps an adulteress:" ἀσεβής it is in the Greek LXX. "He is an ungodly man." And of the same opinion was Bucer, in the last age, who for his opinion brings two arguments, which are not contemptible. The first is taken from Deuter. xxiv. 4. where God enjoins, that if a man puts away his wife, he must at no hand receive her again, "quia ipsa polluta est," "she is defiled," meaning, if any man else hath lain with her; and if this be a good reason, it will conclude stronger, that if she have committed adultery, she may not be entertained, because, in that case, she is much more polluted; and where the reason of the commandment does intervene, there also the obligation does go along. But the other is yet more considerable; for if God commanded that the adulteress should be stoned to death, certainly he much rather intended she should be turned out of doors. To which I add this consideration, that since an adulterer is made one flesh with the harlot with whom he mingles impure embraces, it follows that he hath dissolved the union which he had with his wife, or she with her husband; for he cannot be one with his wife, and one with the harlot, and yet he be one in himself, and they two, for that is a perfect contradiction; for that which is one with two, is not one but two. Now for a woman to lie with a man, or a man with a woman, between whom there is not a just and legitimate union, seems to be an unjust and illegitimate uniting; and, therefore, it cannot be lawful to lie with an adulterer, who is one with a harlot.

^g In 19. Matth.

^h Caus. 32. q. 1. c. Sicut.

8. Before I come to the resolution of the question, I must describe how much these arguments do prove and infer: because, though they do not prove so much as their contrivers do intend, yet they do something towards the whole question. 1. The words of St. Jerome infer nothing but this, "That to live with a harlot is a great calamity, and a horrible curse, and it cannot indeed tend towards a blessing, or end well, or be at all endured, if it be not intended to purposes beyond the proper effect of that calamity." He that is smitten with a leprosy, or he that is hanged upon a tree, is accursed; but if the leprosy makes a man run to God, or to Christ, or the man that dies upon a tree does confess and glorify God, and by his death intends to do so, the leper shall be presented pure before the throne of grace; and he that hangs upon the tree, does die with Christ, and shall reign with him for ever. 2. And the design expressed in the words of St. Chrysostom, do verify this commentary upon the words of Jerome. For St. Chrysostom, charging not only infelicity, as the other does, but folly and cruelty upon him who retains a harlot, gives this reason,—because he is a patron of his wife's turpitude if he conceals it;—meaning it, if he conceals it out of carelessness and positive neglect, or, which is worse, out of interest, or base designs. All wise and good men in the world condemn the fact of Cato, who did lend his wife Marcia, a virtuous and a chaste matron, to his friend Hortensius. He that conceals his wife's crime, with an unwillingness to reform it, or a pleasure in the sin, or the fruits of it, is his wife's betrayer and murderer; nay, he is an adulterer to his own wife. But these words cannot be true in all cases; for he that conceals her shame, lest the discovery should make her impudent, and harden her face, he is no patron of the sin, but a careful guardian, watching lest she should commit a worse. And this also is the meaning of the words of Solomon; for although they are not at all in our Bibles, because they are not found in the Hebrew text, yet the words,—which are found in the Greek LXX and in the vulgar Latin, and which are certainly in the Bibles which St. Jerome and St. Chrysostom did use, and which were the cause and original of their opinion,—have in them this sense, "That as he who expels a good woman, thrusts good from his house, so he that does not thrust an evil woman thence, an adulteress, he is a fool;" meaning, if he connives at her wickedness, or unless he have something to sweeten the sufferance, or some pious purposes to sanctify his action. But if it were absolutely unlawful, then the adulteress were a person of a desperate fortune, irremediable and irrecoverable, incapable of mercy, or repentance; or if she were, yet her husband's charity and forgiveness might by no means be instrumental to it; and yet St. Paul, in a case that was extremely bad, even in the case of infidelity, asks, "Quæ scis, mulier, an virum sis lucratura?" "What knowest thou, O woman, whether thou mayest gain thy husband?" But the arguments of Bucer, being intended directly against the lawfulness of retaining an adulteress, or living with an adulterous husband, are to have distinct answers. For although where a commandment is given with a reason, wherever the same reason is, it does not always follow that there is the same obligation; because, although God is sometimes pleased to give a reason for the precept, yet the reason did not bind without the precept, but the precept does bind without a reason, which demonstrates that the obligation proceeds wholly from the authority of God, and not from the reason (as I intended to show more largely in its proper place): yet besides this I say, the reason is not rightly rendered in the usual translations: "Non poterit prior maritus recipere, quia polluta est;" "The first husband may not receive her, because she is defiled." For the words in the Hebrew are אשר הטמא which do not signify "because she is polluted," but "quia facta est polluere se," because she is made to defile herself;" meaning, "that because her first husband thrust her out, and offered her to be humbled by him that would, he, being the cause of that pollution, hath lost all right to her, and the privilege of restitution." And then this case refers not to a simple adultery, but to him who betrays or exposes his wife to adultery: and indeed such a person might not, in Moses's law, receive her again; and this was the case of Cato and Socrates, who were very free in lending their wives, as a man lends a utensil. As for the case of lapidation, it is true, the woman, if she were legally convicted, was to die; but the husband was not bound to accuse her,—he might pardon her if he pleased, and conceal the fact; he might pardon her for his share, as Christ did the woman taken in adultery; or put her away privately, as Joseph, upon a mistake, intended to do the blessed Virgin-mother: but that it is, therefore, unlawful to retain her whom his soul loves, whom he would fain convert, whom he desires and hopes to reform, or that God did intend the good man should not use any of his charity and kindness to any such purpose, is not at all to be concluded by these arguments. Now as to the last, the adulterous man is one with the harlot, but this union is not a natural union, but a spiritual and legal, as appears by the effect of second and third marriages; for one person can no more be one naturally with two or three successively, than he can be one with many at one time; and when the patriarchs were married to divers women at once, they were not naturally one with them all, but legally they were; that is, they were conjoined in holy bands, and were to very many purposes to be reckoned but as one. “Εν γάρ εἰσιν ἀνὴρ καὶ γυνὴ τῇ φύσει, τῇ συμποσίᾳ, τῇ ἐνώσει, τῇ διαθέσει, τῷ βίῳ, τῷ τρόπῳ, κεχωρισμένοι δὲ εἰσι τῷ σχήματι καὶ τῷ ὀριζμῷ, said Clemens; They were one person by union of affection, they had one bed, one purse, one interest, community of children, communication of bodies, equal rights as to the power of marriage, the same band of duty, tied by the same mystery. Now he, or she, that commits adultery, breaks this union, and divides or imparts some of the rights due to each other to an impure person, and they become one flesh in an impure mixture. Now, because he or she that first breaks this union, loses their own right by invading or giving away another’s, therefore the offending person may be put away, and refused in their petition of right, which they have lost by doing wrong. But the adultery hath not so united the offending persons, but that the union can and may better be broke, and the erring party reduced to his rule, and to his right. For it is but a legal, and it is a spiritual or intellectual union, which is to be done not by material, but by moral instruments, which can eternally return, and be effective when they do. The way then being thus far made straight, I answer,

9. That it is not only lawful, but may have in it great piety and great charity, for a woman still to cohabit with an adulterous husband. The lawfulness appears, in that there is no prohibition by a Divine commandment, no natural uncleanness in it; and this appears as all other negative pretences can, even by evacuating the pretences made to the contrary. Of this opinion was St. Basil, who also made a canon for it, and commanded it to be done in his church, as appears in his Epistle to Amphilochius I. Can. 9 and 21. The same also was the sentence of St. Austin to Pollentius, and in his book “de Adulterinis Conjugiis,”^k and of Pope Pelagius, in his epistle to Melleus, his subdeacon.

^k Lib. iii.

But they, it seems, went against the general stream; for they were not only forced to dispute it, but also to limit the question and the permission. For David received his wife Michal, who had lived with another man; and St. Paul advises the wife to be reconciled to her husband; and Christ forgave the woman taken in adultery; and God not only is ready to forgive, but calls and invites his church to return to his love, though she hath been an adulteress, and committed fornication against him. But, therefore, so may a man; but it ought only to be done in case the sinning person does repent: only St. Basil is for the living still with the adulterer, though he wallow in his sin; but does not think it fit the man should be tied to do so to his adulterous wife. That he or she respectively may, if they will, still live with the sinning person, needs no other proof but this, that the innocent, being also the injured person, may forgive the injury done to them; and that it may have in it great piety, and great charity, is certain upon the same account, on which it can be piety and charity to suffer injuries, to be patient, to have a long-suffering spirit, to exhort, to entreat, to bring the sinner to repentance, to convert a soul, to save a sinner from the evil of his way. But this is to be practised with the following measures and cautions:

10. (1.) The innocent person must not be bound to do this, because, the union being dissolved, the criminal hath lost his right, and therefore if the other use their liberty, they do no wrong; and although it may be good charity in many instances to do it, yet because there is no direct obligation in any, and there may be great uncharitableness to one’s self, as the case may happen, no one’s liberty is to be prejudiced in this particular, but they are to be exhorted to all instances of charity; ever remembering that saying of God by the prophet, “The Lord God of Israel saith, He hateth putting away.”^l

11. (2.) The innocent person may lawfully retain the criminal, though he or she have no other end or purpose in it, but the love of the person, or the retaining of their own rights temporal, or any other thing that is in itself honest and lawful: and the reason is, because the fault of the one is not to prejudice the other; and it is misery enough to be injured in their direct relation, and not that this injury compel them to receive another. If Titius be an adulterer, his wife, Caia, hath not lost her power over his body, or her interest in his family and fortune.

12. (3.) This is to last as long as there are any hopes of repentance, and the repentance is to be procured and endeavoured by all direct means, and by all the indirect means which are ministered to the innocent person by the power and advantages which his or her innocence gives over the guiltiness of the other: such as are, reproving his fault, denying conjugal rights, delating the person, bringing him or her to private shame, procuring reproof from spiritual superiors or natural relatives, and indeed any thing that can be prudent, and by which the offender can be made better, and will not be made worse.

13. (4.) If there be no hopes of repentance, yet still the innocent person may use their own right, not only because there may be possibilities, and real consequent events when we have no hopes; and St. Paul's question, — "Quid scis, ô mulier?" "How knowest thou, O woman, whether thou shalt gain thy husband?" — may still have place; not only, I say, for this reason, but for the foregoing; the innocent person does not lose his or her right, and therefore, may still possess what otherwise she might quit: and his incontinence does not oblige her to be exposed to the danger of a πύρωσις or ustulation, nor to be reproached with the noises of divorce, nor offered to an actual poverty, or dereliction, or to become an actual widow before death.

14. (5.) If the retaining the adulteress be actually scandalous, the church in that case hath been more restrained in her permission, and hath commanded the innocent person to put the offending woman away: and therefore the fathers, in the council of Eliberis,^m refused to give the communion to a clergyman even at the last, if he did not, "statim projicere," "instantly expel" from his house his wife, whom he knew to commit adultery; and in the council of Neo-Cæsarea, he was to be deposed from his dignity in the same case; the reason is given by the council of Eliberis;ⁿ "Ne ab his, qui exemplum bonæ conversationis esse debent, videantur magisteria scelerum procedere;" "lest their houses, which ought to be the examples of piety and chastity, become the precedents and warranty of uncleanness." This is nothing else but a pursuance of the canon apostolical,^o requiring that bishops and deacons should be such "who rule their own houses well;" for if they cannot do that, it is not easy to be supposed they can well rule the church of God: and though a good man may have an evil wife, and such a one whom no prudence can govern; yet if she be an adulteress, he can put her away, though he cannot govern her: and indeed all such reproaches ought to be infinitely removed from the houses of those, whose lives and whose governments ought to be exemplar. "Oportet suspicionem abesse à Cæsaris domo." Princes and prelates ought not to have any thing under their roof so nearly relating to them, that can justly be suspected. But this is matter of decency and fittingness, not of indispensable necessity.

15. (6.) The innocent person must not directly, by any compliance, cohabitation, or indulgence, give countenance or encouragement to the impurity or crimes of the offending relative; for nothing can make it tolerable or lawful, to promote a sin, or any ways directly to cooperate toward it. This is a "species lenocinii," a being a bawd to the uncleanness of that person, whom, with our lives, we ought to rescue from that damnation, if we could. And, therefore, if the woman finds her husband grow worse by her toleration and sufferance, she is to go off from it by such degrees as are on this side the extreme remedy, which I reckoned before in the third caution; and if nothing else hinder, it is not only excusable, but hugely charitable, and in a very great degree commendable to be divorced. For she uses her own power, and therefore sins not, and does it when nothing else can prevail; and therefore she is not rash, or light and inquisitive after new relations, and she does it that she may not patronize or increase his sin, and therefore is charitable to his better interest.

16. (7.) But if his or her compliance and cohabitation does accidentally make the offending party worse, yet if it be besides the intention, and against the purpose, and contrary to the endeavours of the innocent; he or she, in that case, is not tied to relinquish their right and their advantages in the present possession or cohabitation. 1. Because concerning accidental events, against which we labour, no man is to give account. 2. Because of this accidental event, the offending person is the only author, and the innocent is not to suffer for his sin. 3. If the innocent person were tied to depart, then it were at any time in the power of the adulterer or adulteress to be divorced from the innocent, because he, growing worse by the other's being good, can oblige the other to quit him of the burden which he hates. 4. Because to depart in that case is no remedy. Because he that is vile, may grow worse by contrary causes; and as wicked men are made presumptuous by mercies, and hardened by judgments, and whether they be punished or not punished, from both they take occasion to persevere; so may an adulterer, or an adulteress, by being sweetly used, or by being harshly. All that can be of duty and necessity in this case, is that the innocent person, with all prudent advice and caution, do not, by any direct act, encourage the crime,—or connive at it when it can be helped,—or commend it when it cannot,—or refuse to use any fair or any just instrument of curing the leper: and for the rest, let them pray earnestly, frequently, humbly, and leave the event to God. It is lawful to permit or suffer an evil, which I cannot help, and by that permission retain my own rights, or prevent my own wrongs; but it is at no hand lawful for any interest spiritual or temporal to do an evil, or to set it directly forward.

17. Thus some commonwealths permit fornication and public stews, to prevent the horrid consequences of the lusts of their young men, which, when they cannot cure, they seek to lessen and divert; and though there be, in the whole, many evil appendages, and a great fault in government, and many evil and avoidable necessities introduced or supposed: yet so far as this intention is considered, if it were not avoidable or remediable by the severity of laws, and the wisdom of discourses, and the excellencies of religion, it were the only charity that were left, and an after-game of conscience and religion; sad and fatal to those whose folly infers it; but all that is left, that can be done for God and for souls.

18. But yet this thing, in all the circumstances, is not to be done at all, because it is a snare to many who have no such necessities, who are otherwise deceivable, who enter into the temptation, because it is made ready to their hand; and it is a high scandal to the laws and to the religion of a country, where such vile nests of impurity are suffered; and the necessity is but fantastic, accidental, and inferred by evil customs, or some secular interest, or weaker regard; for there is no necessity that men must either debauch matrons or be fornicators; let them marry, for that is the remedy which God hath appointed, and he knows best how to satisfy and provide for all the needs of mankind. But it is objected, "the laws of Italy forbid the younger brothers of great families to marry." That is it which I said; men make necessities of their own, and then find ways to satisfy them, which, therefore, cannot be warranted by that necessity, because that necessity is of their own procuring, not from God, nor for him. For this is the case; an evil is to be cured, and a greater prevented; God hath appointed marriage for a remedy, the civil power forbids it to some persons, who, for want of that, must fornicate, or do worse. To prevent the worse, they provide them of opportunities of doing the less. But what remedy is there for the less? That is not thought of; for marriage is inconvenient to younger families; but it is very convenient for their souls, and they also would be provided for, as being no contemptible interest. Here, therefore, if they would alter the necessities which worldly interest introduced, if they would prefer souls before the greatness of families, heaven before a marquessate in Sardinia, and would esteem it more honour to a house to have chastity preserved rather than wealth, and an entire inheritance, the weak pretences of excuse for stewards would be hissed off from the face of all christian countries; for if fornication be a remedy against unnatural lusts, it is just as being poisoned is an antidote against hanging; but, certainly, there is a better: innocence or pardon will prevent it with more advantage, and so will marriage do to the worst evils of lust; unless no health is considerable which is not effected by a witch, and ease is to be despised if it be brought with a blessing. But if any one can pretend, that marriage will not secure the Italians or hot Spaniards from attempting intolerable villainy; (besides that fornication will do less, as having in it no more of natural remedy, and not so much by way of blessing;) in this case, the wheel or the galleys, hard labour and the mines, the rods and axes, must pare off the luxury.

This, therefore, is the result, as to this particular instance. In the questions of greater or lesser uncleanness, permissions are not to be made by public authority, for the reasons before named: but there may be particular necessities in single instances which will run into present evil, for which no remedy can be provided; and then it is lawful to divert the malice upon a less matter, when it cannot be taken off entirely: for thus righteous Lot^p offered his daughters to the impure Sodomites, to redeem the strangers from the violation intended them, and to hinder his citizens from breaking the laws of nature and hospitality, which (if they were not always) yet then they were of greater obligation than the restraints of simple fornication. And to this purpose is that of St. Chrysostom,^q who, to a man that is accustomed to swear, and cannot avoid it, advises that he should rather swear by his head than by God. I do not, I confess, like the instance; both, 1. Because it is, in some cases, worse to swear by a creature than by the Creator; it is an honour done to him to swear by him, though to do it triflingly is such an honour done to him, as superstition is an honour that angers him: and, 2. Also because he that can pretend his swearing to be unavoidable, does say so, because he does swear when he cannot deliberate; and if he does not consider, he can never make use of his advice to do one rather than another; for no man can choose that cannot consider; but as for the prime intention of the advice, that the least evil is to be chosen, or advised, it is, without question, safe and prudent.

Of the same purpose are these words of St. Austin:^r "Si decrevisti homicidium aut adulterium facere, adulterium committe, non homicidium:" "If thou wilt murder or commit adultery, do this, not that;" that is, rather this than that. But neither here am I pleased with the instance; because, when any man can lawfully be diverted to a less sin, it must be in the same kind; because the same lust cannot be filled with a differing object; and if the temptation be such that it cannot be taken off wholly from that scene, and changed to a differing and disparate matter, he can as well be turned to something that is innocent as to some other distinct vice; that is, he may for all his temptation. From unnatural lusts to natural, from the greater kind to the less, from adultery to fornication, from fornication to trifling amours and Platonic fooleries; from murder to a blow, from a blow to an angry word; these are proper diminutions, which are in a direct order to the retrenching of the sin: but from murder to adultery a man is not to be diverted, because this is not a direct lessening of the degrees of sin, but a changing it into equal; or if it be not, yet the malice is more extended, if not intended, and the man is directly tempted to be a devil upon a new score, for it must be a new malice that must change him; but still the advice is, in its main design, safe and innocent.

But of the same mind is St. Gregory,^s affirming it to be good advice, that when of two sins one must be chosen, that the least be it; but his proof of it is not to be suffered: for "so," saith he, "for the avoiding fornication, St. Paul permits marriage;" which saying of his, without great violence to the words, and charity to the man, can never be reconciled with the truth of Scriptures, or the honour of marriage; but as for the main advice, it is well, and agreeable to right reason.

19. But besides the cautions already given,^t relating to the material part of sin, the whole affair is to be conducted with these provisions:

20. (1.) No man may use this course, by engaging in a present lesser evil, to seek to prevent a greater that is to come: the reason is; because this is a securing of evil, it is an assurance and a certain gain to the interest of sin, and this certainly may outweigh the greater degree of an uncertain evil; and there are many acts of providence which may intervene and prevent the future evil, which, therefore, is not to be prevented by a present evil, though less mischievous,—because possibly it may be hindered at a cheaper rate; and no little evil is to be done, but when either itself or a greater is unavoidable; which happens not (for aught we know) in the present case; for before to-morrow the man may die, or his affections to sin may die, or he may be sick, or scared, and to put it off as long as we can, is one kind of diminution and lessening of the sin, which is the thing here consulted of.

21. (2.) Care must be taken, that, by this means, no man's sin be promoted, no man's eternal interest be lessened, no evil be done that we could and ought to forbid and hinder; and that of this we have a moral certainty, or at least no probable cause to doubt: the reason is, because if we put any man's soul to hazard, by procuring a less damnation to an evil person, the evil we do is greater than good; and we venture one mischief, for the venture or hopes of lessening another. Quintus Milvius, being in love with the wife of Muræna, and she with him,—Milvius resolves to kill his wife, Virginia, and run away with the wife of Muræna, or force her from him; he acquaints his freed-man, Priscus Calvus, with his purpose, but he, to divert his purpose of murder and adultery, persuades his patron, Milvius, rather to lie with Muræna's wife now, than to do such things of hazard, and evil voice, and dishonour: and his advice was charitable, and prevailed; for though the adultery was future, yet the intended murder was present, and the evil was lessened as much as it could, and no man prejudiced, but the life of one saved. But if he believes, that by this act Virginia will be so exasperated, that she will turn adulteress in revenge, or kill her husband; this is not to be advised upon the foregoing reason. If a rich usurer refuses to give an alms to a starved person, he may be advised rather to lend him some money upon interest, than suffer him to die for want of bread: but if I believe, or probably suppose or suspect, that another man will be confirmed in the uncharitableness, and think because I advise him to this, he does well in it, and will live and die in this opinion, then I may not, at the charge of another man's soul, do the other wicked person that small advantage, which is less than can countervail the other evil.

22. (3.) He that advises the lesser evil for the avoiding of a greater, must not advise any thing so to serve his own interest or humour, as that he shall in any sense be delighted with the evil, because so he becomes guilty of the other's sin, and then he cannot do a thing lawfully, if it asperses him with guilt; and he may not serve another's need with his own evil joys; and the interest of souls is not set forward when one dies to make another less sick. But besides this, the question here being whether it be lawful to advise a less evil for avoiding of a greater, though it be affirmed to be so, when it is wholly for the avoiding the greater; yet it cannot be lawful to give such advice to serve my own lower ends: nothing but the former can legitimate such an advice, and therefore this latter cannot.

23. (4.) No man must make use of this course himself; for though it be lawful to divert a greater evil by advising the less to others, yet I may not myself choose a less, that I may not choose a greater; for if this could be lawful, it would be in the power of any man to sin what sin he pleased, and to threaten his conscience into a leave: for if he should resolve he would either kill the father, or lie with the daughter, be unnatural in his lusts, or loose in his entertainments, he might legitimate every lesser sin for fear of the greater. But therefore it is certain, that when he can choose either, he must choose none, for nothing can make it lawful, directly to choose any, even the least evil. But when it so happens that the conscience is doubtful and perplexed, and that in this sad conjunction of evil and weak thoughts, it seems unavoidable but that one must be chosen, we may then incline to that which hath least danger and least mischief. And this advice was given by the chancellor of Paris:^a “Si sub electione proponuntur duo mala cave neutrum eligas: Nam in malis quid est eligendum? At vero si culpâ nostrâ eò recidimus, ut necesse sit alterum ex peccatis fieri, minus est acceptandum; quia jam in comparatione deterioris sortitur boni, secundum quid, rationem.” No sin is to be chosen when both can be avoided, but when they cannot, the least is to be suffered. But when this comes to be another man's case that he will not avoid both, though he sins in choosing any, yet he that advises him rather to take the less, does not sin. He that chooses the less, sins less, but yet sins, because he should choose none at all; but he that advises him to choose the less, sins not at all, because he hinders all sin as much as he can.

24. (5.) He that advises a less sin for the prevention of a greater, must see, that it be directly less, and certainly so; it must be in the same matter and kind, and in a less degree, because he can no otherwise be certain that he hath done any good at all, and may do a greater evil. For in degrees of sin the case is clear when the matter or instance is the same; but if it be specifically different, or in the whole kind, all question of degrees is infinitely uncertain, and therefore the rule is not without danger practicable in such cases. But of this I have already given some accounts in the fifth number of this rule.

25. But because all this discourse relies upon this main ground, that the lesser evil in respect of the greater hath the nature of good, and therefore is to be preferred; or (which is all one) the avoiding of the greater evil is directly a good, and the suffering the less evil is better than suffering the other, yet because it is but comparatively good, it is positively evil; here it is to be inquired, whether this can be lawful, or is it not a prevaricating of the apostle's rule, that "evil is not to be done, that good may come of it?" and whether this may be done in any case, and by what cautions it can be permitted or made legitimate? This inquiry hath great uses in the whole life of men; and therefore is not unworthy a stricter search.

26. And first as to the present rule, it is certain, that this permission is not a doing evil that good may come of it: 1. Because no evil is at all permitted when all can be avoided. 2. Because no man is to act this rule in his own person, upon whom we may and ought to have a power of persuasion and effort sufficient to cause himself to decline all evil. 3. It is only permitted to be advised to others by such persons who hate all sin, and have neither pleasure nor interest in any. 4. It is not a giving leave to any sin, but a hindering as much as can be hindered. It is not a doing any thing at all of kindness to any thing but to the man. It is like that permission which the sons of Israel gave to the remnant of the Canaanites, to live in the land, because they could not destroy them all. They killed as many as they could, and it was not kindness but necessity that left those few alive. And the thing was not ill expressed by Petrarch,^x "Duobus aut pluribus ex malis minus malum eligendum esse non video, cum minus malum haud dubie malum sit, qualiter mali electio sit laudanda. Itaque rectius dici reor, majora mala majori studio vitanda, ut si vitari cuncta non possunt, minora facilius tolerantur, non electione, sed patientiâ, æquimitate, modestiâ:" "Of two evils the least is not to be chosen, since that the less evil is without all doubt an evil. Thus therefore I suppose we ought to say; the greater evils are with greater care to be avoided, that if all cannot be declined, the less may be better tolerated, not by choice, but by patience." Now though it be not lawful to do evil for a good end, yet it is lawful to suffer evil to avoid a greater, and to make the best of it that we can; which was the counsel which Cicero^y says he received from learned men; "Non solum ex malis minima oportere eligere; sed etiam excerpere ex iis ipsis, si quid inesset boni."

27. But to the thing itself, there can be no dispute but that it is highly unlawful to do evil for a good end; St. Paul's^z words are decretory and passionate in the thing: he calls it slander, or blasphemy, that they reported it of him that he should say, "It was lawful to do evil that good might come of it;" he also affirms, that though the greatness of the sins of the Jews or gentiles did magnify the greatness of the Divine mercy, yet they whose sins accidentally thus served the glorification of God, their damnation was just. Though this be clear and certain, yet I doubt not but all the world does evil that good may come of it; and though all men are of St. Paul's opinion, yet all men do not blame themselves when they do against it. I will therefore first represent the matters of fact, and then consider of the allays or excuses to which men pretend in their private accounts or public answers, and so separate the certain from the uncertain, and establish the proper measures of the proposition.

28. For first if we look in Scripture, we shall find that divers eminently holy have served God by strange violences of fact, and for his glory have laid hold upon instruments not fit to be handled, but such which would have cut the hands of a christian, if they had been drawn through them. David gave order to Hushai to enrol himself in the rebel party; —and to deal falsely with Absalom, that he might do good to David; and indeed so do all spies, which, if they were not necessary, would not be used in all armies; and if they be, yet they do that which honest men would scruple at. Elias^a the prophet, that he might bring the people from idolatry, caused a sacrifice to Baal to be made, and the idol to be invoked, which of itself was simply and absolutely evil; and Jehu (though a much worse man) yet proclaimed an assembly for Baal, and both of them did it that they might destroy the priests of Baal, and dishonour the idol, and do honour to God, and both did well; and for aught appears, so did the ten men of Shechem, who, to redeem their lives from the fury of Ishmael, discovered the secret treasures of the nation:^b and amongst the christians some women, particularly Pelagia and her daughters, have drowned themselves to prevent the worst evil of being deflowered. And is it not necessary in all governments, that by violence peace should be established, and by great examples of an intolerable justice others should be made afraid? For so do all princes knowingly procure their rights by doing wrong; for, in all wars, the innocent must suffer that the guilty may be punished: and besides that all great examples have in them something of iniquity,—it were not easy to have discipline in private governments, or coercitive power in laws, if in some cases some evil were not to be permitted to be done for the procuring some good. For suppose Corippus hath an obstinate servant, so perverse, that like the sides of elephants his very soul grows hard by stripes, and that Corippus knows this; yet if he have other servants who will be corrupted by the impunity of this, he may, he must do evil to the obstinate, and ruin his soul for the preserving the others. And, indeed, if we consider how sad, how intolerable an evil it is that a malefactor is snatched from his scene of evil and vile actions, and hurried to hell with his sins about him, and that for the only reason of doing good to others, and preserving the public interest, it will seem necessary that this interest be preserved, and, therefore, that the other instrument be employed; for it is natural enough, that as truth comes from falsehood, so should good from evil; it is not an accidental or contingent product, but sometimes natural and proper; and as God brings good out of evil by his almighty power, so do good men by the nature of the thing; and then the intermedial evil to a wise and religious person is like unhandsome and ill-tasted physic, it is against nature in the taking and in its operating, but for the preservation of nature in the effect and consequent; so are some evils against religion but useful for its advancement. And this very similitude supplies many particulars of the same nature. For thus we make children vain-glorious that they may love noble things; and who can govern prudently and wisely that resolves never to be angry? and to be angry so as to do the work of government, though it be not bigger than the measures of the governor, yet they exceed the measures of the man. Thus for physic it is affirmed to be lawful for a man to be drunk: and Cardinal Tolet^c allows of voluntary desires of pollution, when without it we cannot have our health; and yet to desire such pollution without such a good purpose is certainly criminal; and if, for the interest of health, evil may be done, much more for religion and effects of holiness. But thus, I said, it must happen in public governments: the christians that dwell in China, Japan, and in the Indies, cannot transact their affairs with the heathens without oaths, and therefore they make them swear by their own false gods, by the names of their idols and devils, which only they think binding, and neither could there be any security of faith to princes or to subjects, that is, in the public or private intercourse, without it; and yet without question as to swear by devils and false deities is a high crime, so to require or to procure it is a great sin, and yet it is done for necessity. The Romans would not trust the Jews that would swear by the temple of Jupiter:

Ecce negas, jurasque mihi per templa Tonantis:

Non credo: jura, verpe, per Anchialum. MART.

no trust was given, unless they swore by the God whom they feared; and so it is in the case of others; and what is necessary, it were very strange if it might not be permitted. And what else can be the meaning of dispensations, but that a thing which is otherwise unlawful, is made good by its ministering to a good end; that is, it is lawful to do evil, to break a law, and leave is given to do so, when it is necessary, or when it is charitable. Upon this account it is that prescription does transfer a right, and confirms the putative and presumed, in defiance of the legal and proper, and this is for no other reason but to prevent uncertainties in title, and eternal contentions, which is a certain doing injury to the right owner, that good may be procured or evil pretended. When a man is in extreme necessity, the distinctions of dominion do cease; and when David and his soldiers were hungry, they ate the shew-bread which God forbad to all but to the priests; and so did the apostles, to satisfy their hunger, break the sabbath by pulling and rubbing the ears of corn; and in the defence of a man's own life it is lawful to kill another: which is certainly a doing evil for a good end: and if it be said, that this is not a doing evil, because the end makes it not to be evil, this is a plain confessing the question against the words of St. Paul; for if the good end makes that to be lawful, which of itself, without that end, is unlawful, then we may conclude against St. Paul, that it is good to do evil that good may come; that is, it is changed by the end and by the design. And upon an equal stock of necessity it is, that all princes think themselves excused, if by inferring a war they go to lessen their growing neighbours; but this is a doing wrong to prevent a mischief; as the birds in Plutarch,^d that beat the cuckoo for fear that in time she should become a hawk. And this is certain in the matters of omission, though to omit a duty is simply evil, yet when it is necessary, it is also lawful, and when it is charitable, it is lawful. Thus religion yields to charity, and charity to justice, and justice itself to necessity, and a man is not bound to pay his debts, when to do so will take from him his natural support. And it is thus also in commissions who will not tell a harmless lie to save the life of his friend, of his child, of himself, of a good and brave man? and to govern children and fools by saying false things, no man makes a scruple: and physicians are commended, if with a witty lie they can cozen melancholic and hypochondriacal men into a cure. Thus the man of Athens, who fancied, if he should make water, he should drown the city, was cured by his physician's ingenious fiction that the city was on fire, and desiring him to quench it with his urine, lest water should be wanting in that great necessity, struck his fancy luckily, and prevailed upon him to do that which no direct persuasion could effect. Thus Hercules de Saxonia having committed to his charge a melancholic man, who supposing himself to be the prophet Elias would needs fast forty days, dressed a fellow like an angel, who pretending that he brought him meat from heaven, prevailed upon him to receive both food and physic. This lie was charitable, and if it was not therefore innocent, then some charity can be criminal; but if it was innocent, it was made so wholly by the good end, which sanctified the evil instrument. Thus also judges exact oaths from contradicting parts, though they know that one is perjured, but yet he proceeds by such means to guess at truth and satisfy the solemnities of law. And when the judges themselves are corrupt, we think it fit to give them bribes to make them do justice, who, otherwise, would for bribes do injustice; and yet we suppose we are no more to be reproved than they are who pay interest money to the usurers and bankers whom yet themselves believe to sin. But bribery is a sin, and bribery in a wrong cause is two or three; and therefore let the cause be what it will, it is no way tolerable but that it is for a good end. Thus we venture into danger to serve worthy designs; some read heretical books to be able to confute them; and some venture into persecutions which they could avoid, because they would not weaken the hands of such who cannot avoid it; and yet, to go to danger is not safe, and therefore against charity, and therefore a sin; and yet it is for charity and faith, even when it is against one of them. And last of all, all men do, and they believe they may, make addresses to a tyrant for justice, and though he sits on the bench by wrong, yet we stoop to his purple, and kiss his rods and axes, when we desire to be defended from the oppression of a lesser tyrant; and if this be not a doing evil that good may come of it, then it is no evil to make another do an act of usurped power, or to bend to a power which destroys that to which we are bound by the oath of God.

29. These instances I have not brought in opposition of the apostle's rule, or that I think any man else pretends any of these in defiance of it,—but to represent that either a great part of mankind does it when they least think of it, or that some things which seem evil are not so; and that I may describe the measures of these things, and establish the case of conscience upon its just limits and rule.

30. (1.) Therefore it is to be observed, that the facts of men living under a law, are not to be measured by laws of a differing government, and, therefore, if the facts of worthy men were exemplary, (of which in its proper place I am to give accounts,) yet the facts of saints in the Old Testament would not be safe examples to us in the New; and therefore we may not do that which Hushai did, for he did well, that is, against nothing of the law under which he stood; but if the simplicity and ingenuity of our law gives us our measures, the effect will be, that Hushai did not do evil for a good end, but did well to a good purpose. And as to the thing itself, it is very likely that it is lawful to abuse his credulity, whose life I may lawfully take; the cautions and limits of which permission belong not to this present inquiry.

31. (2.) The rules of war, and the measures of public interest, are not to be estimated by private measures; and, therefore, because this is unlawful in private intercourses, it must not be concluded to be evil in the public. For human affairs are so intricate and entangled, our rules so imperfect, so many necessities supervene, and our power is so limited, and our knowledge so little, and our provisions so short-sighted, that those things which are, in private, evils, may be public goods: and, therefore, in this question, the evil and the good are to be in the same kind; a private evil is not to be done for the procuring of a private good, but for a public it may: not that evil may be done for any thing, but that here it is not evil, when it is measured by the public standard. For, since God is the fountain of government, he also gives authority to all such propositions, which are necessary means of its support,—not to all which pretend to it, or which are inferred by folly or ambition, but which are really such. War cannot be made as a man corrects his child, with even degrees of anger, and a just number of stripes, and equalities of punishment both to the person and to the offence; and kings are in the place of God, who strikes whole nations, and towns, and villages; and war is the rod of God in the hands of princes; but the evils which are intermedial to the greater purposes of a just war, are such which are unavoidable in themselves, and besides the intentions of good kings; and, therefore, in such cases, though much evil is suffered because it is unavoidable, yet none is done of choice, and that makes not against the rule. For,

32. (3.) In many of the instances objected, the evils which are the ways of procuring good, are not evils in morality, but in nature; and then it is lawful, when there is no malice in the design, to prevent the sin, or to do a good office by a shrewd turn. Thus I may pull my friend out of a pool by a strained arm, and save his life by putting his arm out of joint; and this is a doing evil materially, with a pious purpose, that is, without malice, and for a good end, and that is innocent and charitable when it is unavoidable,—but it is not to be chosen, and done with delight, or evil intent, or perfect election; to do evil to a man in this case is besides the man's intention, it is accidental also to the whole event, it is not so much as giving displeasing physic, not so much as imposing cupping glasses and using scarifications; for this is voluntary and chosen for a good end, because the good cannot else well be procured, and yet it is chosen upon those terms by the patient. Upon this account a man may give his life for his friend, or wish himself dead; and St. Paul wished himself “accursed for his brethren,” and Moses desired to be blotted out of the book of life in zeal for the people of God; and yet all this is a very great charity, because though a man may not do evil, yet he may suffer evil for a good end; he may not procure it, but he may undergo it; and after all, the doing of a natural or physical evil may be permitted when there is no motive but charity, for then it is in no sense forbidden; sometimes necessary and unavoidable, but no ways evil or criminal; and if it be, it becomes so by accident, or by the intertexture of some other ingredient.

33. (4.) When the evils are subordinate or relative, the less may be done to prevent the greater, though they be not in the same matter; as a child may be beaten to prevent a sin, an offender smitten to make him diligent: for these actions, though they are in the accounts of evil things, yet have no intrinsical irregularity, but wholly depend upon the end; but because commonly evil things are done to evil purposes, and with irregular measures, they have an ill name, but they can be changed when the end is made straight, and the measures temperate. Every thing that is not intrinsically evil, if it be directed to a good end, is good, unless it be spoiled by some intervening accident.

34. (5.) Some things are evils properly and naturally, some by accident, some by our own faults, some by the faults of others. An action may be innocent as from me, and yet a very great evil by the fault of others: a malefactor put to death, it may be, perishes eternally; if he does, it is his own fault, the laws are innocent when they smite him for the good of others; and this is not a doing evil that good may come of it; for in things not essentially and unalterably evil, good and evil are in relations, and though the smiting some sinners produce a very evil effect, yet it is only to be imputed to its own cause. There is a good and an evil in many things, and God and the devil have their share of the thing, and so have several persons, according as they intend, and as they operate: and in this case, the laws intend good, and do that which is good, that is, they punish a malefactor; but of the accidental damnation, the sinner that suffers only, is the only cause; and therefore in this, and many like cases of public transaction, there is no evil done for a good end. Thus, if any man who is to take an oath, be wicked and false, the law may exact the oath because that is good, but the law itself may use a false oath if the man will swear it, but then the falseness is the man's that swears, not the law that exacts it. For to many products there are many concurrent causes, which are not integral, but have each their share; and when causes are not integral, the portion of effect is to be applied only by intention of the agent, and the proportion and order to the end: indeed, if the whole effect were to be imputed entirely to every concurrent agent, (as in murder, every man is principal and integral,) then, in many of the fore-alleged cases, evil were done for a good end; but then it could not be lawful so to do: but the actions are therefore innocent to some agents, because they do nothing of it but the good share, that which they ought to do; and that which spoils it, comes in at another door.

35. (6.) Some laws of God are such that their rectitude is so perfect, the holiness so entire, the usefulness so universal, the instance so fitted for all cases, and the economy of it so handsome and wise that it never interferes with any other duty, is never complicated with contradicting matter, or cross interests; now these are such which no case can alter, which no man may prevaricate,—or, if they do, they are such which no measure can extenuate, which no end can sanctify: and these are either laws of general reason, and common sanction; or spiritual instances, and abstracted from matter. Thus no man may blaspheme God at any time, or for any end, or in any degree; and in these cases it was rightly said in the objections, that if the end can change the instrument, then it is not evil to do any thing for a good end, because the end makes the evil to be good. But then in other cases, where the instances are material, tied up with the accidents of chance, made changeable by relations, tied in several parts by several duties, filled with various capacities,—there the good and the evil are like colours of a dove's neck, differing by several aspects and postures; there abstractions are to be made, and separations of part from part, of capacity from capacity; and when every man provides concerning his share of influence into the effect, all is well,—and if one fails, it may be evil is done to the whole production; but it is not imputed to them who took care of their own proportions. But in such kinds of actions, the limits and measures are extrinsic and accidental, and the goodness is not essential, natural and original; and, therefore, the whole receives variety by necessities, and by charity. For whatsoever can be necessary by a necessity of God's making, that is lawful; and I may serve any greater necessity by any thing that is less necessary, when both necessities cannot be served. Thus David's eating the shew-bread, and the apostles' eating corn on the sabbath, served a greater need than could have been secured by superstitious or importunate abstinence. In positive and temporary commands there is no obligation, but when they consist with higher duties; "Actus imperati unius virtutis non debent præjudicare actibus elicitis alterius." The proper and natural actions of one virtue are ever to be preferred before the instrumental acts of another. As an act of temperance must be preferred before a posture in worshipping; charity, before fasting or before ceremonies: that is, the more necessary before the less. It is more necessary to save the life of a man, than to say my prayers at any one time, and therefore I may leave my prayers in the midst, and run to save a man from drowning. This is a thing which cannot stay,—the other can. For in all such precepts of affirmative duty, there is a secret condition annexed, and they oblige not when they cross a negative. And it is certain there could be no usefulness of knowing the degrees of good or evil, if it were not for prelation and election of one before another. To what purpose were it that we are told, "Obedience is better than sacrifice," but that we should neglect one and do the other, when both cannot stand together? and this order of degrees is the full ground of dispensations, when they can be allowed in Divine commandments: but in human dispensations there is another, even the want of foresight, the imperfection of the laws themselves which cannot provide for all cases beforehand, as God's laws can; and therefore, to dispense with a subject in a human law is not a doing evil for a good end; for to break a human law is not intrinsically an evil, though no express leave be given, as the case may happen: but when leave is given, as it is in dispensations, then there is no evil at all. And something like this, is that other case of prescriptions, which does indeed transfer a right from a right owner, as it may happen, but this is a doing good and not evil, for it is a preferring a certain possession before an uncertain right; or it is a doing a greater good, that is, a prelation of a title which hath more evidence and public advantage than the other. Besides, it is done by public consent, in which because every particular is included, there is no evil done, but much is prevented.

36. (7.) In actions the material part is to be distinguished from the formality, the work from the affection: that may be wholly indifferent, when this may be wholly criminal. He that drinks till he vomits, by the physician's advice, gives none of his affection to the pleasure of any thing forbidden; he takes it as he takes a potion or pills, which may have the same effect with drink. But when the material part cannot be done without the sense of pleasure which is forbidden, then the end cannot sanctify it: and therefore, although to drink much for physic may be lawful, yet pollution may not be desired for health, because that cannot be done or suffered without an unlawful pleasure; and so also will drinking for health become vicious, if, in the acting of the material part, any part of our affections be stolen away, and the pleasure of the excess be delighted in.

37. (8.) He that makes use of the matter of a sin already prepared to which he gives no consent, and which he cannot help, does not do evil for a good end. Thus the prophet called on the priests of Baal to do what they used to do, that they might never do so again: he was no way the cause of a sin, but of its circumstances and adjuncts, that it be done here and now, and this is not against the apostle's rule; time and place are no sins, and make none, unless frequency be added to the time, and holiness to a place,—and then they may add degrees or new instances to the sin; but when neither of these is procured or injured respectively, it is lawful to glorify God by using the prepared sin to good purposes. When a judge is ready to receive money upon any terms, out of this evil we may bring good, and cause him to do a good thing rather than a bad: he does neither well, but that is his own fault; but to give money is a thing indifferent, and to give it for that end which is good, makes it better: and bribery is a word of an ill sound when it means an evil thing, but when it means well we may find a better word for it, or mean well by this: though concerning the particular, it is not amongst men esteemed certain, that it is lawful to give money to a judge: "Sed si dedi," says Ulpian, "ut secundum me in bonâ causâ judex pronunciaret, est quidem relatum conditioni locum esse: sed hic quoque crimen contrahit. Judicem enim corrumpere videtur: et non ita pridem imperator noster constituit litem eum perdere." Whether it be lawful or no is to be inquired in another place; but as to the present inquiry, if it be lawful, I have accounted for it already; if it be not, it is not to be done, no, not for justice' sake. For in this case we no way consent to the evil, but endeavour to bring good out of that evil which is already in being. Thus we run to a tyrant power for justice, he will govern whether we will or no, the sin will be acted and continued upon his own account; but when the evil matter is thus made ready, we may reap as much good by it as we can bring out of it; and in this sense is that true and applicable to the present which is urged in the objection, that as truth may come from falsehood, so may evil from good; when an ill-gotten power is apt either to justice or injustice, we may draw justice from it, and then we do good without co-operating to the evil: that is, we only do determine an indifferent agent to the better part. The manner of getting the power is wholly extrinsic to the ministration of it; that is wholly the fault of the usurper, but this which is our own act, is wholly innocent. If Nero sets Rome on fire, I do not hurt if I warm by the heat, and walk by the light of it; but if I laugh at the flames, or give a faggot to it, I am guilty. And thus the christians use the heathen's oaths for their own security: the oath is good, and so far it is desired; that the oath is by a false god, is the heathen's fault; this is effected by these, but the other is only desired by them. This, therefore, is not a doing evil for a good end; it is a desiring of good, and a using the evil matter which is of another's procuring.

38. (9.) There are some actions criminal and forbidden in certain states only, as to kill a man is a sin, a private man may not do it; but the same man, when he comes to be a public magistrate, may do it. A private man also may not do it, when he is in the relation and protection of civil society, because in that, the laws are his guards, and the public judges are his defensatives; but if a man sets on me by violence, and so puts himself into a state of war, he, by going from the limits of civil society, takes off the restraint which that society put upon me, and I am returned to the liberties of nature; and there is by all laws a power given a man to defend himself, by laws, if he can, and if he cannot, then by himself and the means of nature; and, therefore, to kill him that would kill me, is not to do evil for a good end, for the thing is permitted, and therefore not intrinsically evil, and whatsoever is not so, may be accidentally good.

39. (10.) Some of the instances are such, which are disallowed by most men; so to tell a lie for a good end is unlawful, upon supposition that a lie is intrinsically evil; concerning which the account must be reserved for its own place: for the present, it is certainly unlawful to lie for any end, if that supposition be true; but if lying be only forbidden for its uncharitableness or injustice, that is, for its effects, then when the end is good, the instrument is tolerable. By these measures all the instances objected can be measured and secured, and by these the rule itself must be conducted. What cannot be excused upon one of these, is wholly to be reprov'd, as being a direct prevaricating the apostle's rule.

40. The sum is this: whatsoever is forbidden by the law under which we stand, and, being weighed by its own measures, is found evil; that is, in a matter certainly forbidden, not for any outward and accidental reason, but for its natural or essential contrariety to reason and the law of God, that may not be done, or procured for any end whatsoever. For every such thing is intrinsically and essentially evil, it is evil without change or variety, without condition or circumstance, and therefore cannot be made good by any such thing. What is evil in some circumstances may be good in others, and what is condemned for a bad effect, by a good one may be hallowed; but if it be bad of itself, it can never be good, till there come a cause as great to change its nature, as to make it: the cruelty of a man's habit or his choice can be turned, but a viper will for ever have a venom in his tooth.

41. But this rule is also to be extended to cases that are duplicate, and relate to two persons. As if two persons affirm or promise contraries; the first upon a presumptive power and authority over the other, and this other upon firm resolution, and by an entire power over him or herself; though I am bound to hinder his promise from passing into fallacy and deception as much as I can, yet I must rather secure my own. The reason is, because he who had no power over me, could not promise but with a tacit condition; and though he were guilty of temerity and an interpretative breach of promise, yet if the other fails, he is directly and properly guilty. This is still more evident if a father promises his daughter to Titius before witnesses, presuming that his daughter, who is a widow, will yet be ruled by him, though she be at her own dispose; but his daughter hath solemnly sworn and contracted herself to Sempronius. The daughter must be more careful not to break her oath and contract, than by verifying her father's promise, keep him from a lie; and this was the case of Acontius and Cydippe in Ovid, Promisit pater hanc: hæc adjuravit amanti.

Ille homines, hæc est testificata Deam.
Hic metuit mendax, sed et hæc perjura vocari,
Num dubitas, hic sit major, an ille metus?

This case may be varied by accidents intervening, as if the daughter be under her father's power, she hath none of her own to contract or swear: but in an equal power and circumstances, the greater care must be to avoid the greater crime.

42. These cautions are all which I think necessary for the conducting of a doubting conscience (that is, a conscience undetermined) in its danger and infirmity: but concerning the matter of doubts, that is, indeed, all cases of conscience, they are to be handled under their proper matter. Concerning interpretation of doubts to the better part, obedience to superiors in a doubtful matter, favourable and easy interpretation of laws for the deposition of doubt, though I was tempted to have given accounts in this place, yet I have chosen to refer them to their own places, where by the method and rules of art they ought to stand, and where the reader will expect them. But concerning the cure of a doubting conscience, this is all that I am to add to the foregoing rules:

43. A doubtful conscience is no guide of human actions, but a disease; and is to be cured by prayer and prudent advices, and the proper instruments of resolution and reasonable determinations; but for those things which are called doubts, and the resolution of which is the best way to cure the infirmity of conscience, they must be derived from their several heads and categories. For these discourses or advices of conscience in general, are intended not as directions how to take our physic, and what order to observe "in diebus custodiæ;" but the determining of the several doubts, is like preparing and administering the medicines, which consist of very many ingredients.

CHAPTER VI.

OF THE SCRUPULOUS CONSCIENCE.

RULE I.

A Scruple is a great Trouble of Mind proceeding from a little Motive, and a great Indisposition, by which the Conscience, though sufficiently determined by proper Arguments, dares not proceed to Action,—or if it do, it cannot rest.

1. "QUI nimis emungit, elicit sanguinem," said Solomon;^a "Too violent blowing draws blood from the nose;" that is, an inquiry after determination, and searching into little corners, and measuring actions by atoms and unnatural measures, and being over righteous, is the way not to govern, but to disorder our conscience.

2. That it is a great trouble, is a daily experiment and a sad sight: some persons dare not eat for fear of gluttony, they fear that they shall sleep too much, and that keeps them waking, and troubles their heads more, and then their scruples increase. If they be single persons, they fear that every temptation is a πύρωσις, that "burning" which the apostle so carefully would have us to avoid, and then that it is better to marry than to suffer it; and if they think to marry, they dare not for fear they be accounted neglecters of the glory of God, which, they think, is better promoted by not touching a woman. When they are married they are afraid to do their duty, for fear it be secretly an indulgence to the flesh, and be to be suspected of carnality; and yet they dare not omit it, for fear they should be unjust; and yet they fear that the very fearing it to be unclean should be a sin, and suspect that if they do not fear so, it is too great a sign they adhere to nature more than to the Spirit. They repent when they have not sinned, and accuse themselves without form or matter; their virtues make them tremble, and in their innocence they are afraid; they are no hand would sin, and know not on which hand to avoid it: and if they venture in, as the flying Persians over the river Strymon, the ice will not bear them, or they cannot stand for slipping, and think every step a danger, and every progression a crime, and believe themselves drowned when they are yet ashore.

3. "Scruple" sometimes signifies all manner of vexation of the mind; so Cicero^b uses it, "Hunc mihi scrupulum ex animo evelle, qui me dies noctesque stimulat ac pungit:" "Take this scruple out of my mind, which pricks and goads me night and day." So also in St. Jerome's Bible;^c "Non erit tibi in singultum et scrupulum cordis, quod effuderis sanguinem innoxium:" "It shall not be to thee a cause of grief and scruple of heart, that thou hast shed innocent blood."—But in the present discourse it hath a more limited signification, and according to the use of divines and canonists, means an uneasiness and restlessness of mind in things done or to be done, after the doubts of conscience are determined and ended. "Intolerabilem perturbationem," Seneca calls it; a fear of doing every thing that is innocent, and an aptness to do every thing that can be suggested:

— nuda ac tremebunda cruentis
Erepet genibus. Si candida jusserit Ino. JUVEN.

Scruple is a little stone in the foot; if you set it upon the ground, it hurts you; if you hold it up, you cannot go forward; it is a trouble where the trouble is over, a doubt when doubts are resolved; it is a little party behind a hedge, when the main army is broken and the field cleared: and when the conscience is instructed in its way, and girt for action, a light trifling reason, or an absurd fear, hinders it from beginning the journey, or proceeding in the way, or resting at the journey's end.

4. Very often it hath no reason at all for its inducement, but proceeds from indisposition of body, pusillanimity, melancholy, a troubled head, sleepless nights, the society of the timorous, from solitariness, ignorance, or unseasoned imprudent notices of things, indigested learning, strong fancy and weak judgment; from any thing that may abuse the reason into irresolution and restlessness. It is indeed a direct walking in the dark, where we see nothing to affright us, but we fancy many things,—and the fantasies produced in the lower regions of fancy, and nursed by folly, and borne upon the arms of fear, do trouble us.

5. But if reason be its parent, then it is born in the twilight, and the mother is so little that the daughter is a fly with a short head and a long sting, enough to trouble a wise man, but not enough to satisfy the appetite of a little bird. The reason of a scruple is ever as obscure as the light of a glow-worm, not fit to govern any action, and yet is suffered to stand in the midst of all its enemies, and like the flies of Egypt, vex and trouble the whole army.

6. This disease is most frequent in women, and monastic persons, in the sickly and timorous, and is often procured by excess in religious exercises, in austerities and disciplines, indiscreet fastings and pernoctations in prayer, multitude of human laws, variety of opinions, the impertinent talk and writings of men that are busily idle: the enemy of mankind by the weaknesses of the body and understanding enervating the strengths of the spirit, and making religion strike itself upon the face by the palsies and weak tremblings of its own fingers.

7. William of Oseney was a devout man, and read two or three books of religion and devotion very often; and being pleased with the entertainment of his time, resolved to spend so many hours every day in reading them, as he had read over those books several times; that is, three hours every day. In a short time he had read over the books three times more, and began to think that his resolution might be expounded to signify in a current sense, and that it was to be extended to the future times of his reading, and that now he was to spend six hours every day in reading those books, because he had now read them over six times. He presently considered, that in half so long time more by the proportion of this scruple he must be tied to twelve hours every day, and therefore that this scruple was unreasonable; that he intended no such thing, when he made his resolution, and therefore that he could not be tied: he knew that a resolution does not bind a man's self in things whose reason does vary, and where our liberty is entire, and where no interest of a third person is concerned. He was sure, that this scruple would make that sense of the resolution be impossible at last, and all the way vexatious and intolerable; he had no leisure to actuate this sense of the words, and by higher obligations he was faster tied to other duties: he remembered also that now the profit of those good books was received already and grew less, and now became changed into a trouble and an inconvenience, and he was sure he could employ his time better; and yet after all this heap of prudent and religious considerations, his thoughts revolved in a restless circle, and made him fear he knew not what. He was sure he was not obliged, and yet durst not trust it; he knew his rule, and had light enough to walk by it, but was as fearful to walk in the day as children are in the night. Well! being weary of his trouble, he tells his story, receives advice to proceed according to the sense of his reason, not to the murmurs of his scruple; he applies himself accordingly. But then he enters into new fears; for he rests in this that he is not obliged to multiply his readings, but begins to think that he must do some equal good thing in commutation of the duty, for though that particular instance become intolerable and impossible, yet he tied himself to perform that which he believed to be a good thing, and though he was deceived in the particular, yet he was right in the general, and therefore that for the particular he must make an exchange. He does so; but as he is doing it, he starts, and begins to think that every commutation being intended for ease, is in some sense or other a lessening of his duty, a diminution of his spiritual interest, and a note of infirmity; and then also fears, that in judging concerning the matter of his commutation he shall be remiss and partial. Now he considers that he ought to consult with his superiors; and as he is going to do so, he begins to think that his superior did once chide him for his scruple, and that now much more he will do it, and therefore will rather seek to abolish the opinion of obligation than change it into another burthen; and since he knows this beforehand, he fears lest it shall be expounded to be in him an artifice to get himself eased or chidden out of his duty, and cozened from his obligation. What shall the man do? He dares not trust himself; and if he goes to another, he thinks that this will the more condemn him; he suspects himself, but this other renders him justly to be suspected by himself and others too. Well! he goes to God and prays him to direct him; but then he considers that God's graces are given to us working together with God's Spirit, and he fears the work will not be done for him because he fails in his own part of co-operating; and concerning this he thinks he hath no scruple, but certain causes of fear. After a great tumbling of thoughts and sorrows, he begins to believe that his scrupulousness of conscience is a temptation, and a punishment of his sins: and then he heaps up all that ever he did, and all that he did not, and all that he might have done, and seeking for remedy grows infinitely worse, till God at last pitying the innocence and trouble of the man, made the evil to sink down with its own weight, and like a sorrow that breaks the sleep, at last growing big, loads the spirits, and bringing back the sleep that it had driven away, cures itself by the greatness of its own affliction. In this case, the religion is not so great as the affliction.

8. But because a scruple is a fear, or a light reason against a stronger and a sufficiently determined understanding, it can bring no other work to the conscience, but that it get itself eased of the trouble, which is to be done by the following rules.

RULE II.

A Conscience, sufficiently instructed by its proper Arguments of Persuasion, may, without Sin, proceed to Action against the Scruple and its weaker Arguings or stronger Tremblings.

1. This is the best remedy that is in nature and reason. St. Bernard preached rarely well, and was applauded; but the devil, offering to him the temptation of vain-glory, he, in his resisting it, began to think that he had better leave off to preach than begin to be proud; but instantly the Holy Spirit of God discovered to him the deception, and the devil's artifice, who would, at any rate, have him leave off to preach; and he answered, "I neither began for thee, nor for thee will I leave off." This is a right course in the matter of scruple; proceed to action; and as the reason or the fear in the scruple was not inducement enough to begin, so neither to leave off.

2. Against a doubting conscience a man may not work, but against a scrupulous he may. For a scrupulous conscience does not take away the proper determination of the understanding; but it is like a woman handling of a frog or a chicken, which, all their friends tell them, can do them no hurt, and they are convinced in reason that they cannot, they believe it and know it; and yet when they take the little creature into their hands, they shriek, and sometimes hold fast, and find their fears confuted, and sometimes they let go, and find their reason useless.

3. Valerius of Hippo, being used always to fast till high noon of festivals, falls into an illness of stomach, and is advised to eat something in the morning; all the reason of the world that is considerable and pressing, tells him he may do it lawfully, but because he hath not been used to it, and good people in health do not do it, he is fearful to do that which others do not, that need it not; this is a slight ground, and with it perfectly may stand his practical determination of conscience, that it is lawful for him; which final determination, because it is the next and immediate rule of actions, cannot be impeded by that, which suffers this persuasion still to remain,—because the doing only against such persuasion can only be a sin; for that only is the transgression of the immediate law: to do conformably to such determination is to do it with faith; and if the scruple can lessen it, yet it only makes the man the weaker, but cannot destroy the assent.

4. Add to this, that since scruples do sometimes make men mad, do detriment to our health, make religion a burden, introduce a weariness of spirit, and tediousness,—it cannot be a sin to stop all the evil, and directly to throw away the scruple, and proceed to contrary actions.

5. But this is to be understood only, when the scruple is such that it leaves the conscience practically determined. For if the scruple prevails upon his weakness so far as to rattle the better reason, the conscience loses its rule and its security, and the scruple passes into a doubt, and the law into a consultation, and the judgment into opinion, and the conscience into an undiscerning, undetermined faculty.

6. Hither is to be reduced the case of a perplexed conscience; that is, when men think that which part soever of the contradiction they choose, the sin; for though that be impossible to wise men, yet all men are not wise; and if it were impossible in the thing, yet it is certainly possible upon the distempers of some men: and because a man hath contrary reasonings and divided principles within him, as our blessed Lord had a natural desire not to die, and yet a reasonable and a holy spiritual desire to submit to his Father's will, and if he please, to die,—so hath every man desires to please an appetite, or secure an interest of secular designs, and a reason to serve the interest of his spirit in spiritual designs: but although, in our blessed Lord, the appetites of nature were innocent and obedient, and the spirit always got a clear victory, and the flesh resisted not, yet in us it is not so; and sometimes spiritual complications do disturb the question, and make the temporal end seem religious or pious, and the contrary pretence is pious too, and yet duty will be omitted which way soever be chosen, or a sin committed, as is supposed: here the case seems hard. It is certain that there is no such case in the world, that it is necessary for a man to sin, which part soever he takes,—and unless it be his own fault he cannot think so; but some men are wild in their reasonings, and err in circles, and cannot untie the knot themselves have knit. Some are weary, and many are involved, and more are foolish; and it is as possible for a man to be a fool in one proposition as in another, and, therefore, his error may be this, that "which part soever he chooses, he shall sin;"—what is to be done here is the question.

7. The case is this: Pratinus, a Roman soldier, turns christian, and having taken his military sacrament before, and still continuing the employment, he is commanded to put to death certain criminals, which he undertakes, because he is bound to it by his oath. Going to the execution, he find they were condemned for being christians; then he starts, remembering his sacrament or oath on one side, and his faith on the other; that is, his religion on both; by which he is bound neither to be perjured, nor to kill his brethren: the question is not how he might expedite his doubt, and secure his conscience by choosing the surer part, but what he is to do, this perplexity remaining, that is, he not being able to lay aside either part of the doubt; for his question is not whether of the two he shall do, but is persuaded that to do either is a high crime.

8. (1.) Concerning this, it is evident, that if the cases be equal, and the event not to be distinguished by him in the greatness of its consequent or malice of it, it is indifferent to him which he chooses; and therefore there can be no rule given, which he must take, unless he could be convinced of one that it is lawful, and the other unlawful; but in this case that not being to be done, he ought to know, that, in this case, he sins not if he takes either, because all sin is with liberty and choice, at least with complacency: but his error is an infelicity and no sin, if he neither chooses it, nor delights in it, which in the present case he is supposed not to do.

9. (2.) But if, in the event of the actions and parts of choice, there be a real or apprehended difference, he is bound to choose that part, which he believes to be the less sin,—this being a justification of his will, the best that can be in the present case; but if he chooses that, which is of worse event, he hath nothing to excuse it.

RULE III.

He that is troubled with Scruples, ought to rely upon the Judgment of a prudent Guide.

1. THE reason is, because his own understanding is troubled and restless, and yet his reason determined; and, therefore, he can but use the best way of cure, which, in his particular, is to follow an understanding that is equally determined as is his own, and yet not so diseased.

2. Add to this, that God hath appointed spiritual persons, guides of souls, whose office is to direct and comfort, to give peace and conduct, to refresh the weary, and to strengthen the weak, to confirm the strong, and instruct the doubtful; and, therefore, to use their advice is that proper remedy, which God hath appointed. And it hath also in it this advantage, that there is in it humility of understanding, a not relying on our own wisdom, which, by way of blessing and disposition, will obtain of God that we be directed. “Consule bonos, prudentesque viros, et acquiesce eis,”^a was an old advice, and derived from Solomon and Tobit; “lean not on thy own understanding,” but ask counsel of all that are wise, and despise not any counsel that is profitable.

RULE IV.

When a Doubt is resolved in the Entrance of an Action, we must judge of our Action afterwards by the same Measures as before: for he that changes his Measures, turns his Doubt into a Scruple.

1. THE reason of the rule is this, that which is sufficient for satisfaction before, is sufficient for peace afterwards. A christian, in the diocess of Salamis, being faint in his stomach before the reception of the holy sacrament, disputes whether he may take a cordial or a glass of wine. Upon inquiry, he is told, that to receive the holy sacrament “virgine saliva,” “fasting,” is a custom of the church later than the times of the apostles, as appears by the Corinthian usages mentioned by St. Paul; that it having no authority but custom, no sanction but a pious fancy, and a little proportion and analogy of reverence, it ought to yield to the elicit acts of charity: upon this account he being satisfied drinks a little, is well, and communicates with health, and joy, and holiness. But afterwards reflecting upon what he had done, he begins to fear he had not done well; that he had done against the customs of the church, that it was at least infirmity in him, and upon what account with God that should be, which, in his own most gentle sentence, was, at least, infirmity, he knew not; and twenty other little things he thought of, which signified nothing, but did something,—they meant no good, but did great evil: and finding himself got into a net, he calls for help, but is told that he must get out of it by the same way that he came in, and that which was the sufficient cause of his doing the action, was sufficient also for the justification of it, and let him confront the reasons which introduced the action against these flies and little pretensions which disturb his mind, and he shall find that he hath reason to be ashamed of debauching and prostituting his understanding to such trifles and images of argument: for let a man look to his grounds when he begins to act, and when he hath acted, let him remember that he did his duty, and give God thanks. For if any just cause appear, for which he ought to reprove his former determination, that just cause can have no influence upon what is past, if the first proceeding was probable, and reasonable, and disinterested. He knows something which he did not know before; and, for the time to come, is to walk by this newly kindled taper; but if he, in the first instance, walked by all the light he had, he is not tied to walk it over again: for as God will not, of a child, exact the prudence and cautions of a man, but in every age expects a duty answerable to the abilities of it; so it is in all the stages of our reason and growing understanding. According to what we have, and not according to what we have not, we shall give accounts. This is intended to prove, that, if we proceed probably, we are not tied to sorrow and repentance, though afterwards we find a greater reason to the contrary; but this concludes more in the present question of scruple, in which the greater probability goes before, and the less comes after.

But the rule is to be managed with these cautions:

2. (1.) Take heed, that, in the beginning, we do not mistake our desires to have it done, for a sufficient warrant that it may. For if we enter in at a wrong door, or at the windows, we must go back, and cannot own that entrance which was like a thief, or that action which was done with more craft than prudence.

3. (2.) Be not too easy in the arguments of probation. For although in actions concerning our eternal interest, God expects no more of us but that we should talk by the measures of a man; yet we do not perform our duty if we act by the measures of a child or a fool. If we could do no better, the action might be more reprobable than the man; but if we could consider better and wiser than when we reflect afterwards upon what we did before, and find a fault or a sin, a negligence or an avoidable error in the principle, we cannot from thence bring rest and confidence to our consciences.

4. (3.) Separate your question, as much as you can, from interest,—that your determination and inquiry be pure; and if more arguments occur afterwards than did in the first inquiry, remember that it was well enough at first, if it was probable enough; and for the rest, pray to God to accept you, if you did well and wisely,—and to pardon you in what was done amiss, or negligently, or imperfectly.

RULE V.

A scrupulous Conscience is to be cured by Remedies proper to the Disease, and Remedies proper to the Man.

1. THAT is, there are some advices, which are directly intended for the lessening the scruple,—and some others, which take away the scruple by curing the man, and taking off his distemperature. Those which are directly intended against the scruple, besides the rules before described, are these:

Remedies against the Scruple.

2. (1.) Let the afflicted and disquiet man often meditate of the infinite goodness of God, and how his justice is equity, and his judgments are in mercy; that he judges us by what we heartily endeavour, but does not put our infelicities into our accounts of sins.

3. (2.) Let him be instructed, that all laws, Divine and human, are desirous of sweet and merciful interpretations, and that of themselves they love to yield to necessity and to charity; and that severity and exactness of measures is not only contrary to the goodness, but to the justice of God, who therefore will pity us because we are made of dust, and are a lump of folly and unavoidable infirmities; and by the same justice by which God is eternally angry with the fallen angels, by the same justice he is not finally angry with man for his first follies, and pities all his unavoidable evils.

4. (3.) Let it be remembered, that charity is the fulfilling the law, and by the degrees of it a man tends to perfection, and not by forms and titles of the letter, and “apices” of hand-writing or ordinances. And that if he loves God and does his best, and concerning the doing his best makes the same judgments real and material, that he does of the other actions of his life, he certainly does all that can belong to him, and all that which can be wise and safe. He that acts according to the reason of a man, ought to have the confidences of a man; for no other confidence can be reasonable. That is charity, that we do carefully and wisely, and follow the best we can.

5. (4.) Let it be considered that to incline to the scruple, and neglect the stronger reason that stands against it, is to take the worse end, it is to do that which must seem worse; and then it may be remembered, that if the man is afraid and troubled with the trifle, with the scruple, when he hath a stronger reason to secure him, if he yields to the scruple and neglects the stronger reason, the neglect of that will run upon him like a torrent and a whirlwind,—and the scruple, or the bulrush, will not support his building.

6. (5.) Since the very design of the evangelical covenant is, that our duty be demanded, and our sins accounted for, according to the measures of a man, and not by the proportions of an angel; and that all our infirmities and ignorances, and unavoidable prejudices, are taken into account, beside the infinite remissions on God’s part,—it will follow, that, by this goodness of God and a moral diligence, and a good heart, we are secured, but we can never be secured by our own measures. For let us weigh never so exactly, we may miss grains or scruples; but to snatch greedily at the little overrunning dust of the balance, and to throw away the massive ingots that sunk the scales down, is the greatest folly in the world.

7. (6.) The lines of duty are set down so clear and legible, are so agreeable to reason, so demonstrable upon their proper principles, are so easy and plain, that we need not run into corners and sneaking by-lanes to find it out: if, by little undiscerned minutes, we were to stand or fall, though now there are but few that shall be saved, yet but a few of those few should escape eternal death. The counsels of God are not like the oracles of Apollo, double in their sense, intricate in their expression, secret in their meaning, deceitful in their measures, and otherwise in the event than they could be in their expectation. But the word of God, in the lines of duty, is open as the face of heaven, bright as the moon, healthful as the sun’s influence; and this is certainly true, that when a thing becomes obscure, though it may oblige us to a prudent search, yet it binds us not under a guilt, but only so far as it is or may be plainly understood.

8. But in the case of a scrupulous conscience, it is not the thing so much that troubles the mind, as the indisposition of the part; the man hath a vicious tenderness; it is melancholy and fear: and as every accident can trouble the miserable, so every fancy can affright the timorous; the chiefest remedies, therefore, must be by applications to the man, to cure his distemper; and then the scruple will work no more than its own activity will enable it, and that is but little and inconsiderable.

Advices to the scrupulous Man.

9. (1.) The case of the scrupulous man is full of variety, or uncertainty, rather that it is as easy to govern chance, and to give rules to contingency, as to him. In all other cases there is a measure and a limit, and therefore a remedy can be proportioned to it; but in this, fear is the disease, and that alone is infinite; and as it commences oftentimes without cause, so it proceeds without limit. For by what reason it entered in, by the same it may grow; that is, without any cause at all it may increase for ever. But for the remedy, this is considerable; that the worse it is, the better it may be remedied, if we could consider. For when fear is grown so big that it is unreasonable, the cure is ready and plain, that it must be laid aside because it is intolerable, and it may because it is unreasonable. When it comes from a just cause, that just cause is usually the limit of it: but when it is vast and infinite it hath no cause, but weakness, and it appears enough in the instances; for the scrupulous man fears concerning those things, where he ought to be most confident; he fears that God is angry with him for not doing his duty, and yet he does whatsoever he can learn to be his duty. This is a complication of evils, as melancholy is of diseases. The scrupulous man is timorous, and sad, and uneasy, and he knows not why. As the melancholy man muses long, and to no purpose, he thinks much, but thinks of nothing; so the scrupulous man fears exceedingly, but he knows not what nor why. It is a religious melancholy; and when it appears to be a disease and a temptation, there need no more argument against its entertainment. We must rudely throw it away.

10. (2.) He that is vexed with scruples, must fly to God by prayer and fasting, that this lunacy and spirit of illusion, which sometimes throws him into the fire and sometimes into the water,^e may be ejected; and the Spirit of God, and the Spirit of wisdom,^f may come in substitution, according to the promise so often recorded in the Holy Scriptures.

11. (3.) Let the scrupulous man change the tremblings of his spirits to a more considerable object, and be sure if he fears little things, let him fear great things greatly; every known sin let him be sure to avoid, little or great; for by this purity he shall seek God, and the things of God, peace and truth, and the honesty of his heart will bear him out from the mischief, if not quit from the trouble of the scruple: at no hand let it be endured that he should think this disease or vicious tenderness in spirit is able to excuse him from his duty in greater things. Some scruple at an innocent ceremony, and against all conviction and armies of reason will be troubled and will not understand; this is very bad;

—but it is worse that he should think himself the more godly man for being thus troubled and diseased, and that, upon this account, he shall fall out with government and despise it; this man nurses his scruple till it proves his death; and instead of curing a bile, dies with a cancer: and is like a man that hath strained his foot, and keeps his bed for ease; but by lying there long falls into a lipothymy, and that bears him to his grave.

12. (4.) Let the scrupulous man avoid all excess in mortifications and corporal austerities, because these are apt to trouble the body, and consequently to disorder the mind,—and by the prevailing fond persuasions of the world they usually produce great opinions of sanctity and ignorant confidences of God's favour; and, by spending the religion of the man in exterior significations, make him apt to take his measures from imperfect notices; and then his religion shall be scruple and impertinency, full of trouble, but good and profitable for little or nothing. "Admirazione digna sunt," saith Cardan,^g "quæ per jejunium hoc modo contingunt: somnia, superstition, contemptus tormentorum, mortis desiderium, obstinata opinio, insania: jejunium naturaliter præparat ad hæc omnia:" "It is wonderful to consider what strange products there are of fasting: dreams, superstition, contempt of torments, desire of death, obstinacy in opinion, and madness; to all these, fasting does naturally prepare us."—And concerning St. Hilarion it is reported by St. Jerome,^h "Ita attenuatus fuit jejunio et vigiliis, in tantum exeso corpore ut ossibus vix hærebat: unde nocte infantum vagitus, balatus pecorum, mugitus boum, voces et ludibria dæmonum," &c. "That he was so lean and dried with fasting and watching, that his flesh did scarce cleave to his bones: then his desires and capacity of sleep went away, and for want of sleep he must needs grow light-headed, and then the illusions of the devil were prepared and certain to prevail; then his brains crowed, and he heard in the desert children crying, sheep bleating, bulls lowing, and rattling of chains, and all the fantastic noises raised by the devil."—Much to the same purpose is, by St. Athanasius, reported of St. Anthony. It was this excess that made St. Jerome so scrupulous in reading of Tully's orations; it was not an angel, but his own dreams that whipped him from making and reading good Latin and good sense. After long fasting it was that St. Gulschlag, of Crowald, fought with the devil; and such irregular austerities have been, in all ages of superstition, the great instrument of Satan, by which his illusions became oracles, and religion was changed into superstition, and the fear of God into timorousness, and inquiry into scruple.

13. (5.) Let the scrupulous man interest himself in as few questions of intricate dispute, and minute disquisition, as he can; they that answer fewest, do commonly trouble themselves with most. Curious questions may puzzle every man, but they can profit no man, they are a certain disturbance, they are rebels in the kingdom of the inner man; they are just the same things in speculation which scruples

^f James i. 5.

^g De verum varietate. Lib. viii. c. 10.

^h Epist. lib. iii.

are in practice, and therefore because notice properly tends and directs to action, the increase of them will multiply these. Avoid them therefore; for not these, but things practical, are the hinges of immortality; but the other break the peace of the superior faculties, they trouble the understanding and afflict the conscience and profit, or instruct no man.

14. (6.) He that would cure his scrupulousness, must take care that his religion be as near as he can to the measures and usages of common life. When St. Anthony was troubled with a scrupulous conscience, which so amazed him, that he thought it was impossible for him ever to arrive at heaven, an angel came to him in the likeness of an hermit, or rather an hermit spake to him like an angel, and said, "Nunc paululum laborando manibus, nunc genibus flexis orando, deinde corpus reficiendo, post quiescendo, et rursus iterum operando, Antoni, sic fac tu et salvus eris:" "Sometimes labour with thy hands, then fall on thy knees and pray, then refresh thy body, then sometimes rest, and then labour again; and so thou shalt be saved."—Let us take care that our religion be like our life, not done like pictures, taken when we are dressed curiously, but looking as the actions of our life are dressed,—that is, so as things can be constantly done, that is, that it be dressed with the usual circumstances, imitating the examples and following the usages of the best and the most prudent persons of his communion; striving in nothing to be singular, not doing violence to any thing of nature, unless it be an instrument or a temptation to a vice. For some men mortify their natures rather than their vicious inclinations or their evil habits, and so make religion to be a burden, a snare, and an enemy. For in scrupulous, that is, in melancholy persons, nature is to be cherished in every thing where there is no danger, that is, where she is not petulant and troublesome. Such men have more need of something to repair their house, than to lessen it.

15. (7.) Let the scrupulous man take care, that he make no vows of any lasting employment. For the disease that is already within, and this new matter from without, will certainly make new cases of conscience, and new fears and scruples upon the manner, and degrees, and circumstances of performance. Therefore, whatever good thing they intend, let them do it when they can, when it is pleasant, when it is convenient, and always reserve their liberty. For besides that to do otherwise must needs multiply scruples, it is also more pleasing to God, that we make our services to be every day chosen, than after one general choice of them, to have the particulars done and hated.

16. (8.) But that I may sum up many particulars in one. The scrupulous man must avoid those companies, and those employments, and those books from whence the clouds arise, especially the books of ineffective and fantastic notion, such as are legends of saints, ridiculously and weakly invented, furnished out for ideas, not for actions of common life, with dreams and false propositions; for the scrupulous and fearful will easily be troubled, if they find themselves fall short of those fine images of virtue which some men describe, that they might make a fine picture, but like nobody. Such also are the books of mystical theology, which have in them the most high, the most troublesome, and the most mysterious nothings in the world, and little better than the effluxes of a religious madness.

17. (9.) Let the scrupulous man endeavour to reduce his body into a fair temper, and enkindle in his mind a great love and high opinions of God and God's mercy, and by proper arts produce joy in God, and rejoicings in the Spirit; let him pursue the purgative way of religion, fight against and extirpate all vicious habits and evil customs, do the actions of virtue frequently and constantly, but without noise and outcries, without affectation and singularity. That religion is best which is incorporated with the actions and common traverses of our life; and as there will be some foolish actions, so there will be matter for repentance; let this humble us, but not amaze us and distract us.

18. (10.) Let all persons who are or use to be thus troubled with flies, and impertinencies of reason and conscience, be carefully and wisely instructed in those practical propositions which are the general lines of life, which are the axioms of christian philosophy, which like the rules of law have great influence in many virtues, and have great effect towards perfection. For the more severe the rules are, the more apt they are to be the matter of scruple when they are not understood in their just measures. Such as are, It is the part of a good mind to acknowledge a fault where there is none:—Not to go forward is to go backward:—He that loves danger shall perish in danger:—Hold that which is certain and let go that which is uncertain.—There are many more, of which I am to give accounts in the next book, and from thence the scrupulous may derive assistances.

Concerning the matter of scruples, I on purpose decline the considering of it here, because either every thing, or nothing of it, is to be handled. A scruple may arise in the doing of every duty, in the remembrance of every action; and to stop one gap when the evil may enter in at five hundred, I did suppose not to be worth my labour. I therefore reserve every thing to its own place, being content here to give the measures and rules of conscience in its several kinds and differing affections, that is in all its proper capacities which can relate to action

RULE OF CONSCIENCE,

VIZ.

THE LAWS DIVINE, AND ALL COLLATERAL OBLIGATIONS.

BOOK II.

CHAPTER I.

OF THE LAW OF NATURE IN GENERAL.

RULE I.

The Law of Nature is the universal Law of the World, or the Law of Mankind, concerning common Necessities to which we are inclined by Nature, invited by Consent, prompted by Reason, but is bound upon us only by the Commands of God.

1. Ἐστώ σοὶ πρὸς ὁφθαλμῶν γινώσκειν τὸ νόμος φυσικός, καὶ τὰ τὰ τῆς δευτερώσεως, said the apostolical constitution; ^a “Be careful to understand what is the law natural, and what is superinduced upon it.” The counsel, abating the authority and reverence of them that said it, is of great reasonableness. For all men talk of the law of nature, and all agree that there is such a material law which some way or other is of the highest obligation; but because there are no digests or tables of this law, men have not only differed about the number of them, and the instances themselves, but about the manner of drawing them forth, and making the observation: whereas if the law of nature were such a thing as it is supposed generally, these differences would be as strange and impossible, as that men should disagree about what is black, or what is yellow,—or that they should dispute concerning rules to signify when they desire, or when they hope, or when they love. The purpose of the present intendment will not suffer me to make large disputes about it, but to observe all that is to be drawn from it in order to conscience and its obligation.

The Law of Nature.

2. “Jus naturæ,” and “lex naturæ,” are usually confounded by divines and lawyers, but to very ill purposes, and to the confusion and indistinction of all the notices of them. “The right of nature,” or ‘jus naturæ,’ is no law, and the law of nature is no natural right.” ^b The right of nature is a perfect and universal liberty to do whatsoever can secure me or please me. For the appetites that are prime, original, and natural, do design us towards their satisfaction,—and were a continual torment, and in vain, if they were not in order to their rest, contentedness, and perfection. Whatsoever we naturally desire, naturally we are permitted to. For natures are equal, and the capacities are the same, and the desires alike; and it were a contradiction to say, that naturally we are restrained from any thing to which we naturally tend. Therefore, to save my own life, I can kill another, or twenty, or a hundred, or take from his hands to please myself, if it happens in my circumstances and power; and so for eating, and drinking, and pleasures. If I can desire, I may possess or enjoy it: this is the right of nature. “Jus naturæ,” by “jus” or “right,” understanding not a collateral or legal right, positive or determined, but a negative right, that is, such a right as every man hath without a law, and such as that by which the stones in the streets are mine or yours; by a right that is negative, because they are “nullius in bonis,” they are “appropriate to no man,” and may be mine; that is, I may take them up and carry them to my bed of turf, where the natural, wild, or untutored man does sit. But this is not the law of nature, nor passes any obligation at all.

3. And indeed nature herself makes not a law:

Nec natura potest justo secernere iniquum:

and this opinion Carneades did express, but rudely, and was for it noted by Lactantius. He said there was no law of nature. But the christians, who for many ages have followed the school of Aristotle, have been tender in suffering such expressions, and have been great promoters of Aristotle’s doctrine concerning the τὸ φυσικόν, “the natural law.” But indeed Aristotle himself in this was various and indetermined. For in his Ethics ^c he affirms, that some think the natural law to be τὸ μὲν φύσει, ἀκίνητον καὶ πανταχοῦ τὴν αὐτὴν ἔχει δύναμιν· ὥσπερ τὸ πῦρ καὶ ἐνθάδε καὶ ἐν Πέρσiais καίει, “unalterable, and of the same force every where, as fire burns here and in Persia:” and yet he himself makes it mutable, and that is not the same among all nations; for so he in his Rhetorics^d says, ἐστὶ γὰρ, ὁ μαντεύονται τι πάντες, φύσει κοινὸν δίκαιον καὶ ἄδικον, καὶ μὴδεμία κοινωνία πρὸς ἀλλήλους ἦ, μὴδὲ συνθήκη, that “some do divine” (not demonstrate) “that some things are just or unjust by nature, without any covenant or society; intimating, that without a covenant or contract, tacit or explicit, there can be no law: and if it depends upon contract, it must be variable as necessity and contingency together; and so he affirms, that there is nothing so naturally just but it is variable; and although the right hand is in most men the strongest, yet in some the left hand is. Διανεμητικὸν δίκαιον τῶν κοινῶν αἰεὶ κατ’ ἀναλογίαν ἐστὶ τὴν εἰρημένην.^e “Distributive justice is by proportion;” and therefore it is variable; and in general he affirms of all justice, τὸ δὲ δίκαιον ἀνάλογον, “justice is in proportion and relation.”

^a Constit. Apost. lib. i. c. 6.

4. For justice is ἀλλότριοι ἀγαθόν, that is, πρὸς ἕτερον, a relative excellency, and therefore, must suppose society, and a paction or covenant. For, “a man cannot be unjust to himself,” or to his own goods, which are absolutely in his power: οὐκ ἔστιν ἀδικία πρὸς αὐτόν. and therefore, justice, I mean that universal virtue that contains all else within it, is a virtue that hath its being from something superinduced upon nature. Justice is natural, as all virtues are, that is, reasonable and perfective of our nature, and introductive of well-being: but nature alone hath not enjoined it originally, any more than matrimonial chastity was a natural law, which could not be at all before Eve was created, and yet our nature was perfect before. “Justum nihil est non constitutâ lege,” “nothing is just or unjust of itself, until some law” of God or man does supervene: and the Sceptics generally, and, amongst the Dogmatics, Aristippus said, that nothing is just by nature, but only νόμῳ καὶ ἔθει, “by law and custom;” which in what sense it is to be admitted, I shall explicate in the following periods:

Ἐν δὲ δικαιοσύνῃ συλλήβδην πᾶς ἄρετ’ ἐστὶ.

Is the universal Law of the World.

Ὁ κοινὸς νόμος, so Aristotle calls it;^g “The law of mankind”—“Commune omnium hominum jus;”—so Justinian;^h which is not to be understood of all men in all things absolutely, but especially of all wise or civil nations that communicate with each other. Lucretius restrains it to neighbours.

Tunc et amicitiam cœperunt jungere habentes
Finitima inter se, nec lædere, nec violare.

But many nations have thought, and some think so still, that they may hurt stranger people, the possessors of far distant countries, barbarous and savage people: the Romans, who were the wisest of all nations, did so.

— Si quis sinus abditus ultra,
Siqua foret tellus, quæ fulvum mitteret aurum,
Hostis erat. ARBITER.

“All people whom they call barbarous, or whom they found rich, were their enemies.”

5. But there are some laws of nature which belong to all absolutely, to whom any notice of the true God and of good manners is arrived; particularly those which belong to common religion: but in the laws of justice, the law of nature is more restrained; because it does not only, like the law of religion, suppose some communications of command from God, but some intercourse with mankind, and, therefore, are obligatory, or extended in proportion to the proximity and communication. But the law taken in its integrity, or according to its formal reason, is the law of all mankind; for all men in all things are bound to it.

Concerning some common Necessities.

This describes the matter and body of natural laws. For there is nothing by which the laws are denominated natural more than by this, that they are provisions made for the natural necessities of mankind; such are,—To do as we would be done to;—To perform covenants;—To secure messengers of peace and arbitrators;—To be thankful to our benefactors;—and the like: without these a man cannot receive any good, nor be safe from evil.

6. By this relation, and interchanging reason, it is therefore necessary that these laws should be distinguished from all others, because these and their like proceed from the same principle, are restrained by the same penalties, written in the same tables, have the same necessity, and do suppose something superadded to our nature; and, therefore, that these and their like are natural, and the others are not must be by relation to the subject matter.

7. For in these cases and the like, when that which is profitable is made just,—then that which is natural is made a law; that is, when the law tends to the same end whither nature tends, when the faculty or appetite is provided for by obedience to a law, then the law is called natural. For since all good and just laws are profitable, they are laws civil, or religious, or natural, according as they serve the end of the commonwealth, or of the religion, or of nature. This is evident in the code of the Mosaic law, where all laws, being established by God under the same prince, could have no difference but by their subject matter; and when they did lie in one body, to separate one from the other by proper appellatives was not easy, but by their manner of doing benefit, and their material relations.

To which we are inclined by Nature.

8. That which is usually called “the law of nature,” is, of itself, nothing else but “convenientia cum naturâ rationali,” “a consonancy to natural reason and being.” Some, in drawing the tables of the natural law, estimate those only to be natural laws which are concerning appetites and actions common to man and beast. "Jus naturale est, quod natura omnia animalia docuit;" said Ulpian:¹ "That is the law of nature, which is, by nature, taught not only to men, but even to beasts;" for they also are under her power, — Magnis agitant sub legibus ævum.

The same definition is also given by Aquinas, and many lawyers after Justinian,² and almost all divines after Aquinas; but Laurentius Valla¹ will, at no hand, endure it: "Nam jus naturale dicere quod natura omnia animalia docuit, ridiculum:" "It is ridiculous to affirm that to be the law of nature, which nature teaches to all living creatures;" such as are, conjunction of sexes for conservation of the kind, nursing and educating children, abstinence from some certain mixtures and copulations, abhorring the conjunction of some very near persons. Concerning which it is, therefore, certain, that though the matter of these laws is hugely agreeable to nature, and some of them are afterwards made into laws, and, for their matter sake and early sanction, are justly called natural, (as I have elsewhere discoursed,^m) yet they are made laws in nature only "dispositivè," that is, by nature they are made candidates of laws, they are prepared by nature, but completed by God in other ways than by our nature and creation.

9. The reason is, because that which is natural is one, but these laws admit variety; and amongst wise nations, in several cases, have and have not obligation. The religious, and the priests, and wise men among the Persians, did not account themselves bound by all these, as I shall discourse in the following numbers; and yet they were then to be reckoned amongst the wisest men in the world, because of their great empire and government, which, by reason of their great necessities and communications with mankind, cannot be done without its proportion of wisdom. But if nature did make these into a law, that is, if it comes by creation, and from thence also the penalty and coercion is derived, (for without these there is no law,) then it were impossible the wise Persians should think it commendable to do that which others called abominable, since in all those things in which they do a thing which they call unlawful, they, as other men, felt an equal sharpness and pungency of conscience.

10. But that I may speak closer to the particular, that a thing is common to men and beasts is no indication of a law of nature, but only of a common necessity, instinct, or inclination respectively. For they do it without a law, and, therefore, so may we, unless something else besides nature makes it a law to us; for nature or natural desire in them and us is the same; but this desire is in them where a law cannot be, and, therefore, in us also it may be without a law. Beasts do all they can do, and can love, and are no more capable of law than of reason; and if they have instincts and inclinations, it is no otherwise than their appetites to meat, concerning which nature hath determined all, but without proper obligation: and all those discourses concerning the abstinence of beasts, their gratitude, their hospitality, their fidelity, their chastity and marriages, are just like the discourses of those that would make them reasonable. More certain and true is that which was said of old,

Ἰχθύσι μὲν καὶ θηρσὶ καὶ οἰωνοῖς πετεηνόις,
Ἔσθειν ἀλλήλους, ἐπεὶ οὐ δίκη ἐστὶ μετ' αὐτοῖς.

"Fishes, and birds, and beasts eat one another, because they have no justice or laws amongst them," said Hesiod; and the like is in Homer, Ὅς οὐκ ἔστι λῆουσι καὶ ἀνδράσιν ὄρκια πιστά. II. χ.

And, therefore, although it is a good popular argument, which is used against unnatural conjunctions, which is in the Greek epigram,ⁿ

Δέρκεο τῶν ἀλόγων ζώων γένος· οὐ γὰρ ἐκείνων
Φύσις ἀτιμάζει θέσμια συζυγίης, &c.

"Abstain from such impurities, for the very beasts preserve their natural customs and conjunctions inviolate;" yet this is an infinitely uncertain and fallacious way of estimating any particular laws of nature, because it may as well be said to be against the law of nature to be drunk as to be incestuous, upon this account, because cows will drink no more than to quench their thirst; and although in the law of Moses, beasts were put to death if they were instrumental in bestiality or murder, yet this was in "pœnam Domini," or a matter of dominion over beasts; and the word "pœna," or "punishment," was improper, and no otherwise to be understood than that of Suidas, in his story of Nicon, whose statue when an envious person had whipped, to disgrace his memory, because in the Greek games he had won fourteen hundred crowns, the statue fell upon his head and crushed him to death. Τοῦ δὲ οἱ παῖδες ἐπέξισαν φόνον ἐπὶ τῇ εἰκόνι, καὶ οἱ Θάσιοι καταποντοῦσιν αὐτὴν κατὰ τὸν νόμον τοῦ Δράκοντος Ἀθηναίου. "His sons accused the statue as guilty of murder, and the Thasians threw it into the sea; for so was the law of Draco, the Athenian," ὑπερορίζειν φονεύοντας καὶ τὰ ἄψυχα, "to banish every thing that killed a man, though it were wood, stones, or hatchets;" as you may see in Demosthenes.^o These things were tragical detestations and emblematical prosecutions of the crime; but the men were wiser than to believe it really a punishment to inanimate things. The same is true of beasts in their proportion, whose cruelty, savageness, or violent revenges, is not κακία, but οἰονεὶ κακία, as Origen^p calls it, "it is like pravity or wickedness."

11. This thing is so much the more considerable, because it is of use against the pretences and scruples of some persons in things where they ought to be confident. St. Jerome says, that beasts, when they are impregnated, abstain from coition till the production of their young, and that this they do by the law of nature; now, upon this account, to impose a law upon mankind to do so too, is weak and dangerous. But yet not only he,¹ but Origen,² St. Ambrose,³ and Sedulius,⁴ do argue to the same purpose upon that very ground; most weakly and dangerously exposing married persons to the greater dangers of fornication, and depriving them of all the endearments of society, not considering that those creatures, and those men whose custom was otherwise, or laws different, had "vagam libidinem," or the evil remedy of polygamy. Beasts indeed are so ordered by nature, but without a law; as there is no law for lions to eat flesh, or oxen grass, but yet naturally they do it. A beast may be cruel or lustful, or monstrous and prodigious in the satisfaction of his appetites; but not injurious, or the breaker of any sanction, or laws of justice. There may be "damnum sine injuriâ facientis datum," says the law,⁵ and it is instanced in beasts; "Neque enim potest animal injuriam fecisse dici, quod sensu caret:"—"A beast that hath no sense," (that is, no reason,) "or perception of lawful and unlawful, cannot be said to do an injury;"—and therefore is not capable of punishment, because he is incapable of a law. So Justin Martyr, or whoever is the author of the questions and answers placed in his works; τὸ ἐπὶ φανλότῃ πράξεως διαβάλλειν τῶν ἀλόγων τὰς φύσεις, οὐκ ἔστιν εὐλογον. "It is unreasonable to exact of beasts the obliquity of their actions, because they have no reason;" it is therefore as unreasonable to make the law of nature to be something common to them and us.

12. If it be replied, that the lawyers and philosophers mean only, that these material instances, which are common to them and us, are the particulars of the law of nature, and though they be not a law to them, yet the same things which they do naturally, are natural to us, and a law besides, that is, the natural law: besides that this is not usually said by them, we are then never the nearer to know what is the law of nature by this description of it, for all things which they and we do, are not pretended to be laws; as eating and sleeping; and therefore, by what measure any other thing should be a law to us, because they and we do it, is not signified by this definition, or any explication of it. Let us then try the other measures which are usual.

Invited by Consent.

13. The consent of nations, that is, public fame amongst all or the wisest nations, is a great signification of decency or indecency, and a probable indication of the law of nature.

Φήμη δ' οὐτις πάμπαν ἀπόλλυται, ἥντινα πολλοὶ
Λαοὶ φημίζουσι——— HESIOD.

It is not a vain noise, when many nations join their voices in the attestation or detestation of an action; and it looks as if it were derived from some common principle, which seems either to be nature, or contract; and then, as in the first case, they are reasonable,—so, in the second, they are directly obligatory. "Quod apud multos unum invenitur, non est erratum sed traditum," said Tertullian;^x like that of Heraclitus, τὰ κοινῇ φαινόμενα πιστὰ,—if it seems so to the communities of mankind, it is genuine, and natural, and without illusion.

14. Now this is true up to many degrees of probability; and yet it is rather an index of a permission of nature, than of a natural obligation; it tells us rather what we may do, than what we must, it being more probable that all nations will not consent to an unnatural thing, that is, will not do violence to nature, than that whatsoever they commonly act should be a necessary law, and the measures of nature, or the indication of her sanctions; and yet it is still more probable that the consent of nations is more fit to be used as a corroborative to a persuasion or a kind of actions, than as the prime motive or introduction. Κράτιστον πάντας ἀνθρώπους φαίνεσθαι συνομολογοῦντας τοῖς ῥηησομένοις, said Aristotle; and "argumentum est veritatis aliquid omnibus videri," said Seneca; it is a great strengthening and a powerful prevailing argument to have all men consent to our opinions and propositions. But it is in many moral instances as it is in the universal opinion, which all mankind hath concerning jewels, where they consent no man knows how, or why; and no man can give a rational account why so great value should be set upon a diamond, but because it looks prettily and is lasting; and so there are in nature decencies and lasting proportions in moral instances between the conscience and the action; but yet as there is no proper and effective usefulness in diamonds towards the life of man, so neither is there in many instances in which the consent of mankind is very general. And therefore, this is very far short of a law, and is no certain token of a permissive right of nature, much less of a law or obligation. For,

15. (1.) Whole empires have been established and united by violence, and have laws given to them, and they received them in pursuance of the conqueror's interest, and their educations have been formed accordingly. Ninus formed the Assyrian monarchy, and his son was flattered into the reputation of a god, and all the nations under that sceptre consented to the worship of Belus; and all the nations with whom these men conversed, imitated the manners of the "princeps populus," and in their banquets, the most modest of their women used to strip themselves stark naked; and it was counted no indecency, but she was rude and uncivil that did not.

16. (2.) There are some nations so wholly barbarous and brutish in their manners, that from their consent we can gather nothing but thorns and wild briars: they are the words of Porphyry, ἐξ ὧν οὐ προσήκει τοὺς εὐγνώμονας τῆς ἀνθρωπίνης καταψεύδεσθαι φύσεως, "from whom we must not learn to belie and abuse the fair inclinations and sentences of human nature." And therefore, if we go to account by the consent of nations, we must thrust out all wild, savage, barbarous, and untaught people, νόμιμον ἔθνικόν ἐστιν, οὐχὶ τὸ βαρβαρῶδες· τὸ γὰρ τοῦ ἔθνους ὄνομα νομικῶς εἰρημένον γενῶν συλλήπτικόν ἐστι νόμοις ὑποκειμένων, said Michael Psellus;⁷ “We must into the account of the law of nations take them only who are subject to laws, the well mannered people only:” but then this also will be an infinite uncertainty. For,

17. (3.) All nations to the Greeks were barbarous; to the Romans also, all nations but the Greeks and themselves: and to the Jews all were heathens, which to them signified the same thing or worse.

18. (4.) And then which are those nations whom we shall call “Moratiores,” wise and “well mannered people?” for this will depend upon our own customs; if they be like our customs, our laws, and manners of living, then we approve them; else we condemn them.

19. (5.) But then let us remember also that civility and fair customs were but in a narrow circle, till the Greeks and the Romans beat the world into better manners. Aristotle says,² that, in his time, in the kingdoms of Pontus, which were very near to Greece, divers nations were eaters of man’s flesh, such as were the Achæans and Heniochans, and divers amongst the Mediterraneans were worse than they.

20. (6.) The greatest part of the world were undiscovered till this last age; and amongst them the “Jus gentium” was to sacrifice one another to dæmons; for all the old navigations were by maritime towns, and the in-lands either were left alone in their own wilder manners, or it is not known what civilities they had. So that the “Jus gentium” must needs have been an uncertain thing, variable and by chance, growing by accidents, and introduced by violence, and therefore could not be the measure of the law of nature.

21. (7.) Add to these, that the several nations of the world had customs of their own, which commencing upon uncertain principles, have been derived to their posterity, and retained with a religious fancy; becoming natural and proportionable to their fancies and their fears, and they would rather die than do an act of violence to them, and believed it to be the greatest impiety in the world to break them. Herodotus³ tells a full instance of this in a trial made by Darius to the Indians and Greeks. He asked the Greeks, “what they would take to do as the Indians did, who ate their dead parents^b and friends, and accounted it the most honourable burial?” they answered, “They would not do it at any price.” And when he asked the Indians, “upon what conditions they would be induced to burn the bodies of their fathers, and not to eat them,” they desired him not to speak to them of any such horrid impiety as to burn their fathers’ carcasses, and to deny to them the honour of a natural burial in the bowels of their dear children.—ἔθος Δαίμων. “Custom is the genius or spirit of a man’s actions, and introduces a nature, a facility, a delight, and religion itself. Καὶ γὰρ τὸ εἰθισμένον, ὥσπερ πεφυκὸς ἡδὴ γίγνεται ὁμοιον γὰρ τι τὸ ἔθος τῇ φύσει· ἐγγὺς γὰρ τὸ πολλάκις τῷ αἰεῖ· ἐστὶ δ’, ἡ μὲν φύσις, τοῦ αἰεῖ·

τὸ δὲ ἔθος, τοῦ πολλάκις.^b Custom is as nature, and that to which we are accustomed is like that which we were born. “For that which is often, is next to that which is always.” It is nature which is always, that is custom which is frequent. It is possible, that nature, in many things, should be altered, and it is very difficult that custom should, in any thing; we have seen and heard it in a great instance in a few ages last past. For when some of the reformed doctors, by their private authority, did twice attempt it, and the church of Rome did twelve times publicly endeavour it, to get the Greeks to forsake the customs of their churches, and to reform themselves by their copy,—they were all repulsed; and if the Greek prelates should take the people off from their old customs, besides that the great Turk would do them a mischief for complying with the western christians his enemies, the people themselves would endanger all their religion and turn Turks, if they once did learn that their old customs were not necessary religion: and therefore they chose to stick secure in their religion, though allayed with some errors, than, for the purchase of a less necessary truth, endanger the whole religion by taking the people off from their “jura gentis,” the “customs of their nation.”

22. (8.) Some nations do refuse to admit of some of those laws, which others call “the laws of nature,” and such which indeed were given to all the nations of the world.

Non fœdera legum

And excepting the care of children, to which by natural likeness and endearments we love to be obliged, and so less stand in need to be tied to it by a law, excepting this I say, to which beasts also do as well as we, some wise persons have observed that in all things else we are at liberty, that is, naturally tied to no law.

But the instances will make greater indication of this than any man’s affirmative. The Idumæans are thieves and murderers, and will not believe that they do amiss: the manner of their nation is to live very much upon robbery, and plundering merchants; and in Homer’s time, there was a nation of pirates; οὐκ ἄδοξον ἦν παρὰ τοῖς παλαιοῖς τὸ ληστεύειν, ἀλλ’ ἐνδοξον, said the scholiast upon Homer’s Odyssey τ; “They thought it no disparagement to steal, but an honourable and a glorious thing;” and it is worse now, and hath been growing so ever since Nimrod’s time. Men account it lawful to kill and steal, if they do it by nations, by companies, and armies, and navies: and Cato had reason to complain, “Fures privatorum furtorum, in nervo atque in compedibus ætatem agunt, fures publici, in auro atque in purpurâ;”—and particularly A. Gellius^c tells of the Egyptians that they allow of thefts; and the wiser Lacedæmonians, a sober and a severe people, taught their young men to steal without covetousness; so they pretended, not to enrich themselves, but to encourage them to fight the better by plundering well. Pomponius Mela^d tells of the Augitæ, a nation in Africa, whose custom it was that every bride should be prostitute to all comers the first night, and she who had entertained most, was most honoured: and Solinus^e tells of the Garamantici, that they know no marriages; and therefore children only own their mothers, for they can hardly guess at their fathers. And indeed the old world did do such vile things, contracted such base customs, so delighted in wickedness, that as they highly provoked God to anger, so they left it impossible to judge of the laws of nature by the consent of nations. Catullus complains severely of this popular impiety:

Sed postquam tellus scelere est imbuta nefando,
Justitiamque omnes cupidâ de mente fugârunt;
Perfudère manus fraterno sanguine fratres;
Destitit extinctos natus lugere parentes;
Optavit genitor primævi funera nati,
Liber ut innuptæ potiretur flore novæ;
Ignaro mater subternens se impia nato,
Impia non verita est divos scelerare penates:
Omnia fanda, nefanda, malo permixta furore
Justificam nobis mentem avertere Deorum.^f

"The whole earth grew so impure and degenerate, that they drove justice from them as their enemy: brothers washed their hands in their brothers' blood; the sons mourned not at their father's funeral; and the father wished the death of his eldest son, that he might lie with his son's wife; the mothers would steal secretly into the embraces of their sons; and they feared not to break the laws of hospitality, or custom, or nature, or societies."—Now from hence it will be impossible to derive our customs, and so to suppose them to be laws of nature, which are openly destructive of justice. And upon this last instance it appears that the saying of Polybius will be of no use to us in this question: δεῖ δὲ σκοπεῖν ἐν τοῖς κατὰ φύσιν ἔχουσι μᾶλλον τὸ φύσει, καὶ μὴ ἐν τοῖς διεφθαρμένοις. That "for the laws of nature we must seek amongst them that live according to nature, not amongst them whose natures are depraved by custom;"—since as Andronicus of Rhodes was wont to say, "He lies not that says honey is sweet, though a sick man refuses it as bitter and unpleasant;" so is the law of nature perfect and immutable in those nations who are endued with a sound mind and a sober judgment. This indeed is true, but how this can be reduced to practice, will be found inexplicable, and the thing itself impossible, since the Lacedæmonians, the wisest and severest amongst all commonwealths, permitted such natural injustices, and would breed children upon their own wives by strangers, that they might have a good and a handsome breed.

23. (9.) Some tyrants have made laws to serve their lusts, or their necessities; and these things have come into customs, and laws of nations, and sometimes have been suppressed, or spent in desuetude. It was the case of Seleucus,^g who, in the necessity of his son Antiochus, gave him his own wife, and made it a law for the future; which thing either was instantly disgraced and rejected, or else St. Paul had not heard, or had not taken notice of it; for he thought it such a fornication as was "not so much as named amongst the gentiles, that one should have his father's wife:" indeed, it was not named "inter cordatiores," or those with whom he had conversed; but in Syria, and in the Pontic kingdom before his time, it had been named, and practised, and passed into a law; and yet that kingdom consisted of two and twenty nations of distinct languages. There was another instance like it spoken of by Cicero,^h that a woman married her daughter's husband, which exactly was the same undecency and incestuous approach. "Nubit genero socrus, auspiciis nullis, nullis auctoribus, funestis ominibus. O mulieris scelus incredibile, et, præter hanc unam, in omni vitâ inauditum!" Something like St. Paul's ἥτις οὐδὲ ὀνομάζεται, but yet sometimes it was done, and not only before his time, but long after this monition also, as it was in the case of Antonius Caracalla: "Matrem duxit uxorem; ad parricidium junxit incestum:" so Spartianus. Now concerning these things, how can any man from hence take an estimate of the law of nature; for this cannot be of the law of nature, which hath in it so unreasonable and unnatural complications: and yet by what rule shall we judge of nature's law, since the wisest persons, even Socrates and Cato, did such things which they thought fit, and we call unreasonable,—for they gave their wives to their friends, as a man lends his beast for his neighbour's use.

24. (10.) There are some nations so used to a rude unmannerly pride and fierceness, that all civility seems softness and effeminacy. To this purpose is that which Tacitus reports of the son of Phraates the Parthian, who being bred up with Tiberius and efformed into the Roman civilities, was, by the prince his friend, sent to the kingdom of Parthia; but in the young gentleman Vonon there were presently observed easiness of access, a fair civil deportment and affability; "obvia comitas:" but these virtues, being unknown to the Parthians, were "nova vitia;" and because they were unknown to their ancestors, "perinde odium pravis et honestis," the good and the bad amongst them did equally detest them.

25. (11.) Some nations have left their good customs and taken up bad, and have changed their natural reason into unnatural follies, and the basest sins have been very general; and when God warned the Jews to take heed of the manners of their neighbour nations, he enumerates vile lusts, which were the national customs, for which God affirms that he ejected them from their habitations.

26. (12.) Lastly, there is no consent among nations in their customs, nor ever was, until a higher principle made a law and tied it on with penalties; such as were conquest, necessity, contract, reputation, decrees of princes, or the laws of God, or of a religion. *νόμος καὶ δίκη ἄνω καὶ κάτω φέρεται διασπώμενα καὶ σπαρασσώμενα,*ⁱ and neither nation with nation, nor man with man, nor a man with himself does long agree.

27. Indeed there are some propositions which all the world agrees upon, such as are, the immortality of the soul, and that there is a God. Ταῦτα ὁ Ἕλλην λέγει, καὶ ὁ βάρβαρος λέγει, καὶ ὁ Ἑπειρώτης, καὶ ὁ θαλάττιος, καὶ ὁ σοφὸς, καὶ ὁ ἄσοφος.^k "The Greek and the barbarian, the Epirot and the maritime, the wise and the unwise, agree in the belief and profession of a God:" but when these things come to manners and customs, they differ infinitely; and as they anciently chose several gods, so they did not agree in the manner of worshipping their gods; some they worshipped by praises, and some by railing, some by giving sacrifice, some by throwing stones; and so it was in other things. Some were observant of their parents,—and some knocked them on the head with clubs when they came to a certain age, as is to be seen in Ælian; and even in the taking care and educating their children, in which nature seems most to have made a law, and signified it with the consent of nations, yet even in this also there was variety, and no universal law naturally established. For some nursed their children, and some did not; sometimes they were left to their mothers without any provision made by their fathers; sometimes the fathers took them from their mothers; but however, yet this cannot be properly derived from a "jus gentium;" for if it be a right or a law at all, it is a "lex singulorum," it "belongs to single persons" and to families, and is common to man and beast, and hath a necessity in nature, as it is necessary to eat or sleep, and is as necessary to families as the other are to single persons: but where there is a necessity, there needs no law, and cannot properly be any.

28. From all which I conclude that the "jus gentium," the law of nations, is no indication of the law of nature;^l neither indeed is there any "jus gentium" collectively at all; but only the distinct laws of several nations; and, therefore, it is to be taken distributively; for they are united only by contract, or imitation, by fear, or neighbourhood, or necessity, or any other accident which I have mentioned. And in those things in which they have agreed tacitly, or expressly, they have no obligation but what they bring upon themselves, as penalties, forfeitures, obloquies, and the like: which they as easily shake off when they have power, and when it is for their profit; and we see it in those who have killed heralds or ministers of peace and of religion; which we say commonly is against the law of nations; that is, it is against the custom of them, because to do so is to no purpose, a spleenish ineffective malice; and therefore, although of no usefulness, and consequently seldom done, yet it hath been sometimes, and no punishment follows, and therefore it is no law.

29. Now that this opinion may not wholly seem new, I find something of it affirmed by Constantinus Harmenopolus,^m ἔθνικὸς δὲ νόμος ἐστὶν ᾧτινι ἔθνος ἐν, ἢ ἔθνη χρωρταί τινα. "The law of nations is that which one or more nations use;"—and he instances in not marrying their nearest kindred, amongst the Greeks and Sauræ, [Sarmatæ, I suppose,] or else to marry them as the Persians use. But this only, where it happens that nations do consent in great proportions, it confirms our assent to the law, and publishes its being natural, in case that of itself it be so.

Prompted by Reason.

30. Ciceroⁿ defines the law of nature to be, "Vera ratio naturæ congruens, diffusa in omnes, constans, sempiterna:" "That right reason which is consonant to nature, which is in every one always and the same, that is the law of nature:" so he, and from him Lactantius; but that is not exactly true. Right reason is the instrument of using the law of nature, and is that by which, together with the conscience, (which is all reason,) we are determined to a choice and prosecution of it ourselves, or to a willingness of obeying the obliging power. τοὺς θεῖους νόμους ὑποδέχεται λογισμὸς, καὶ δικαστὴς ἀγρυπνὸς γίνεται. "Reason entertains the Divine laws of nature, and so is made a most vigilant judge," said Hierocles.—This is that which distinguishes us from beasts, and makes us capable of laws:

———Separat hæc nos

Sortiti ingenium, divinorumque capaces,
Atque exercendis, capiendisq; artibus apti,
Sensum à cœlesti demissum traximus arce. Juv. Sat. 15.

But reason is not the law, or its measure; neither can any man be sure, that any thing is a law of nature, because it seems to him hugely reasonable; neither if it be so indeed, is it therefore a law. For it is very reasonable that every man should choose his own wife, because his interest is the greatest: that every man should suffer as much evil as he does; that a man be not punished for evils that he cannot help; that every man should suffer for his own fault, and no man for the fault of another; and yet these are not laws in all places where they are reasonable. Pythagoras in Laertius said that which was very reasonable: "Plantæ mansuetæ non nocendum, veluti neque animali, quod non noceat hominibus;" "A man may not hurt a gentle and a sweet plant, much less, a harmless and a profitable beast."—Truly, it is unreasonable a man should; but if he does, he breaks no law by the mere doing such an action. For reason can demonstrate, and it can persuade and invite, but not compel any thing but assent, not obedience, and therefore it is no law.

31. But besides this, reason is such a box of quicksilver that it abides no where; it dwells in no settled mansion; it is like a dove's neck, or a changeable taffata; it looks to me otherwise than to you, who do not stand in the same light that I do: and if we inquire after the law of nature by the rules of our reason, we shall be uncertain as the discourses of the people, or the dreams of disturbed fancies. For some having (as Lucian calls it)

“weighed reasons in a pair of scales,” thought them so even, that they concluded no truth to be in the reasonings of men; or if there be, they knew not on which side it stood, and then it is as if it were not at all; these were the Sceptics: and when Varro reckoned two hundred eighty-eight opinions concerning the chiefest good or end of mankind, that were entertained by the wisest and most learned part of mankind, it is not likely that these wise men should any more agree about the intricate ways and turnings that lead thither, when they so little could agree about the journey’s end, which all agreed could have in it no variety, but must be one, and ought to stand fair in the eyes of all men, and to invite the industry of all mankind to the pursuit of it.

32. And it is certain, that the basest of things have been by some men thought so reasonable, that they really chose it, and propounded it to others. And this is the less wonder, when we consider, that in defiance of all the consenting reasons, and faith of all the nations of the world, some few single persons, wittier than folly, but not so wise as reason or religion, should say that there is no God: such were Diagoras Milesius, Theodorus Cyrenaicus, Protagoras; and it is thought, Lucian also: but they that think so, must also consequently believe that nothing is dishonest that they can do in private, or with impunity. Some have believed that there is nothing in itself just, but what is profitable: so did Carneades, (whom I before noted out of Lactantius,) and so did Aristippus.

33. Now here it is not sufficient to say, that in this inquest after the law of nature by the proportions of reason, we must exclude all unreasonable, brutish, and monstrous persons. For first the question will return, who those are which are unreasonable? and we are not to reject the opinion upon pretence it is unreasonable, unless we first know some certain measures of reason: now we cannot take our measures of reason from nature; or if we do, we cannot take the measures of nature from reason: that is, if we call men unreasonable because they speak unnatural things, then it must be certain that what is natural or unnatural, is known some other way than by the proportions of reason; for the reason being misled for its disproportion to nature, the laws of nature must be foreknown, and therefore are not to be proved by that which comes after: besides this, I say, the wisest of men in their profession, and such as were no fools in their persons, so far as can appear by all their other discourses, have believed the worst of crimes to be innocent, and to have in them no natural dishonesty. Theodorus allowed of sacrilege, and so do thousands who at this day call themselves christians: Plato allowed adultery, and community of wives; so did Socrates and Cato. Zeno and Chrysippus approved of incest, and so did the Persians: so that we may well say as Socrates to Phædon; “when we hear the name of silver or iron, all men that speak the same language, understand the same thing; but when we speak of good and evil, we are distracted into various apprehensions, and differ from each other and from ourselves.” We say as Pilate said of truth, “What is truth?” we cannot tell what is true, and what is good, and what is evil: and every man makes his own opinions to be laws of nature, if his persuasion be strong and violent. Tertullian complained that the old philosophers did so: “leges naturæ opinionones suas facit philosophia.” And yet it is without all peradventure, that all laws which are commonly called natural are most reasonable; they are perfective of nature, unitive of societies, necessary to common life, and therefore most agreeable to reason. But if you make an ἀνάλυσις of these, and reckon backward, you cannot wisely and demonstratively reckon from reason, or consent, or natural inclinations, up to natural laws.

But the last clause of the rule finishes this whole question.

Bound upon us by the Command of God.

34. For when God made man a free agent, he by nature gave him power to do all that he could desire; and all that is “jus naturale,” “a natural right or power:” and it needs no instances; for it is every thing he could desire in eating and drinking, and pleasures, and rule, and possession: but the law was superinduced upon this. Right is liberty, but law is a fetter: nature is free to every thing which it naturally desires, τὸ ἐλεύθερον τοῦ μηδενὸς ὑπήκοον, ἀλλὰ πράττειν ἀπλῶς τὰ δοκούντα αὐτῷ, said Dio Chrysostomus: “That is the right of nature, to be free, to be subject to no law, to do absolutely whatsoever pleases us.” This is φυσικὴ εὐχέρεια, (as the law calls it,) συγχωροῦσα πράττειν ἃ βούλεται, “A natural liberty permitting us to do what we list.”—“Libertatis proprium est sic vivere ut velis,” said Cicero;^p “It is not liberty unless you live as you please:” but servitude is not by nature, therefore liberty is.^q For where nature hath an appetite, and proper tendency, it cannot deny to itself satisfaction; whatsoever therefore is a law and a restraint to it, must needs be superinduced upon it: which nature herself cannot be supposed to be willing to do; and nothing had power to do but God only, who is the Lord of nature.

—Κρονίων

Ἀνθρώποισι δ' ἔδωκε δίκην, ἢ πολλὸν ἀρίστη. HESIOD.

It was God that gave justice to mankind: he made justice by his sanction.—This was expressly the sentence of Cicero, speaking of the law of nature “Est recta ratio à numine Deorum tracta, imperans honesta, et prohibens contraria:” and again “Lex vera atque princeps, apta ad jubendum et ad vetandum, ratio est recta summi Jovis.” The law of nature is a transcript of the wisdom and will of God written in the tables of our minds, not an εὑρημα βίου καὶ χρόνου, a product of experience but written with the finger of God, first in the tables of our hearts. But those tables we, like Moses, brake with letting them fall out of our hands, upon occasion of the evil manners of the world: but God wrought them again for us, as he did for Moses, by his Spirit, in all the ages of the world, more or less, by arts of instruction and secret insinuation, by all the ways proportioned to a reasonable nature; till from an inclination it came to a firm persuasion, and so to a law: God, in this, ruling in our hearts something after the manner by which he reigns in heaven, even by significations of what is fit, by inspirations and congenite notices, by natural necessities: but this thing was yet no law till God also had signified it to men, after the manner of men, that is, by discourse and human communications, by something that taught them, and obliged them.

35. The sense of this is, that religion is the first and greatest bond of laws, and necessity is the next: for though many times it prevails more than religion, yet it is not always incumbent; and that, which is necessary to society, is inconvenient in some cases; and when power comes in, and need goes out, there is nothing which can make or continue the law: and it were impossible, that all the world should acknowledge any lawgiver but God; for nothing else could be greater than all mankind, nor be trusted in all cases, nor feared, but he alone. And therefore the heathen princes, when they gave their laws, gave them in the name of a deity. So Numa, Lycurgus, and others; which was not a design to scare fools and credulous people, but in some instances, (excepting only that they named a false god,) was a real truth; that is, in all those things which commanded natural justice, honesty, and decencies: for these were really the laws of the true God.

36. For the law of nature is nothing but the law of God, given to mankind for the conservation of his nature, and the promotion of his perfective end. A law of which a man sees a reason and feels a necessity: God is the lawgiver. Practical reason or conscience is the record, but revelation and express declaring it was the first publication and emission of it, and till then it had not all the solemnities of law, though it was passed in the court, and decreed, and recorded.

37. And this is the perfect meaning of those words of St. Paul, "But for the law I had not known sin;" that is, although by natural reason and the customs of the world I had, or might have, reasons to dislike many actions; yet till the law declared it, I could not call any thing a sin, and if St. Paul could not, neither could the gentiles: their nature was alike, and St. Paul had advantage in education, and yet his nature could not instruct him in the names and differences of good and evil: therefore, neither could the gentiles know it merely by nature. But yet a man may "become a law unto himself:" so St. Paul observes of the gentiles, who, "not having a law, do by nature the things contained in the law, and so become a law unto themselves." So does every man who believes any thing to be necessary, though it be not so: yet "he becomes a law to himself," because, by his conscience and persuasion, he makes to himself a law or obligation: much more might the gentiles do so; in whose nature the aptnesses to justice and disposition to laws were concreated with their understandings. Well might they "become a law unto themselves" in these natural instances; for if opinion can make a law to ourselves in an unlawful matter, much more may it do so in a matter that is so agreeable to our nature, so fitting, so useful, so prepared to become a law, that it wants only the life of authority, sanction, and publication: but though the gentiles became a law unto themselves, by this means, yet their natural reason was not yet framed into a law, till God's authority, either by his express declaration, or by the conscience of the man, that is, directly or indirectly, did intervene: "testimonium reddente conscientia," so St. Paul; "their conscience bearing witness:" for either God published these laws by express declaration and voices, or else by imprinting upon the conscience such fears and opinions, that passed upon the man the reverence and obligation of laws. In both these there was variety; though in the latter there was, amongst the better sort of men, a more regular and universal influence and effect: and although it is very probable that all the measures of justice and natural laws of honesty were expressly published to the patriarchs of the great families of the world, yet when some of the posterity lost their tradition, these laws were maintained by more imperfect relations, and kept up by fears and secret opinions which the Spirit of God, who is never wanting to men in things necessary, was pleased, in his love to mankind, to put into the hearts of men, that men might be governed by instruments which would not fail.

38. Thus St. Jerome affirms,^r that Pharaoh knew his sins by the law of nature: and of this it was that Tertullian affirmed,^s "Ante legem Moysi scriptam in tabulis lapideis, legem fuisse contendo non scriptam, quæ naturaliter intelligebatur et à patribus custodiebatur: nam unde Noe justus inventus est, si non illum naturalis legis justitia præcedebat? Unde Abraham amicus Dei deputatus, si non de æquitate et justitiâ legis hujus naturalis?" By this the fathers lived, by this Noah was found just, and Abraham the friend of God: for this, though not written in tables of stone, yet it was written in the tables of their hearts; that is, it was, by God, so imprinted in their consciences, that they were, by it, sufficiently instructed how to walk and please God: and this is that which was said by Antigonius, in Sophocles, and which Apollonius did use against the edict of Nero.

Οὐ γὰρ τί μοι Ζεὺς ἦν ὁ κηρύξας τούδε,

"This is a thing which neither heaven nor hell hath taught by any new or express sanction: for God hath given us other laws. But never did I think that thy commands could ever prevail so, that it could be possible that thou, being a mortal man, should prevaricate the unwritten and potent laws of God. For these laws are not of to-day or yesterday, but they are eternal, and their principle is secret, and from within."

39. And therefore Philo says, the law of nature is a law, ἡπὶ ἀθανάτου φύσεως ἐν ἀθανάτῳ διανοίᾳ τυπωθεῖς, "engraven in an immortal understanding by an immortal nature." In this whole affair, God is as the sun, and the conscience as the eye: or else God, or some angel from him, being the "intellectus agens," did inform our reason, supplying the place of natural faculties, and being a continual monitor, (as the Jews generally believe, and some christians, especially about three or four ages since,) which Adam de Marisco was wont to call "Elias's crow:" something flying from heaven with provisions for our needs. And the gloss, and Gulielmus Parisiensis, and, before them, Maimonides, from whom, I suppose, they had it,—affirm this to be the meaning of David, in the fourth Psalm, "Offer the sacrifice of righteousness;" it follows, "Quis monstrabit?" "Who will show us any good?" who will tell us what is justice, and declare the measures of good and evil? He answers, "Signatum est super nos lumen vultus tui, Domine," "thou hast consigned the light of thy countenance upon us," "ut scilicet," as it is in another Psalm, "in lumine tuo videamus lumen," "that in thy light we may see light."

40. The effect of all which, is this only,—That God is our Lawgiver, and hath made our hearts to be the tables of the laws of nature, that they might always be there under our eye, legible and clear. It is not a law for being placed there; but God first made or decreed it to be a law, and then placed it there for use and promulgation: and although very many men and nations had no intercourse with God as a Lawgiver, but what they have by the means of their conscience, that is, they never heard God speak, had no prophets, no revelation, and have forgot the tradition of their fathers; yet when God, by ways undiscernible, hath written a proposition there, and that the man does believe any thing to be good or evil: it is true that God is his Lawgiver, because he only is Lord of his conscience: but it is also true, that "he becomes a law unto himself:" that is, he becomes obliged to God by the act of his own conscience; and however it be that his conscience be wrought upon, though by a fancy or a fear, a sad sight or a casual discourse, if it works the conscience into the notice and obedience of a natural law, the meaner the instrument is, the greater is the efficacy of the principal agent. The putting it into the conscience is a sufficient promulgation of the law, however that be done; but nature alone never does it; the express voice of God, tradition, prophets, contract, providence, education, and all sorts of influence from God, and intercourse with man, have their portion in this effect. And when wise men say, "this is naturally understood;" it must mean thus,—naturally men find it reasonable, but not naturally to be a law; naturally they consent to it, but not naturally find it out; or naturally we may be instructed, but not naturally bound: but when God changes science into conscience, then he makes that which is reasonable to become a law.

41. But first or last, this way or another, it became a law only by the authority and proper sanction of God; God is the author of our nature, and made a law fit for it, and sent the principles of that law together with it: not that whatsoever is in nature or reason is therefore a law because it is reasonable, or because it is natural; but that God took so much of prime reason as would make us good and happy, and established it into a law; which became and was called the law of nature, both because, 1. These laws are "in materiâ naturali;" that is, concerning the good which refers to the prime necessities of nature; and also because, 2. Being divine in respect of the Author, the principles of this law are natural in respect of the time of their institution being together with our nature: though they were drawn out by God severally in several periods of the world, who made them laws actually by his command, which in nature are so only by disposition.

42. This latter reason is given by Alphonsus à Castro and by Wesenbech: the former is insinuated by Mynsinger, defining the law of nature to be "quod natura, adeoque Deus ipse, omnes homines in creatione, prima quædam præcepta et formulas honestatis docuit." But the latter of them, I say, is true only of such, as are the prime laws or rather rules of nature, and the general measures of virtue and vice. But as for the particular laws of nature, (which only are properly to be called laws,) we are to look for no other system or collective body of them, but the express declared laws of God which concern morality, that is, all that are given to all mankind without relation to any one period: such is the moral law of the Jews, and such is the religion of the christians; that less perfect, this more perfect and entire: for these in their several proportions are such which are generally for all mankind; and upon this account it is affirmed by Gratian,¹ "Jus naturale esse, quod in lege et evangelio continetur;" "The law of nature is that which is contained in the law and the gospel:"—which saying he had from Isidore.

43. It is necessary that this be rightly understood, because it establishes many certainties in the matter of conscience, and eases us of the trouble of finding out a particular system of natural laws, the inquiry after which hath caused many disputes in the world, and produced no certainty. It is all εὔρημα καὶ δῶρον Θεοῦ, νόμος καὶ λόγος, ὀρθὸς λόγος, Διὸς θέσμις, as the Platonists call it, νόμος τοῦ διανομή, "the word of God is the law, a right rule or sentence, and divine law, a law that is the distribution of the mind of God;" and under this come all the precepts of christianity: which was well summed up by him who gave this account of the religion, and the religious that are of it, saying they are "homines conspirantes in communem utilitatem;" and that they mutually make and give σύμβολα περὶ τοῦ μὴ ἀδικεῖν εἰς τὸ μὴ βλάπτειν

ἀλλήλους, μηδὲ βλάπτεισθαι, "Symbols and sacraments to each other, that none shall do or receive injury:" "men conspiring for the good of others:" or, as the Roman soldier was told, "They are men whose profession is to do hurt to no man, and to do good to every man:"—and this is the integral design of the law of nature, so far as it can relate to human intercourse.

44. Νόμος καὶ λόγος. So Christ is called by St. Peter and the Greek fathers, he is the "Word of the Father and the law:" and it is remarkable, this Word or Law of the Father was the instrument of teaching mankind in all periods of the world. He taught the law of nature to all men, and renewed it, and made several manifestations and manners, and at last appeared in the form of a man, and made a perfect body of it to last as long as our nature lasts, and as long as this world and his kingdom abides. When God spake to Adam, to the patriarchs, to the prophets, still he spake by Christ, who was the angel of the Old Testament, and the mediator of the New. He is, therefore, "verbum patris;" by him he signified his laws and righteous commandments, and the law was given, ἐν χειρὶ μεσίτου, "in the hands," that is, by the ministry, "of the Mediator, who is one: that is, Jesus Christ;"—and this Tertullian^a affirms. "Christus semper egit in Dei patris nomine. Ipse ab initio conversatus est, et congressus cum patriarchis et prophetis:"—and again,^x "Christus ad colloquia semper descendit, ab Adam usque ad patriarchas et prophetas, in visione, in somno, in speculo, in ænigmate, ordinem suum præstruens ab initio semper: et Deus internis cum hominibus conversatus est; non alius quam sermo qui caro erat futurus:" "Christ in all ages spake to men in the person of his Father, being from the beginning the Word of the Father, which was to be incarnate." The same also is to be read in Justin Martyr against Tryphon the Jew. "Christ, therefore, was the preacher of this righteousness, and at last revealed all his Father's will, which should never receive any further addition, diminution, or alteration." The "novellæ constitutiones," the enlargements and explications made by our blessed Lord, together with the repetition of the old, that is, the christian law, is the perfect code and digest of the natural law. For they all rely upon the fundamental relations between God and us, and the natural intercourse between man and man, and the original necessities and perfective appetites of our own nature.

45. But here it will be necessary to clear that great objection, which will be pretended against this doctrine. For since christian religion is new in respect of nature, and superinduced some things upon nature, and rescinded some of her rights, and restrained her liberty; it will seem impossible that christian religion should be a collected body of the laws of nature; because the law of nature is prime and eternal; which christian religion seems not to be. Now to this I answer:

46. (1.) That it is evident, that all that which any men call the laws of nature, is actually contained in the books of the New Testament. St. Austin, Hugo de St. Victore, and Alexander, say the law of nature hath but these two precepts: 1. Do as you will be done to; and 2. Do not that which you would not have done to yourself.—Isidore reckons into the laws of nature, 1. Conjunction of male and female; 2. Education; and 3. Succession of children: 4. Common possessions; and 5. Common liberty; and 6. Acquisition of things in air, earth, and sea: 7. Restoring the thing that is intrusted; 8. Repelling force by force. These are rights of nature, and natural states or actions, but not laws. There are some laws concerning these things, but they also are in the New Testament.—Cicero reckoned, 1. Religion; 2. Piety; 3. Thankfulness; 4. Vindication of injuries; 5. Observance of superiors; 6. To speak truth.—The lawyers reckon otherwise. The laws of nature are these, 1. To worship God; 2. To live honestly; 3. To obey superiors,—kings, parents, &c.; 4. To hurt no man; 5. To give every one his own; 6. Common use of things as far as it may be; and where it may not, then, 7. Dominion, and 8. Propriety, enter; 9. To take away evil-doers from among men.—And if we observe but the precepts of nature, (for they had no other light which we know of,) which are reckoned by Hesiod, Pythagoras, Theognis, Phocylides, Epictetus, Cato, Publianus, and Seneca, we shall find that they reckon many minute counsels, which are derived from natural principles, but yet stand far off from the fountain: and some which they derive from the rights of nature, not from her laws, but indeed are directly contrary.

—— Semper tibi proximus esto.

So Cato; and

Qui simulat verbis, nec corde est fidus amicus;
Tu quoque fac similes, sic ars deluditur arte.

And that of Cicero, "vindicationem esse honestam," "revenge is justice."—By their own reason, men took their aim at the precepts and laws of nature; but their reason being imperfect and abused, it was not likely they could be exact: none but the wisdom of the Father could do it perfectly. Thus they can never agree in their enumeration of the natural laws: but it is certain, that so many of these as are laws and bound upon us by God, are set down in the Scriptures of the New Testament. For it is not a law of nature, unless God have commanded it to us in, or by, or with, nature and natural reason. Now it is certain, that Christ told us all his Father's will; and the apostles taught all that to the church, which Christ taught to them: and therefore what is not in their doctrine, is not in nature's law, that is, it is no part of the law of God: and if it be certain, that he that lives according to the law of Christ, does please God and do all his duty; then it follows, that either there is no such thing as that which we call the law of nature, and no obligation from thence, and no measures of good and evil there;—or if there be, it is also part of the christian man's duty, and expressed and taught by the Master and Lord of the christians. All that is essentially good, is there; all that by which the world can be made happy, is there; all that which concerns every man's duty, is there; all the instruments of felicity, and the conveyance of our great hopes, is there;—and what other potentiality there can be in the law of nature, than what I have reckoned now, I neither have been taught by any man else, neither can I myself imagine or understand. Here are the general propositions, which are the form, and make the honesty, and the justice of all the particular laws of nature; and what is not there provided for by special provision, or by general reason and analogy, is wholly permitted to human laws and contracts, or to liberty and indifferency, that is, where the laws of nature cease, there the rights of nature return.

47. (2.) But secondly, to the objection I answer, that it will be but weakness, to think that all the instances of the law of nature must be as prime as nature herself: for they neither are so prime, nor so lasting, but are alterable by God and by men, and may be made more, or fewer, or other.

48. This may seem new, and indeed is unusual in the manner of speaking: but the case is evident and empirically certain. For when God commanded Abraham to kill his son; the Israelites to rob the Egyptians and to run away with their goods; he gave them a command to break an instance of the natural law: and he made it necessary that Cain should marry with his sister: and all those laws of nature which did suppose liberty and indistinction of possessions, are wholly altered when dominion, and servitude, and propriety, came into the world; and the laws of nature which are in peace, are not obligatory to other persons in the time of war.

49. For the laws of nature are, in many instances, relative to certain states; and therefore, in their instances and particulars, are as alterable as the states themselves; but the reasons indeed on which they do rely (supposing the same or equal circumstances and the matter unchanged) are eternal and unalterable as the constitution of nature. But, therefore, it was unwarily said of the learned Hugo Grotius, and of divers others before him, that "God cannot change the law of nature."—For, as St. Paul said of the priesthood, "it being changed, there must of necessity be a change also of the law," so it is in the law of nature; the matter of it being changed, there must of necessity also be a change in the law: for although the essential reason may be the same in changed instances, yet that hinders not but the law may justly be affirmed to be alterable; just as the law was under the several priesthoods, in both which the obligation is the same, and so is the relation to God, and the natural religion. Thus when rivers are common, it is lawful for any man to fish, and unlawful for my neighbour to forbid me; but when rivers are enclosed and made proper, it is unlawful for me to fish, and lawful for the proprietary to forbid me; before the enclosure it was just to do that thing, which afterward is unjust; and this is as much a change of a particular law as can be imagined. If it be meant, that while the propriety remains, or the state, the law introduced unto that state is unalterable; then there is no more said of the law of nature than of any positive law of God, or the wise law of any prince; which are not to be altered as long as the same case and the same necessity remains; and it would be to no purpose to affirm so of the law of nature; for the sense of it would be, that while things remain as God established them, they are unalterable. But God can disannul the obligation, by taking away the matter of the law, or the necessity, or the reasonableness, or the obligation, (and all this he can do one way or other,) it is not safe nor true to say "God cannot alter the law of nature." He changed the matter in suffering liberty to pass into servitude; he made necessity in one instance, I mean in the matter of incest in the case of Cain, and afterwards took it away: he took away the reasonableness of the sanction by changing the case in the subduction or mutation of the matter, and he took off the obligation in the case of Abraham, and of the Israelites robbing their neighbours.

50. And therefore, the christian laws superinduced some excellencies and perfections upon human nature, and laying restraint upon the first natural laws, that is, upon such which before this last period of the world were laws of nature, is no hard thing to be understood. God in it used but his own right. And I suppose it will be found to be unreasonable to expound the precepts of the religion by the former measures of nature, while she was less perfect, less instructed: but this rather; the former instances of the natural law are passed into the christian precepts, and the natural instance is changed, and the law altered in its material part, the formality of it remaining upon the supposition of a greater reason. Thus to repel force by force is a right of nature; and afterwards it was passed into a law that men might do it; that is, God expressly gave them leave; and although it be not properly a law which neither forbids nor commands but only gives a leave,—yet, when God hath forbidden men to do violence, and to establish this law he rather, gave leave to any man that could, to punish his unjust enemy that attempted to do him mischief, it may be called a law, in the lesser sense that is, a decree of the court of heaven by which this became lawful. Though this was passed into a law in the manner now explicated, yet it was with some restraints; which yet were not so great, but they left a great liberty, which was sufficient security against violence. The restraint which God superinduced upon this right of nature, was but "moderamen inculpatæ tutelæ;" it left men defended sufficiently against injuries, though it permitted us to be tied in some lesser instances and unavoidable accidents. But now although christianity hath proceeded in the first method of God, and restrained it yet more, and forbids us to strike him that strikes us, we are not to force this precept into a sense consisting with the former liberty which we call the law of nature; but was at first only a right of nature or a permissive law, but not obligatory; and afterwards suffered some restraints: for that which suffered some, may suffer more: and as the right of nature was, for its being restrained, recompensed in the provisions of laws, and by the hands of justice, taking it from the private into the public hand: so may this right of nature, when it is wholly taken from us, be recompensed by God's taking the ἐκδίκησις, or "the power of avenging" our quarrels, into his hands.

51. This right of nature being now almost wholly taken from us, part of it is taken up to God, and part of it is deposited in the hands of the civil power, but we have none of it; only by Christ's laws and graces our nature is more perfect and morality is set forward, and justice and all our rights are secured; but yet the law is changed. The like may be said in divers other instances, as I shall discourse in their several places: here it is sufficient to have given the first hint of it, and demonstrated the certainty and reasonableness of it, which (as appears by the instances) although it be especially and frequently true in the "jus naturæ" or the "permissive law of nature," and in those not only God, but men also, may make an alteration; yet even in those laws which are directly obligatory, the power of God who made them, cannot be denied to be equal in the alteration: and indeed he that can annul nature, can also at least alter her laws, which are consequent to nature, and intended only for her preservation.

52. The case seems to be the same with eating and drinking, which God hath made necessary for our life, as justice is to societies: but as he can take away the necessity from this person at this time to eat, and can supply it otherwise,—so he can also conserve human society in the mutation of cases and extraordinary contingencies, as well as in the ordinary effects of justice. Indeed God cannot do an unjust thing; because whatsoever he wills or does, is therefore just because he wills and does it; but his will being the measure of justice, and his providence the disposer of those events and states of things, to which the instances of justice can relate,—when he wills an extraordinary case and hath changed the term of the relation, then he hath made that instance, which before was unjust, now to become just; and so hath not changed justice into injustice, but the denomination of the whole action, concerning which the law was made, is altered from unjust to just, or on the contrary.

53. It is not to be supposed, that the whole law of nature can be altered, as long as our nature is the same; any more than the fashion of our garments can be generally altered as long as our body is of this shape: and, therefore, it is not to be thought, that he that makes a doublet, shall ever make three sleeves, unless a man have three arms,—or a glove with six fingers for him that hath but five; but many particular laws of nature suffer variety and alteration, according to the changes that are in our nature and in our necessities, or by any measure of man or men which God shall superinduce.

The rule of nature is always the same; "yet one may do what another may not; and sometimes that is lawful which at another is criminal; not because the measure is changeable, but the thing measured suffers variety."—So that, in effect, the sense and extent of truth in this question is this; that although as long as this world lasts and men in it, the law of nature cannot be abrogated, because it is that law which is framed proportionable to man's nature; yet it may be derogated, that is, lessened, or enlarged in instances, changed in the integrity of many of its particulars, made relative to several states and new necessities; and this is that which, in true speaking, does affirm that the laws of nature may be changed. For although there are some propositions and decrees so general, that they are in their nature applicable to all variety of things, and therefore cannot be changed;—yet they are rather the foundation of laws than laws themselves: because a law must be mixed with a material part, it must be a direction of actions, and a bond upon persons, which does suppose many things that can be changed: and therefore, although the propositions, upon which the reasonableness and justice of the law does depend, serve to the contrary instances by analogy, and common influence,—yet the law, being material, does not, and therefore is alterable. But of this I shall give a fuller account in the ninth and tenth rules of this chapter. For the present, I observe,

54. The want of considering this, hath made difficulty in this question and errors in many. Every natural proposition is not a law: but those antecedent propositions, by the proportions of which laws stand or fall, are the measures of laws. They are rules, not laws: and indeed the rules of nature are eternal and unalterable; that is, all those natural and reasonable propositions which are dictates of prime reason, and abstract from all persons, and all states, and all relations: such as are, "God is to be honoured:"—"Justice is to be done:"—"Contracts are to be affirmed:"—"Reason is to be obeyed:"—"Good is to be followed:"—"Evil to be eschewed."—These are the common measures of all laws, and all actions: but these are made laws when they are prescribed to persons, and applied to matter; and when they are, because that matter can have variety, the law also can, though the rule cannot.

55. That we are to restore all that was intrusted to us, is a natural law derived from the rule of doing justice: but this may be derogated and prejudiced without sin. For prescription transfers the possession and disoblges the fiduciary from restitution.

56. By the law of nature relying upon the rule of performing contracts, clandestine marriages are valid and firm: but yet some churches, particularly the church of Rome, in the council of Trent, hath pronounced some marriages void, which, by the rule of nature, and afterwards by a law, were rate and legal; particularly, clandestine marriages, and marriages not clandestine by the ingress of one of the parties into religion, as is to be seen in the eighth session.

57. By the law of nature a testimony under two or three witnesses may stand, but in the case of the accusation of a cardinal-deacon in Rome, they require the concurrence of seven and twenty; of a cardinal priest, sixty-four; of a cardinal bishop, seventy and two,—and, in England, one shall serve the turn, if it be for the king. In codicils the civil law requires five witnesses. In testaments there must be seven: when a controversy is concerning the eminency and prelation of excellent persons, fifteen are demanded. But if these things may be prejudiced by men, much more may they be altered by God. But this extends itself a little further. For in some of these instances, that which is a law of nature, becomes so inconvenient as to do much evil,—and then it is to be estimated by a new rule; and therefore the whole law is changed, when it comes to have a new measure, and the analogy of a new reason.

58. Upon the account of these premises it follows, that it is but a weak distinction to affirm “some things to be forbidden by God, because they are unlawful; and some to be unlawful, because they are forbidden.”—For this last part of the distinction takes in all that is unlawful in the world, and therefore the other is a dead member and may be lopped off. So Ocham^y affirms against the more common sentence of the schools (as his manner is); “Nullus est actus malus, nisi quatenus à Deo prohibitus est, et qui non possit fieri bonus si à Deo præcipiatur, et è converso;” “Every thing is good or bad according as it is commanded or forbidden by God, and no otherwise.”—For nothing is unlawful antecedently to God’s commandment. Sin is a transgression of some law, and this law must be made by a superior, and there is no superior but who depends on God, and therefore his law is its measure. There are some things good, which God hath not commanded; but then they are such which he hath commended by counsels, or analogies and proportions. But whatsoever is a sin, is so therefore because it is forbidden; and without such a prohibition, although it might be unreasonable, yet it cannot be criminal or unjust. Since, therefore, all measure of good and evil, in the intercourses of men, wholly rely upon the law of God, and are consequent to his will, although it can never be that we can have leave to be unjust, or unchaste, that is, to do against a law in being with all its circumstances,—yet the law may be so changed that the whole action which was forbidden, may become permitted, and innocent,—and that which was permitted, may become criminal. I instance in the ἀδελοφρομζία, or “the conjunction of the nearest kindred,” which once was lawful, and ever since is become criminal.

59. The purpose of this discourse is this;—that we look no further for tables of the law of nature, but take in only those precepts, which bind us christians under Christ our lawgiver, who hath revealed to us all his Father’s will. All the laws of Christ concerning moral actions are the laws of nature: and all the laws of nature, which any wise nation ever reckoned, either are taken away by God, or else are commanded by Christ. So that christianity is a perfect system of all the laws of nature, and of all the will of God, that is, of all the obligatory will, of all the commandments. In those things where christianity hath not interposed, we are left to our natural liberty, or a “Jus permissivum,” “a permission,” except where we have restrained ourselves by contract or dedition.

RULE II.

The Law of Nature is the Foundation of all Laws, and the Measure of their Obligation.

1. For all good laws, and all justice, hath the same reasonableness, the same rules and measures, and are therefore good because they are profitable,—and are therefore just, because they are measured by the common analogies and proportions:—and are therefore necessary, because they are bound upon us by God mediately or immediately. And therefore Cicero² defined virtue to be “perfecta et ad summum perducta natura,” or “Habitus animi naturæ modo, rationi consentaneus,”^a “The perfection of nature,” or “a habit of mind agreeing to natural reason.”—But more expressly and full in his third book de Legibus: ^b “Lex est, justorum injustorumque distinctio, ad illam antiquissimam et rerum omnium principem expressa naturam, ad quam leges hominum diriguntur, quæ supplicio improbos afficiunt, et defendunt et tuentur bonos:” “A law is the distinction of good and bad, of just and unjust, expressed or fitted to nature, which is the first and the prince of all, and to which human laws are directed for the punishment of evil-doers, and the defence of the good.”—And it is evident in all the moral precepts of christianity: all which are so agreeable to a man’s felicity and state of things, to which a man is designed both here and hereafter, that a man cannot be happy without them: and therefore they all rely upon some prime natural reason, which reason although possibly some or all of it was discovered to us by revelation and the wise proper discourses of the religion, and was not generally known to men before Christ,—yet the reasons are nothing but consonances to our state and being, introductive of felicity, perfective of our nature, wise, and prudent, and noble, and such which, abstracting from the rewards hereafter, are infinitely eligible and to be preferred for temporal regards before their contraries.

2. Add to this, they are such which some few the wisest of the heathens did teach by natural reason, for aught we know. And there is a proportion of this truth also in all the wise laws of commonwealths. The reasons of which are nothing but the proportions of nature, and the prime propositions of justice, common utility, and natural necessity. And therefore, supposing that every civil constitution supplies the material part or the instance, every civil law is nothing but a particular of the natural law in respect of its formality, reasonableness, and obligation. And all laws of manners are laws of nature:

^v De Leg. i.

^a De Invent. ii.

for there can be but one justice, and the same honesty and common utility in the world; and as a particular reason is contained in the universal, so is the particular profit in the public; "Saluti civium prospexit, quâ intelligebat contineri suam," said Torquatus^c in Cicero, and so it is in laws. In the observation of the laws of nature, the good of every society and every private person is comprised: and there is no other difference in it, but that in every civil constitution there is something superadded; not to the reasonableness of justice, but it is invested with a body of action and circumstances. "Jus civile neque in totum à naturali ac gentium jure recedere, neque per omnia ei servire; adeo ut cum juri communi aliquid additur vel detrahitur, jus proprium, id est, civile efficiatur," said Justinian:^d "The civil law neither does wholly recede from the law of nature and nations, neither does it wholly serve it: for when any thing is added or detracted from the natural law, it becomes the civil:" and another; "Leges positivæ repetunt jus naturæ quum leges sive pactiones quæ sunt jura attingunt utilitatem et scopum naturæ;" "The positive laws of a commonwealth repeat the law of nature, when laws and covenants do promote the profit and this design of nature."

3. But from hence it follows that the law of nature is the only rule and measure of all laws, and superinduced laws of God and man are but instances of obedience in those general precepts of nature: and since the law of christianity contains in it all the law of nature, and is now the only law that can oblige us primarily, and others in virtue of it: it is the prime and adequate rule and measure of conscience, and the explication of all its precepts will be a full institution of conscience: to which purpose that saying of Lælius in Cicero,^e is very pertinent: "Viros bonos appellandos esse putamus, qui assequuntur (quantum homines possunt) naturam, optimum recte vivendi ducem;" "Nature is the best guide and measure of living well; and they who exactly observe her measures as far as men can, are to be called good men."

RULE III.

The first and greatest Band of the Law of Nature is Fear of Punishment.

I HAVE already spoken of this as it is the act and effect of conscience; here I am to speak of it more abstractedly, and as itself hath effect upon human actions; there as it is the minister of the judge; here as it is the sanction of the law.

1. "Omne malum aut timore aut pudore natura suffudit," said Tertullian;^f fear and shame are the waiters and handmaids of every sin, which nature hath provided for it.—And indeed fear is the band of all laws. For although there is a pravity in the nature of injustice which natural reason hates, proceeding partly from the deficiency from the perfective end of nature and societies, which is served by justice;—partly from the consequent obloquy and disreputation, which all wise men and all talking people put upon it (for they that do it themselves, speak ill of it in others); yet this is but a little. This is a part of the punishment of the breach of the natural law; but not strong enough to make a firm obligation. Now in all laws there must be some penalty annexed, the fear of which may be able to restrain men from doing against the law; which cannot be, unless the evil be greater than the benefit or pleasure of the prevarication can be: and therefore it is, that God establishing this law hath appointed a court within us, a severe judge, who will not spare; a wise discernor, who will not be deceived; an exact remembrancer, which never forgets any thing that can do the greatest mischiefs; a just witness, who will not be suborned, and is conscious and privy to all that which he is to judge; and the same also is the executioner of the delinquent and sinning people.

2. The stings of conscience and fear of the Divine vengeance, is this evil which naturally restrains us; it is the greatest restraint, because it is the greatest of evils, and it is unavoidable, and it is natural. I will not add it is lawful to abstain from evil for fear of punishment, but it is necessary, and it is natural, and that is more, and this is it which Epicurus taught, οὐκ ἄλλω τινὶ τῆς ἀδικίας δεῖν ἀπειργεῖν ἢ φόβῳ κολάσεων; which although Plutarch seems angry at, was well enough spoken by him; meaning, that "it is a fear, not of temporal discovery and civil punishment, which is only appointed to restrain evil actions, but a fear of those evils whose apprehension God hath made necessary and congenite with the nature of man;" fear of God's displeasure, and the destruction of our nature and felicities relying upon that natural love of ourselves, and desire of our own preservation, without which a man cannot be supposed sufficiently provided with principles of necessary being and providence.

3. There is another kind of fear of punishment, that is, a fear of those auxiliary punishments which princes and republics have superadded to the breakers of natural laws, which is in some men, who are despisers of all the evils which are threatened hereafter: such as was that of Thrasyarchus, in Plato: § "Nihil esse melius quam facere injuriam neque pœnas dare, nihil pejus quam pati nec posse ulcisci; medio autem modo se habere justitiam, cum quis nec facit nec patitur: quod ut fiat, esse optabile; sed nempe imbecillibus, quorum proinde interest pacisci aut servare pacta, non autem valentioribus, qui si viri fuerint ac sapuerint, nullatenus pactum de injuriâ non inferendâ accipiendâve sint inituri." "Nothing is better than to do injury without punishment; nothing worse than to suffer mischief, and to be able to do none again; in the midst of these is justice, which neither does injury, nor receives any, which is much to be desired; but by whom? By none but by weak people. For the stronger, if they be valiant and wise, will never enter into covenants concerning not doing or receiving injury."—According to this doctrine, there should be nothing of itself just or unjust; and if there were, it were not to be regarded, but so long as justice were profitable, and injustice troublesome and dangerous. And therefore, strong men or crafty might, in many cases, be exempt from contracts and from doing justice, and would neither do right nor take wrong.

4. Against this it is that all wise men in the world do speak: "Vos autem, nisi ad populares auras inanesque rumores, recta facere nescitis; et relictâ conscientiæ virtutisque præstantiâ de alienis præmia sermunculis cogitatis," said Boetius,^b in indignation against all those who took accounts of themselves by public noises, not by the testimonies of a just conscience,—that is, who fear man, but do not fear God. And to do good out of fear of punishment (in this sense) is to do good no longer than I am observed, and no longer than I am constrained: from both which because very many men are very often freed, and all men sometimes, there would be no habit, no will, no love of justice in the world; that is, there would be no virtue of justice, but single actions as it could happen. This would introduce horrid tyrannies, while princes and generals, having power in their hands, might do all things as they pleased, and have no measure but their own private: and all men's conditions under them would be always precarious and arbitrary, and most commonly intolerable: and, therefore, this fear is the characterism of evil persons, Oderunt peccare mali formidine pœnæ.

And against such, civil laws are made: "Justis lex non est posita," saith St. Paul; "the law is not made for the righteous, but for the wicked."—If the sons of Israel had continued pious as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were, the law should not have been given to them as it was upon mount Sinai: but the necessities of men brought a law upon them, and that law a punishment, while good men ποιούσιν ἔκονσίως, ἡ ποιούσιν ἄκοντες οἱ λοιποὶ διὰ τὸν νόμον, as Xenocrates, in Laertius, said of the philosophers; they do it for the love of God; by choice and delight in the actions of virtue, they do excellent things, "Plusque ibi boni mores valent quam alibi bonæ leges," as Tacitus said of the old Germans; "Good manners prevailed more than good laws." Thus did the patriarchs, and therefore they needed not a law. "Vetustissimi mortalium, nullâ adhuc malâ libidine, sine pretio, sine scelere, eoque sine pœnâ et coercitionibus agebant: neque præmiis opus erat, cum honesta suapte ingenio peterentur; et, ubi nihil contra morem cuperent, nihil per metum vetabantur."^k Our forefathers desired nothing against honesty and injustice, and therefore were not forbidden any thing by the instrument of fear.

Sponte suâ, veterisque Dei se more tenentes,ⁱ

5. But, therefore, the civil and positive law is not made for all those men who have other restraints; that is, for good men who are moved by better principles; but because these things that are better, are despised by the vicious and the tyrants, oppressors and the impudent, the civil power hath taken a sword to transfix the criminal, and to kill the crime. And, therefore, Epicurus, in Stobæus, said not amiss: "Laws were made for wise men, not for fear they should do ill, but lest they should suffer evil from the unjust."

6. And yet even the wise and the good men have a fear in them, which is an instrument of justice and religion; but it is a fear of God, not of the secular judge; it is a fear that is natural, a fear produced from the congenite notices of things, and the fear of doing a base thing; a fear to be a fool and an evil person.

Mi natura dedit leges à sanguine ductas:
Ne possim melior judicis esse metu;

said Cornelia, in Propertius: a good man will abstain from all unrighteous things, though he be sure that no man should hear or see any thing of it,—that is, though there were no laws, and superinduced punishments, in republics; and all this upon the account of such a fear, which a good man ought to have,—a fear of being a base person or doing vile things.

OVID, lib. iii. Eleg.

That chastity is the noblest, which is not constrained by spies and severity, by laws and jealousy: when the mind is secretly restrained, then the virtue is secured. Cicero puts a case to Torquatus: "Si te amicus tuus moriens rogaverit, ut hereditatem reddas suæ filiæ, nec usquam id scripserit, ut scripsit Fadius, nec cuiquam dixerit; quid facies?" Aruncanus dies, and leaves his inheritance to his daughter, Postumia, and intrusts his friend, Torquatus, with it, but privately, without witness, without consignment of tables: will Torquatus, who is a feoffee in private trust, restore this to the child, when she shall be capable? Yes; Torquatus will, and Epicurus will; and yet Cicero had scarce a good word for him, whom he hath fondly disgraced during all ages of the world, weakly and unjustly: but the account he gives of it, is pertinent to the rule: "Nonne intelligis, eo majorem esse vim naturæ, quod ipsi vos, qui omnia ad vestrum commodum, et, ut ipsi dicitis, ad voluptatem referatis, tamen ea faciatis, quibus appareat non voluptatem vos sed officium sequi? plusque naturam, rectam quam pravam rationem valere?" Nature is more prevalent than interest; and sober men, though they pretend to do things for their real advantage and pleasure, yet follow their duty rather than either pleasure or profit, and right nature rather than evil principles.

7. The reason of this is, because nature carries fear and reverence in the retinue of all her laws; and the evils which are consequent to the breach of natural laws, are really, and by wise men so understood to be, greater mischiefs than the want of profit, or the missing of pleasure, or the feeling the rods and axes of the prince. If there were no more in a crime than the disorder of nature, the very unnaturalness itself were a very great matter. St. Basil said well,¹ “Ad omnia, quæ descripta à nobis, à Deo præcepta sunt, consequenda, naturales ab ipso facultates accepimus.” God hath given to virtues, natural organs, or bodily instruments; as to mercy he appointed bowels, eyes for pity, hands for relief; and the proper employment of these is so perfective of a man’s condition, according to their proportion, that not to employ them according to the purpose of nature is a disease, a natural trouble; just as it is to trumpet with our mouth, which was intended for eating, and drinking, and gentler breathings. It is punishment enough to do an unnatural and a base action; it puts our soul and its faculties from their centre, and the ways of perfection. And this is fully observed by Seneca: “Male de nobis actum erat, quod multa scelera legem et judicem effugiunt, et scripta supplicia, nisi illa naturalia et gravia de præsentibus solverent, et in locum patientiæ timor cederet:” “Mankind were in an ill state of provisions, if those wickednesses, which escape the law and the judge, did not suffer the more grievous inflictions of natural punishment, and fear came into the place of patience;” still fear is the bridle: but it is an honest fear, a fear of God, and of natural disorders and inconvenience. Οὐκ ἐν συμβολαίοις πολιτικοῖς οὐδὲ ἐν ἀπαγορεύσει νόμου, ἀλλ’ ἐξ ἰδιοπραγίας, καὶ τῆς πρὸς τὸν Θεὸν ἀγάπης ἡ δικαιοσύνη, as Clemens of Alexandria calls it; “a righteousness not produced by laws and the sword, fear and interest, but from the love of God,” and something that is within: there is a fear, but it is such a fear as still leaves the love to virtue, and secures it in privacies, and enjoins the habit and constant practice of it: a fear that is complicated with a natural love of our own preservation, and is constant, and measured by God, and in the natural limit cannot be extravagant; a fear that acknowledges God’s omniscience, and his omnipresence, and his eternal justice: and this was the sense of that of Sophocles:

Πρὸς ταῦτα κρύπτε μὴδὲν, ὥς ἅπανθ’ ὁρῶν
καὶ πάντ’ ἀκούων, πάντ’ ἀναπτύσσει χρόνος.

“Do nothing basely and secretly; for time’s Father sees and hears all things, and time will discover it, and truth shall be the daughter of time;—and that which is done in secret, shall be spoken upon the tops of houses:” so both the christian and the heathen are conjoined in the several expressions of the same great truth. This fear is deposited in conscience, and is begotten and kept by this proposition,—that “God is a rewarder of all men according to their works.”

Consequent to this is the love of virtue.

RULE IV.

The second Band of Virtue is Love, and its proper and consequent Deliciousness.

1. This is not wholly natural, but in much of it is empirical, εἴρημα χρόνου καὶ εἶον proceeding from the grace of God, and the experience of the deliciousness and rewards of virtue, and the excellency of a greater hope which does entertain our spirits in the outer courts of pleasant expectations: ὅτι ἐκ φιλοσοφίας τόσσο αὐτῷ περιέγεγονε τὸ ἀνεπιτάκτως ποιεῖν ἅ τινες διὰ τὸν ἀπὸ τῶν νόμων φόβον ποιοῦσι, as both Aristotle and Xenocrates did speak. It is the effect of philosophy and religion, of virtuous and severe institutions, to do that for love and without constraint, which fools, and vicious and weak persons, do for fear of laws.

2. Now this, I say, is not natural, that is, although it be agreeable to nature, yet not primarily introduced by it, without a tutor, because nature forbids injustice, but does not command justice,—but secondarily, and by accident, and upon supposition of other contingencies. To do injustice is always a sin, but not to do a justice is not always. For a man may depose the person of a judge, or a trustee, or a delegate; but they who habitually do justice, find the rewards of reputation, and the ease of being freed from the torments of an evil conscience, which is a delicacy, like the being eased of the horrid gripes of the colic; and so insensibly grow in love with justice, that they think they love justice for justice’ sake.

Ipsa sui merces erat et sine vindice præda.

3. Concerning which it is fit we consider a little, lest it become the occasion of scruples and nice opinions. Antigonus Sochæus, an old Jew, was famed for saying, “Be not servants who serve their lord, that they may receive a reward from him; but be such who serve him without consideration of wages, or recompences, and let the fear of God be upon you:” Baithus and Sadoc, his disciples, from whom the sect of the Sadducees did spring, not well understanding him, took occasion from hence to deny the resurrection and rewards after this life. And, indeed, such sayings as these are easily abused; and when some men speak great things, and others believe as much of it as they understand, but understand it not at all, they make sects and divide their schools, and ignorance and faction keep the doors, and sit in the chairs sometimes. It is impossible a man should do great things, or suffer nobly, without consideration of a reward; and since much of virtue consists in suffering evil things, virtue of herself is not a beatitude, but the way to one. He does things like a fool, who does it for no end: and if he does not choose a good end, he is worse: and virtue herself would, in many instances, be unreasonable, if, for no material consideration, we should undertake her drudgery: and therefore St. Austin said well, “Sublatis æternis præmiis et pœnis verum staturum à partibus Epicuri:” sensual pleasure were highly eligible, and not virtuous sufferings, "if in this life only we had hope." But if it be accounted the top of virtue to love virtue for virtue's sake, and without intuition of the reward; many times good men observing, that themselves are encouraged by all God's promises to obedience and patience, and that in martyrdom there is no natural or sensitive pleasure, and that it cannot be loved for itself, but wholly for its reward, will find themselves put into "fear where no fear is," and that a "nequam humilitas," an unworthy opinion of their duty, shall affright their peace and holy confidence. Peregrinus, the philosopher, in A. Gellius, expressed this love of virtue for itself, thus: "Etiam si Dii atque homines ignoraturi forent;" to do good though "neither God nor men should know of it:"—but as this is impossible in fact, so it is in speculation; for there were no such thing as virtue, if it were not relative and directed to God or man: but yet the thing which they mean, is very good. Good men love virtue for virtue's sake,—that is, they act it and love it, they do it with so habitual and confirmed elections and complacency, that many times they have no actual intuition to the reward; they forget this, they are so taken with that; like a man that chooses a wife upon many considerations, as portion, family, hopes, and beauty: yet when he hath conversed long with her, and finds her amiable and fruitful, obedient and wise; he forgets all other considerations, and loves her person for her own perfections, but will not quit all his other interests. The difference is best understood by variety of motions. Some motions cannot be continued, unless some agent or other do continually urge them; but they are violent and unnatural: others are perfective and loved, and they will continue and increase by their own principle, if they be not hindered. This is the love of virtue,—that is, fear, or, it may be, hope; save that hope is a thing between both, and is compounded of both, and is more commendable than fear. But to love virtue for itself, is nothing else, but to love it directly and plainly; he that loves it only for the reward, and is not, by the reward, brought to love the thing, loves not this at all, but loves something else: but he that loves it at all, sees good in it, because he finds good by it; and therefore loves itself now, whatever was the first incentive: and the wooden arch may be taken away, when that of marble is concentrated.

4. (2.) "Vir fortis et justus—in summâ voluptate est et periculo suo fruatur." "When a good man lays before him the price and redemption of his mortality, the liberty of his country, the safety of his friends, he is hugely pleased, and delights in and enjoys his danger. But if he feels not this pleasure, yet without trembling and uncertainty he will dare to die, facere recte pieque contentus; and if you tell him, this reputation which he gets of his citizens, will die almost as soon as he shall die; he answers, all those things are without the nature and consideration of my work: 'Ego ipsum contempler, hoc esse honestum scio.' I look upon the work itself, and find it honest;"—and that is enough; meaning secretly; that though these outward rewards were pared off, yet there are secret pleasures, which will follow and stick close to virtue, as the shadow does to the body, and this good men must consider, because they feel it, and that is part of the reward.

5. (3.) They are pleased with the virtue itself, and their soul is as much delighted with it, and as naturally, as the eye with beautiful colours, or the throat with unctuous juices, or the tongue with moist sweetnesses. For God hath made virtue proportionable to all the noble ends and worthy desires of mankind, and the proper instrument of his felicity; and all its beauties, and all its works, and all its effects, and all that for which it can be loved, is part of the reward. And therefore, to say a man can love virtue for virtue's sake, and without consideration of the reward, is to say a man can love virtue without any reason and inducement, without any argument to move his affections.

6. (4.) For there can be but two causes of amiability in the world, perfection and usefulness, that is, beauty and profit; that in the thing itself, this as it relates to me: now he that says, "a man may love virtue for its own sake without consideration of the reward," says no more than that "a man may love a flower which he never hopes to smell of;" that is, he may admire and commend it, and love to look on it, and just so he may do to virtue. But if he desires either, it is because it is profitable or useful to him, and hath something that will delight him; it cannot else possibly be desired.

7. Now to love virtue in the first sense is rather praise than love, an act of understanding rather than of the will, and its object is properly the perfections of the flower or the virtue respectively: but when it comes to be desired, that is, loved with a relation to myself, it hath for its object other perfections, those things that please and that delight me, and that is nothing but part of the reward or all of it.

8. The question being thus explicated, it follows, that to love virtue for virtue's sake, is so far from being the honour of a good and perfect man, that it is the character of an evil man, if it goes no further. For it amounts to nothing but this, that the understanding is convinced of the worthiness of it, it is that which St. Paul calls "a delighting in the law after the inner man." But it is a relative, material, practical love of virtue that makes a good man; and the proper inducement of that is also relative, material, and practical.

— video meliora proboque. — OVID.

Est profecto Deus, qui quæ nos gerimus, auditque et videt. Bene merenti, bene profuerit; male merenti par erit; said the comedian;^m "God hath so endeared justice and virtue to us, that he hearing and seeing all things, gives good things to them that do good things; but he will be even with the evil man."

9. (5.) Lastly, to love virtue for virtue's sake, is to love it without consideration of human rewards, praise of men, honours, riches, rest, power, and the like, which indeed are the hinges of most men's actions.

^m In Capt. Plaut.

Cura, quid expediat, prior est, quam quid sit honestum;
Et cum fortunâ statque, caditque fides.
Nec facile invenias multis de millibus unum,

Now he that is a good man, and loves virtue virtuously, does not love it principally for these secular regards; but without such low expectations, and without apprehension of the angry sentence of the laws: but this does not exclude the intuition of the Divine reward from having an influence into the most perfect love of virtue; for this is intrinsic to the sanction and the nature of the law; the other is extrinsic and accidental. The first is such a reward as is the perfection of the work; for glory is the perfection of grace; and he that serves God for hope of glory, loves goodness for goodness' sake; for he pursues the interest of goodness, that he may be filled with goodness; he serves God here that he may serve him hereafter; he does it well that he may do it better; a little while, that he may do it over again for ever and ever. Nothing else can be a loving virtue for virtue's sake; this is the greatest perfection and the most reasonable and practicable sense of doing it. And if the rewards of virtue were not the great practical inducement of good men's love to goodness, all the promises of the gospel were to no purpose in relation to the faith of good men, and therefore the greatest and the best part of faith itself would be useless: for there is no purpose or end of faith of the promises, but to enable our obedience, by the credibility and expectation of such promises, to do our duty.

10. Now that even good men, even the best men, even all men, have an habitual regard to it, besides that it is impossible to be otherwise, (for he that ploughs, does plough in hope,) and will easily be understood to be so by them who know the causes and nature of things; it appears also in the instance of as good a man as any story reports of; even Moses, who "despised to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, because he had an eye to the recompence of reward:" and by the instance of all those brave persons, whom St. Paul enumerates in the eleventh chapter to the Hebrews; "who all died in faith, not having received the promises;" but they looked for better, even such as were to come; and beyond all this, our blessed Lord himself "despised shame and endured the cross;" but it was "for the glory that was set before him."ⁿ For it is the first and the greatest article of the gentile's creed, "Every one that comes to God, must believe that God is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him."

11. The sum is this; although in nature herself, and in the conscience relating to her, there is a court punitive and a fear of God, yet the expectation of reward is rather put into us, than born with us, and revealed rather than natural; and therefore the expectation of good is the second band of natural laws, but extrinsic and adventitious, communicated to us by revelation, and by grace.

ⁿ Heb. xii. 2, 3.

RULE V.

The Imperfection of some Provisions in civil Laws is supplied by the natural Obligation remaining upon Persons civilly incapable.

1. WHEN laws make provision of cases ἐπὶ τὸ πλεῖστον, in as many things as they can foresee, or feel, and yet some things will emerge which cannot be foreseen, and some contrary reasons will arise;—many times there is no care taken for some things and some persons by any constitutions of man. Here nature, as the common parent of all justice and necessary obligations, takes the case into her protection.

This happens in many cases:

2. (1.) Human laws give measures of things and persons, which fit most men without a sensible error, but some it does not. Young persons are, at a certain age, declared capable of making profitable contracts; at another age, of making contracts that are hazardous; and they must stand to them, though they be mischievous. At one age they may marry; at another, they may contract a debt; at another, they may make a testament; at another, they may be punished with capital inflictions. But in some persons, the malice is earlier and the wit more pregnant, and the sense of their advantages brisk enough: and therefore the contracts which they can make,—and the actions which they do,—and the part which they choose, are really made,—or done, or chosen; but they are not bound to stand to it by the civil law; and yet if they can choose, they are naturally obliged. Both of them are necessary: the civil law cannot provide but by common measures;

Quos ultra citraque nequit consistere rectum. HOR.

All their rules are made by as common a measure as they can, and they are the best rules that have the fewest exceptions: the best carpenters make the fewest chips: but some there must be. But then it is necessary that nature should provide, by single provisions in all the single exceptions; for it is necessary it should be done, and she only can do it. She can do it because nature hath provided and instructed a judging and a discerning conscience; and the person that contracts or receives a benefit, can bind himself to a man as soon as he can bind himself to God; because the laws of God bind all our contracts with men. That is, plainly thus, God's laws provide not only for general cases, but also for particular circumstances; and of every thing God, and God's vicegerent, conscience, can take accounts; and therefore this abundance supplies the other's defect; the perfection of God makes up the breaches of the imperfection of man. Which rule is to be understood both of things and persons. For all our duty is only an obedience to God: and every one that can hope or fear, is bound to this obedience; therefore there can be no gap here: God hath in every thing shut up every person that can use reason, by some instrument or other. And therefore Cicero^o said well, "Si regnante Tarquinio nulla fuisset Romæ scripta lex de stupris, tamen contra illam legem sempiternam Sextus Tarquinius vim Lucretiæ Tricipitini filiæ attulit: erat enim ratio profecta à rerum naturâ, et ad recte faciendum impellens, atque à delicto avocans:" "There was no civil constitution against rapes, but Tarquin ought not to have done it: for there was an eternal law against it. For right reason, proceeding from nature, drives us on to good, and calls us off from evil:"—that is, he could not but know it was ill, and against reason, and against every thing by which he ought to be governed; and even to the heathen God was not wanting, but bound these laws upon them by reason, and inclination, and necessity, and fame, and example, and contract, and hope, and fear, and by secret ways which we know not of. He made some inclinations and some reason to become laws, that mankind might not live like beasts and birds of prey: in all cases, and in all times, and to all persons, he became a Lord and a Lawgiver, some way or other.

3. Young persons, of twelve or fourteen years old, can be saved or damned; they can love or hate; they can understand yea and nay; they can do a good turn or a shrewd; they can lead a blind man right or wrong; they can bear true or false witness: and although the civil laws, out of care lest their easiness be abused by crafty people, make them secure from it by nulling the contract, that the deceiving person may not reap the harvest of his fraud, yet there are very many cases in which the minor receives advantage, or at the least no wrong, and though it was fit he should be secured, it was not fit he should be enabled to do a mischief to another, "ut levamen his, aliis sit onus," as St. Paul in a like case, "that they be eased, and others burdened." For although the other contractor be sufficiently warned to take heed of the minor, yet there may be need in it, or charity, friendship, or confidence; all or any of which if they might be deceived, the minor would suffer often, but the other contractor but once. Therefore, as the civil law secures them from harm, so the law of nature binds them to do none, but to stand to such contracts in which they have advantage or equality, and in which they were not abused. The time when they come to be obliged, is the time when they come to the use of reason,—when they understand their duty,—when a prudent man judges them fit to be contracted with,—when they can use fraud to others,—when they can consider whether they be bound or no: these are the best marks and signatures of the time, and declare the obligation in all cases, where there is no deception evident.

4. (2.) Sometimes both parties can contract: but because they, doing it without witnesses, may recede from it, either consentingly or against the will of one of them, the positive constitution of man intending to provide against this inconvenience, hath cut the civil tie in pieces, and refuses to verify the contract, besides that it cannot legally be proved. In this case, nature relieves the oppressed party, and supplies the easiness of the civil band, and strains that hard which the others let loose. And this happens in clandestine contracts: against which, in the matter of marriage, all christian countries have made severe edicts: but in case they be done, in some places they are pronounced valid, in some places declared null. Where they are nulled, nature is defeated in making provisions, and the parties are warranted to do a mischief. For if Mauritius and Cluviena contract marriage, and Mauritius repent his bargain, where shall Cluviena be relieved? The law of the church forbids it, and will punish her for doing it if she complains. The civil law takes no notice of it, for it cannot be legally proved: and the law of nature is barred out, if it be declared null: and then there is nothing left to hold him. It is the case of the church of Rome, who, in the eighth session of the council of Trent, declares all clandestine contracts to be null, and their mixtures to be fornication and uncleanness. But they have overacted their zeal against a temporal inconvenience, and burn their houses to roast an egg; they destroy a law of nature by a law of the church,—against the former practices, counsels, and resolutions, even of their own church. For if those contracts are in themselves naturally valid, and not forbidden by God, then they cannot rescind them: if they be not naturally valid, since they were always positively forbidden, why were they esteemed valid for so many ages? For till that council they were so; but finding that the former prohibitions were not strong enough, they took this course to break them all in pieces: and, out of desire to prevent an accidental evil, they made it more ready to be done. For it was before but feared, lest they should recede; but yet if they did, they were esteemed adulterers, if they married again; and they themselves knew, when they were precontracted: and therefore stood convicted and pinched in their own consciences, so long as the old laws remained, and men did not receive warrants to break the most sacred bands in the world: but by this nullifying the contract, they have not only leave to go off, but are commanded; and if they be weary of this, they may contract with another, and there is nothing to hinder them, if nature does not. This nullity, therefore, is a vehement remedy, that destroys the patient; besides that it is against the law of nature. The laws may forbid it to be done; but if it be, they cannot rescind it; because the civil constitution is less than the natural, and convenience is less than conscience, and man is infinitely less than God.

5. (3.) Some pretend to do a greater good; and to do it, break a contract justly made: and if the civil constitution allows it, the law of nature reclaims, and relieves the injured person. This was the case of the Pharisees, who denied to relieve their parents, out of zeal to fill the treasure of the temple, and thought that their voluntary religion excused from their natural duty. The church of Rome gives leave to either of the persons, who are married solemnly and contracted rightly, to recede from their vow and enter into religion, and declares the marriage separate and broken. Here nature calls upon the obliged party, and ought to prevail above any other pretence; it being first in possession and faster in obligation: and if it be naturally an evil to break a lawful contract made without fraud, and which is in our power to keep,—then it ought not to be done for any good in the world.

6. (4.) Hither also are to be reduced, obligations by unsolemn stipulations, by command of parents, by intermination of curses, by mere delict amongst persons, against whom lies no civil action, as of servants to their lords, sons to their fathers: concerning which proper accounts are to be given in their own places. Here only they are to be noted in the general observation of cases, in which the law of nature hath made an obligation, when the civil power could not, or would not, or did not, against it.

7. But it is proper to discuss a difficult question, which intervenes upon this rule. The case is this: By the law of nature, every man hath power to make a testament of his own goods; but the civil law requires conditions of every testator, that the testament shall be ratified by so many witnesses, or else it shall be invalid. Sempronius dying, leaves Caius his heir, and gives but a small portion to his son Porcius, but declares this by an unsolemn testament. The like may happen in all donations and actions, to which any solemnities of law are required.

8. Quest. The question is, whether the estate be due to Caius by the law of nature, or is not Porcius the son to be relieved by the civil constitution, which makes the unsolemn testament to be invalid? To this it is commonly answered, that to make a testament is not a law of nature, but a right only; which as a man may himself relinquish, so may the public laws restrain for the public good: for there being so many frauds in pretended testaments, it is necessary that provisions should be made to prevent the infinite evils that may happen. Now whatsoever is necessary, is also just; if the necessity be public, real, and unavoidable by other means: and if it be just, the public power hath sufficient authority to restrain any man's right for every man's good.

9. (2.) Every sentence of the judge in a clear case, that binds in law, does also bind in conscience; but if the judge of civil actions did know that Sempronius really did appoint the stranger Caius his heir, yet, by the law, he were bound to declare for the son Porcius, and that the real unsolemn will of Sempronius were to be accounted nothing: so that, although the law were made to prevent fraud, yet even when there is no fraud, and the judge knows there is none, yet the unsolemn testament is to be declared invalid by the law: which law, because it is just, and for a just cause, and by a competent authority, must bind in conscience by the force of the words of St. Paul: "Let every soul be subject to the higher powers." And therefore, if the law be good, and the judge just, in giving the inheritance from Caius to Porcius, certainly Caius must needs be unjust, if he detains it.

10. (3.) And this very thing is consented to in the canons of the church, which are usually framed, and ever to be presumed, "ubi contrarium non constat," to be more agreeable to the measures of conscience; and yet in the canon law, a testament framed and signed in the presence of two witnesses is not good, unless the parish-priest be present; and that no man can lawfully detain a legacy upon the warrant of such a will.

11. (4.) For since every act of man consists of the potestative and elective faculties, if either will be wanting, or power, the act is invalid. It is not therefore enough, though the will be manifest and confessed; for if the man have no power, his will is ineffective.

12. But this opinion, though relying upon fair probabilities and great authority, is not to be assented to as it lies, but with great caution and provisions. For a right of nature cannot be taken away by a civil power, entirely, and habitually, but only "quoad exercitium actus;" the exercise of the act of that right may, indeed, be impeded for great reasons and to prevent great evils. Since, therefore, the power of making testaments is a natural right, and is wholly suspended in its act to prevent fraud in unsolemn testaments, where the case is evident, and no fraud at all, although the civil law is still valid because it being established upon a general cause, though it fails in a particular it does not fail in the general, and therefore still is rate and firm;—yet because it does fail in the particular, where that is known, there is a port open for chancery, for considerations of piety, and religion. And therefore, although in the case put, Porcius, who is the natural heir of Sempronius, is to take the advantage of the civil law against Caius; yet if Sempronius had made an unsolemn testament in behalf of his natural heir, that ought to have stood in the court of conscience. My reason is, because, in the law of nature, Porcius the son hath as much natural right to inherit, as Sempronius the father hath to make a testament; and therefore, although an unsolemn testament shall not be sufficient to interrupt a natural succession, because the rights of nature on either hand are equal,—yet the civil power can restrain his right, when there is nothing complicated with it: for his own consent is involved in the public constitution, and he may consent to the diminution of his own right, when no duty is infringed, that is, in those things where only his own rights are concerned.

13. When, therefore, any thing of the law of nature is twisted with the right of nature, there is an obligation past which the civil constitution cannot annul. As if Sempronius command his son in an unsolemn testament, in private and without witnesses, to give such a legacy to Titius his nephew; although Titius cannot challenge it by virtue of that testament, yet the son is bound to pay it by the law of nature: for civil constitutions have effect upon a mere right, but none against a duty of nature: and therefore, although the testament of Sempronius shall not pass into legal, external, judicial warranty, yet it binds the son, and is valid as to him by the law of nature and conscience. And this was rarely well affirmed by Pliny:^a “Hoc, si jus aspicias, irritum; si defuncti voluntatem, ratum et firmum est. Mihi autem defuncti voluntas (vereor, quam in partem jurisconsulti, quod dicturus sum, accipiant) antiquior jure est;” “If we regard the civil law, such testaments are invalid; yet if we regard the will of the testator, it is firm: but though I know not how the lawyers will take it, yet to me the will of the dead is to be preferred before the law:”—and more fully yet to Antonianus:^r “Tu quidem pro certa tuâ diligentia admones me, codicillos Attiliani, qui me ex parte instituit hæredem, pro non scriptis habendos, quia non sunt confirmati testamento; quod jus nec mihi quidem ignotum est, cum sit iis etiam notum, qui nihil aliud sciunt. Sed ego propriam quandam legem mihi dixi, ut defunctorum voluntates, etiam si jura deficerent, quasi perfectas tuerer. Constat enim codicillos istos Attiliani manuscriptos. Licet ergo non sint confirmati testamento, à me tamen, ut confirmati, observabuntur;”—“Every one that knows any thing, knows that in law unsolemn testaments are invalid; but I have another law of my own;—if I know it was really the will of the dead, I will verify it though it want the solemnity of law:”—and this also was affirmed by Innocentius, saying, “Electionem quæ juri naturæ consentit, licet non serventur, juris solennitates tenere.”^s

14. And there is great reason and great piety in this sense of the question; for when a duty is any ways concerned, there is something owing to God, which no human power can or ought to prejudice. For it is in testaments, where any duty of any one is engaged, as it is in contracts of marriage, to which every one that can choose, is capable of being naturally obliged; now the relative of the obligation cannot in human courts claim either the advantage of an unsolemn testament, or unsolemn and clandestine contract, yet the relative who is obliged to duty, cannot be so quitted: and therefore the father can oblige a son in duty to perform an unsolemn testament; and every contracted person is bound to perform privately, what the other cannot challenge publicly; and this is not obscurely intimated by the law;^t “Ex imperfecto autem testamento voluntatem tenere defuncti non volumus, nisi inter solos liberos à parentibus utriusque sexus;”—viz. “nisi liberi in solâ dividendâ hæreditate voluntatem habeant patris.”^u

15. And for the confirmation of all this, it is remarkable, that they, who affirm an unsolemn testament to be utterly invalid, and that the law of nature is no remedy in this case,—yet affirm that it is of force in the matter of piety; as in donations to churches, the poor, and pious uses, as appears in Imola Ananus, Antonius Rubeus, Covarruvias, and others: which concession of theirs could not be reasonable or consistent with their opinion, but that it is made so by the foregoing considerations; which certainly are the best medium to reconcile duty and prudence, the laws natural and civil, the right of a man with the government of a commonwealth, and to state the question between the two parties who earnestly dispute it to contrary purposes.

16. For although the question is probably disputed on both sides,—yet there are on either hand instances, in which the solemnity of the law does and does not, oblige respectively: which shows that the probability is, on either hand, right and true; and the thing, as it lies in the middle, hath nothing certain or resolved; but is true or false as it partakes of differing reasons. Now the reason of the whole is; because the solemnity of law is wholly to be regarded, where there is not a bigger obligation; where God hath not bound, and man hath bound, man is to be obeyed; but where God hath bound directly, there God is to be obeyed whatever be pretended by men; but if God hath only bound indirectly and collaterally, as if it be a case favourable and pious, there the solemnity of law, which is against it, is not to prevail; but yet is to prevail in the behalf and prosecution of it.

17. Thus if a pupil makes a contract in his minority to his ruin, or signal detriment, he is to be relieved by the advantage of the civil law, which makes his contract invalid, because the person is declared incompetent; and he may lawfully take his remedy; and is not bound by the law of nature to verify it: because he being less naturally capable to contract, the other is, by the law of nature, bound not to do him injury, and take unequal advantage when every man hath equal right: and therefore if he does prevaricate the natural law of justice which is equality, he also may lose the privilege which the other's action passed unto him; for the civil law declaring that minors shall not be prejudiced, makes up that justice or equality which nature intends. For the minor, with his less portion of understanding, and the defensative and retreat given him by the civil law, is made equal to the contractor who is perfect in his natural capacity. Equality must be done and had. And this is one way of inferring it.

18. Another way is: if the minor receives advantage by the bargain, then there is equality; for the want of his natural capacity is supplied by the advantageous matter, and therefore such contracts are valid, though the one of the contractors be legally incapable. But,

19. (3.) If the bargain gave some advantage on either side, the minor must not take the advantage offered him by the civil law to himself, unless he allow to the other his share of advantage in the bargain: for otherwise there is inequality. But,

20. (4.) Neither one nor the other is to be done nor the contract to be rescinded, if the person was naturally capable,—that is, unless it be apparent by the consciousness of his own weakness, or the iniquity and folly of the contract, that he was less in nature than the other; and therefore, in this case, the civil law, rescinding the contract of the minor, does declare that he is incapable naturally as well as civilly: and the civil constitution does not way interfere with the natural, but ministers to it; making the natural instance even with the natural reason: for this being always alike, from the first to the last, the instance growing from imperfection to perfection, must in the progression be defended and supplied and be fitted to the other.

21. But in general, the rule is true, which Panormitan affirms, in prosecution of what I have now disputed: “Quando jus civile aliquid disponit contra jus naturæ, standum est juri naturæ:” and in particular to this very instance of unsolemn testaments Pope Alexander III. being asked, whether, according to the custom that was in the diocess of Ostia, a will could be valid, which was not attested by seven or five witnesses at least, gave in answer,^x “Tales leges à divinâ lege et sanctorum patrum institutis et à generali ecclesiæ consuetudine esse alienas; et ideo standum esse contra illas juri naturali, secundum quod ‘in ore duorum aut trium stat omne verbum.’” Which words of his I only admit so far as they are agreeable to the former measures and limitation. For that a word is true, under the test of two or three witnesses, is not a prohibitive law or command of nature; but it was urged by our blessed Saviour to the Jews as a thing admitted to their law, and it is agreeable to the law of nature; but yet not so, but that a greater caution may be, in some cases, introduced by the civil constitution, as I affirmed above:^y viz. when the innocent and equal state of nature, to which such simplicity or small duplicate of testimonies were sufficient, becomes changed by frauds and artifices of evil men, or new necessities are introduced, which nature did not foresee, and therefore did not provide for, but God hath provided for them by other means, even by a power given to the civil magistrate.

22. Lastly, to make up the measures and cautions of this discourse complete, it is to be added; that, when the civil laws annul an unsolemn contract or testament, it is meant, that such are to be declared null, when they come into judgment; not that the action, or translation of any dominion, inheritance, or legacy, is “ipso facto” void: and, therefore, he that is possessed of any such, is not tied to make voluntary restitution, or to reveal the nullity of the donation, but to depart from it, when he is required by law: for he hath the advantage of a natural right or power in the donor, and that, being first, must stand till it be rescinded by a competent power; for the whole question being but probable on either side, the possessor, or the donee, hath the advantage till a stronger than he comes and takes away that in which he trusted.

RULE VI.

Sins against the Laws of Nature are greater or less, not by that Proportion, but by the Greatness of the Matter, and the Evil consequent, or the Malice of the Sinner.

1. This rule is intended to remedy a greater error, that is in the world, and prevails very much to the abuse of men's persuasions in many cases of conscience;—viz. that all sins, which are unnatural, are the worst: and to be a sin against nature is the highest aggravation of it in the world: which if it were true in “thesi,” yet, because when it comes to be reduced to practice, it is wrapped up in uncertain notices, it ought to be more warily handled. For when men have first laid huge loads of declamations upon all natural rights and natural wrongs, and then endeavoured to draw forth a collective body of natural laws, and they have done it by chance or as they please,—they have put it within their own powers to make what things they list as execrable as murder or blasphemy; without any other reason, but that they have called them unnatural sins.

Concerning which these things are considerable:

2. (1.) All sins against nature are no more the most detestable than all sins against God: because if the kind of sins, or the general reason or object of its irregularity, were all that were considerable in this, nothing could be the aggravation of a sin more than this,—that it were against God. Now, because all sins are against God, and yet amongst them there is difference, the greatness of this appellative is not the only thing that is considerable. But this is, that as all sins are against God, so all are against nature, some way or other: and the reason that concludes against every sin, is that reason that is common to all wise men; and therefore it must be also natural: I do not mean, taught us without the help of revelation or institution,—but such as all men, when they are taught, find to be really, and in the nature of things so constituted, to be reasonable.

3. All voluntary pollutions are sins against nature; because they are satisfactions of lust in ways otherwise than nature intended: but they are not, all of them, worse than adultery or fornication. For although all such pollutions are besides nature's provisions and order, yet some of them are more single evils than fornication; which although it be against nature too, because it dishonours the body, yet it is by name forbidden in the commandment, which some of the others are not, but come in by consequence and attendance: and fornication includes the crime of two, which the other does not always; and it is acted with more vile circumstances and follies, and loss of time, and other foul appendages. It is said to be against nature to approach a woman during her natural separations. But if it be a sin, (which I shall consider in its due place,) yet it is of the smallest consequence and malignity; so that for a sin to be against nature, does only denote its material part, or the body of it; but does not always superinfuse a venom and special malignity, or greatness of crime into it, above other sins. But it is according as the instance is. Every sin against the duty we owe to our parents, is unnatural: but they have their heightenings and diminutions from other accounts, and in this they have variety. And it is observable, that there were some laws made concerning some of these and the like instances in the judicial law of Moses; but none in the moral: and, therefore, that the irregularity in some of these cases, though it hath met with a foul appellative, yet is to be esteemed by more certain proportions than such casual appellations.

4. (2.) The breach of a commandment is a surer rule to judge of sins, than the doing against a natural reason. For there are many things which are unreasonable, which are not unlawful; and some things which are, in some circumstances, reasonable, but yet, in the law, forbidden and irregular; such are all those things which are permitted for the hardness of our hearts. So was polygamy to the patriarchs, and to the Jews. So is the breach of laws by a universal deficiency of the people; which though it be infinitely unlawful, yet, for the unreasonableness in punishing all, it becomes permitted to all. Therefore, to estimate the goodness or badness of an action by its being reasonable or unreasonable, is infinitely fallacious, unless we take in other measures. It is unreasonable that a man should marry when he is fourscore years old; but it is not unlawful. It is unreasonable for an old man to marry a young maiden; but I find no sin in it. Nothing is more against nature than to marry June and December; and it is unnatural to make productions by the mixture of a horse and an ass; and yet it is done without scruple. But, in these and the like cases, the commandment and nothing else is the measure of right and wrong.

5. (3.) When the measure of the commandment is observed, the degree of the sin is not to be derived from the greatness nor smallness of its unreasonableness in its own nature, nor yet by its contradicting a prime or a secondary reason.

The reason of the first is,—because there are no degrees of reason in the nature of things. Reason is an indivisible thing, simple as the understanding; and it only receives increase by numbers, or by complication with matter and relations. It is as unreasonable to think a thought against God, as to kill a man. It is as unreasonable and unnatural to speak against experience, as against a necessary proposition; against a truth in mathematics, as against a truth in Scripture; and in the proper natural reason of things there can be no difference in degrees, for a truth increases not, neither can it decrease.

The reason of the second is,—because that a reason is prime or secondary, is accidental to the case of conscience, or to the efficacy of its persuasion. For before contracts were made or dominions distinguished, it was a prime truth, that such things, as every one seized on, were his own by the priority of title. It was a secondary truth, that every one was to be permitted to his right for which he hath contracted, and which is in his possession. Now these reasons are prime or consequent according to the state of things to which they are fitted, but the reason from thence receives no increment, nor the fact any alteration.

6. And this is also true, whether the reason be known to us with or without a teacher. For the highest truths of God are such, as are communicated by revelation; and it is all one, whether God teaches us by nature or by grace, by discourse or by experience. There is this only difference, that in such truths which are taught, some men can have an excuse, because all are not alike instructed in them; but in those things which are born with us, or are consented to as soon as spoken, it cannot be supposed but all men (that are not fools) know them; and therefore, they can have no pretence of ignorance in such cases: so that sins against prime or secondary truths, against truths original or consequent, truths born or taught, do not differ in the nature of the things, but may cause an accidental difference in the person, and may take from him the excuse of ignorance, and so make the man more sinful; but not the action in itself and in its own nature worse.

RULE VII.

Actions, which are forbidden by the Law of Nature either for Defect of Power, or for the Incapacity of the Matter, are not only unlawful, but also void.

1. This is true in contracts, and acts of donation, in vows and dedition, and all rely upon the same reason. He that cannot give, and he that cannot be given, cannot contract or be contracted with. Titius intends to marry Cornelia's servant, because he desires to have children, and to live comfortably with the wife of his youth. He does so; and in their first access he finds her, whom he thought to be a woman, to be a eunuch; and, therefore, not a person capable of making such a contract: she did ill in contracting, but she hath done nothing at all besides that ill, for the contract is void by the incapacity of the person.

2. Upon this account, the lawyers amongst the causes of the nullities of marriage, reckon "error personæ," "the mistake of the person;" though certainly this is not to be extended beyond the mere incapacities of nature, if we speak of natural nullities. Thus if I contract with Millenia whom I suppose to be a lady, and she proves to be a servant, or of mean extraction, though if she did deceive me she did ill in it, yet if she could naturally verify that contract, that is, do all the offices of a wife, the contract is not naturally void; whether it be void upon a civil account is not here to be inquired: but by the law of nature it is void only if by nature it cannot be consummate. For by a civil inconvenience or mistake the contracts of nature cannot be naturally invalid; because that is after nature and of another consideration, and of a different matter. For that a man's wife should be rich, or free, is no more of the necessity of the contract of marriage, than it is that she should be good-natured, or healthful; with this only difference, that if a man contracts upon certain conditions, the contract is void, if the conditions be not verified; and for those things which are present and actual, he can contract, but not for what is future, contingent, and potential. A man may contract with a maiden to take her for his wife, if she be free, or if she have such a portion; but not upon condition that she shall be healthful for seven years. Because whatever condition can be stipulated for, must be actual before consummation of the marriage: afterwards it is for better or worse: the want of any such condition is not so great an evil to the man, as it is to the woman to be left after she is dishonoured. So that if it be a thing which can be contracted for, and be actually contracted for, in the destitution of the condition the contract is void. But if there be no such express stipulation made, there is nothing can be made a nullity by nature, but that which is a natural incapacity: and, therefore, if a gentleman contracts with a slave whom he thinks to be a free woman, with a bastard whom he thinks to be legitimate, with a beggar whom he thinks to be a great heiress, the contract is naturally valid; because there is in it all the natural capacity; if she be a woman, if she can be a wife, and can be his, there is no more required to a verification of the contract in the law of nature. By the way I desire it be observed, that to separate or disannul a contract is not the same thing with declaring it to be null of itself or from the beginning. The reason why I insert this here, is, lest the explication of the rule seem infirm upon the account of other instances: for if a man marries a woman whom he took for a maid, and she proves not to be so, by the Mosaic law she was to be separated by death or divorce: but this is not a nullity: but a divorce may be for that cause, which was in being before the marriage, as well as for the same reason after.

3. The other natural cause of invalidity is, when the contract is made by him, who had no power naturally to make it. This happens in case of precontracts. Spurius Fescennius woos a Greek virgin, and obtaining her consent, contracts himself to her, and promises to marry her within a certain limited time. But before the expiration of that time, Publius Niger dies, and leaves his widow young, and rich, and noble; which advantages Fescennius observing, grows in love with them, and in a short time quits his pretty Greek, and marries the rich Roman lady. But being troubled in conscience about the fact, inquires what he hath done, and what he ought to do: and he was answered thus, "If he was married to the Greek, he must return to her if she will receive him, and quit his new lady; because he was not a person capable to contract with her, being married to another; a dead man may as well marry, as that a husband can marry to another, and quit that which had possessed all his former power." For, in all moral actions, there must be a substantial, potestative principle, that must have proportioned power to the effect; a thing cannot be done without a cause and principle in morality, any more than in nature: If a woman goes about to consecrate the holy sacrament, it is χείρ ἄκυρος, it is "an ineffective hand," she sins for attempting it, and cannot do it afterwards; and it were wiser and truer, if men would think the same thing of their giving baptism, unless they will confess that to baptize children is a mere natural and secular action, to which natural powers are sufficient; or that women have received spiritual powers to do it; and that whether a priest or a woman does it, is no difference, but matter of order only. If an effect be spiritual, the agent must be so too; if the effect be gracious and precarious, so must the active cause; thus it is in contracts, and donations, which cannot be done without the power of him that does it. But he who hath already given away his power, hath none to act withal: he cannot do one action twice.

4. But this is to be understood only after the actual cession of the power and active principle; not after promises, but after possession. Therefore, if Fescennius was only contracted or promised for the future, though he sinned grievously in afterwards contracting with the other, yet it is valid. For a promise takes not away our dominion in a thing, but obliges us to use it in a certain manner. Bartolus appoints his cousin Ancharanus to be his proctor at a synod, and promises that he will not revoke the deputation: but afterwards does; he is a breaker of promise; but the revocation is good. So it is in testaments, and so in promises. For if, after promise, we have no right in the thing which we have promised, then we have no power to perform it; but if we have a right, then the after-act is valid, because it hath a natural potestative cause; but if the power be past from us, as if Fescennius were married to the Greek, he had not himself to give; for as he in the comedy said of servants,

Τοῦ σώματος γὰρ οὐκ ἔᾶ τὸν κύριον
Κρατεῖν ὁ δαίμων, ἀλλὰ τὸν ἐωνημένον. ARISTOPH.

"The man hath not power over his own body, but the master hath;" so hath the wife over the husband, and therefore he hath nothing now to give, and if he does, he does nothing; the man loses his honesty, but the wife does not lose her right. But of the instance I am to speak in its own place. Here only I am to consider the general rule and its reason.

RULE VIII.

When an Act is forbidden by the Law of Nature for the Turpitude and Undecency that it hath in the Matter of the Action, the Act is also void, when the Turpitude remains or hath a perpetual Cause.

1. HE that contracts a marriage with his father's wife, or any marriage in which every illicit act is a new sin, hath not only sinned in making the contract, but the marriage is void by the law of nature; and the reason is, because no man can bind himself to sin; so that here also there is a defect of power: no man can bind himself against God; and the law of nature, whose prime rule is to do good and to eschew evil, cannot verify an act, which prevaricates her greatest principle. Nature cannot give leave to sin against nature; it were a contradiction: for then the same thing should be according to nature, and not according; and this is expressly affirmed in the law; * "Quod leges prohibent, si perpetuam causam servaturum est, cessat obligatio: ut si sororem sibi nupturam aliquis stipuletur." He that promises to marry his sister is not bound to verify it; and if he have done it, he is bound to quit her, because every act of conjunction with her is incestuous, and a state of sin cannot be consented to, nor verified by nature, who is an essential enemy to it.

2. This is to be understood only in things forbidden by the law of nature, the eternal law of God, or his positive temporary law; but is not true in things forbidden only by men: the reason of them both is, because no man hath power to contract against a Divine law: but if he have contracted against a human law, his contract is established by a Divine law, and is greater than the human, where the Divine does not intervene by some collateral interest. The law of the church of Rome forbids some persons to contract marriage; and yet if they do, the contract is valid; because the persons being naturally, or by Divine law, capable of contracting, they only sinned who entered against law or leave, but they sinned then only; for the after-actions, being no sins, cannot be invalidated.

3. And yet if the contract be made against a Divine law, it is not invalid, unless the Divine law have a perpetual influence upon the state, or renewed actions. If a Jew did buy and sell upon the sabbath, he sinned against a Divine law; but his contract is valid. He that contracts with a woman of fornications, and lies with her for a price, hath sinned in so doing, but is bound to pay her the price of her lust: because nothing here is against the Divine law but the fornication; but the contract being extrinsic to the nature of the sin, is not made null by that sin: but that which is intrinsically evil, is for ever so, and therefore must be broken in pieces.

4. In all other cases, whatsoever is forbidden by the law of nature, is a sin, if it be done, but it is valid and effective to all purposes of that law. It is against the law of nature to take a great price for a trifle, but if it be contracted for, it must be paid. If a thief makes me promise to pay him twenty pounds the next day; though he sinned against a natural law in doing me that violence, and exacting of me that promise, yet the stipulation must stand.

The sum is this; wherever there is power, and will, and, in the permanent effect, consonancy to the prime measures of nature, there the actions are valid, though they entered at the wrong door.

But he that wants power, let his will be ever so strong, it effects nothing without: it is just like the king that commanded the waves of the sea not to come to the foot of his chair; they came for all his will to the contrary.

He that wants will, wants also an integral part of the constitution of the act, and does nothing.

But when he hath a natural and legal power, and an effective will, yet if the whole state or the after-actions dwell in sin, it cannot be permitted by nature, but must be turned out of doors.

RULE IX.

The Law of Nature can be dispensed with by the Divine Power.^a

1. I AM willing publicly to acknowledge, that I was always, since I understood it, a very great enemy to all those questions of the school, which inquire into the power of God: as “whether, by God’s absolute power, a body can be in two places:”—“whether God can give leave to a man to sin:”—and very many there are of them to as little purpose. But yet here I am willing to speak in the like manner of expression, because the consequent and effect of it goes not to a direct inquiry concerning the Divine power, for it intends to remonstrate, that because God does actually dispense in his own law, this prime law of God, or the law of nature, is nothing else but the express and declared will of God in matters proportionable to right reason and the nature of man.

2. But in order to the present inquiry, it is to be observed that God’s dispensation is otherwise than man’s dispensation; 1. God is the supreme law-giver, and hath immediate power and influence over laws, and can cancel these, and impose those, new or old, as he please. By this power it is that he can relax to particular persons their personal obligation, “quod hic et nunc et sic;” and if he does, the law still remaining in its force and power to other persons and in other cases, this is properly dispensation. 2. God is the supreme Lord, and can transfer dominions and take away kingdoms, and give them to whom he please; and when he makes such changes, if he commands any one to be his minister in such translations, he does legitimate all those violences, by which those changes are to be effected: and this also is a dispensation; but improperly. 3. God is also the supreme judge, and can punish and exauctorate whom he please, and substitute others in their room: and when he does so by command and express declaration of his will, then also he dispenses in those obligations of justice, or obedience, or duty respectively, by which the successor, or substitute, or minister, was hindered from doing that which, before the command, was a sin, but now is none: and this also is another manner of dispensation. Some doctors of the law are resolved to call nothing dispensation, but the first of these: and the other under another name shall signify the same thing; but, say they, he only dispenses who takes off the obligation directly, by his legislative power, without using his judicative and potestative,—he who does it as an act of direct jurisdiction, not as a lord, or a judge, but as a law-giver: now, say they, “God does never, as a law-giver, cancel or abrogate any law of nature: but, as a lord, he transfers rights; and, as a judge, he may use what instruments he please in executing his sentence, and so by subtracting or changing the matter of the laws of nature, he changes the whole action.” To these things I make this reply.

^a Vide reg. 1. n. 43, 44, &c.

3. (1.) That this is doing the same thing under another manner of speaking. For when it is inquired whether the law of nature is dispensable, the meaning is, whether or no that which is forbidden by the law of nature, may, in certain cases, be done without sin: but we mean not to inquire whether or no this change of actions from unlawful to lawful be that which the lawyers, in their words of art, and as they define it, call "dispensation:" for in matters of conscience, it is pedantry to dispute concerning the forms and terms of art, which men, to make their nothings seem learning, dress up into order and methods, like the dressings and paintings of people that have no beauty of their own: but here the inquiry is, and ought to be, more material, in order to practice and cases of conscience. For if I may by God be permitted to do that, which by the law of nature I am not permitted, then I am dispensed with in the law of nature, that is, a leave is given to me to do what otherwise I might not.

4. (2.) That the doing of this by any of the forenamed instruments or ways, is a dispensation, and so really to be called, appears in the instances of all laws. For if it be pretended, that the pope can dispense in the matter of vows, or a prince in the matter of marriages, which are rate and firm by the law of nature; he cannot do it by direct jurisdiction or by annulling the law, which is greater than either king or bishop: for when a dispensation is given in these instances, it is not given but when there is cause: and when there is cause, the matter is changed; and though the law remains, yet in a changed matter the obligation is taken off; and this is that which all the world calls dispensation, and so it is in the present question; when God changes the matter, or the case is pitiable, or some greater end of God is to be served, that is, when there is cause, God dispenses, that is, takes off the obligation. Here only is the difference.

5. (3.) In Divine dispensations, God makes the cause; for his laws are so wise, so prudent, so fitted for all needs and persons and all cases, that there is no default or new arising case which God did not foresee: but because he hath ends of providence, of justice, of goodness, or power to serve, he often introduces new causes of things, and then he gives leave to men to finish his designs by instruments, which, without such leave, would be unlawful. But, in human dispensations, the cause is prepared beforehand, not by the lawgiver, but by accident and unavoidable defect: for, without cause, dispensations are not to be granted; but in both, the dispensation is not without the changing of the matter, that is, without altering the case. God does not give leave to any man to break a natural law, as long as he keeps that natural law in its own force and reason; and neither does a prince or bishop give leave to any subject to break any of his laws when there is no need: for the first would be a contradiction, and the second a plain ruin of his power, and a contempt to his laws: therefore, in the sum of affairs, it is all one; and because actions, generally forbidden by the law of nature, may by God be commanded to be done, and then are made lawful by a temporal command, which he made unlawful by nature or first sanction; this is a direct dispensing with single persons in the law of nature. And to say it is not a dispensation, because God does not do it by an act of simple jurisdiction, but by the intermixture of his dominative and judicial power,—is nothing but to say that God, having made a law agreeable to reason, will not do against that reason which himself made, till he introduces a higher, or another. For while all things remain as was foreseen or intended in the law, both Divine or human laws are indispensable; that is, neither God in his providence, nor men in the administration of justice and government, do at all relax their law. If it be said, a king can do it by his absolute power, though it be unjust; I confess this God cannot do, because he can do no wrong: but if God does it, his very doing it makes it just; and this a king cannot do. But if the question be of matter of power, abstracting from considerations of just or unjust; there is no peradventure but God can do in his own law, as much as any prince can do in his. When the matter is changed, the Divine law is as changeable as the human, with this only difference, that to change the matter of a Divine natural law, is like the changing of the order of nature; sometimes it is done by miracle; and so is the law also changed, by extraordinary dispensation; but this, although it can happen as often as God please, yet it does happen but seldom as a miracle; but, in human laws, it can and does often happen, and therefore they are to be dispensed with frequently: and sometimes the case can so wholly alter, and the face of things be so entirely new, and the inconvenience so intolerable, that the whole law must pass away into desuetude and nullity; which can never happen in the Divine natural law; because the reason of it is as eternal as nature herself: and can only be interrupted by rare contingencies of God's procuring, as the order of nature is by miracle; but will revert, because nature will return into her channel, and her laws into their proper obligation.

6. (4.) But now to the matter of fact that God hath dispensed not only by subtraction or alteration of the matter, but by direct jurisdiction,—that is, as he is a Judge, and a Lord, and a Lawgiver, even in all the ways, in which dispensations can be made,—appears in several instances.

7. (1.) That the marriage of one man and one woman is by the law of nature, appears by the institution of marriage, and by Christ's revocation of it to the first sanction. It was so from the beginning; and if any thing be a law of nature, that is one by the consent of all men: and yet Moses permitted divorces; and God, and Moses, his servant, permitted polygamy, when there was no necessity, no change of the matter or of case, but only that men had a mind to it. For if the conjunction of male and female was established "in singulari conjugio" at the first, when there might be a greater necessity of multiplying wives for the peopling of the world, then as the world grew more populous, the necessity could less be pretended; therefore, this must be an act of pure jurisdiction: the causes of exception or dispensation grew less, when the dispensation was more frequent, and therefore it was only a direct act of jurisdiction. Though I confess that to distinguish dominion from jurisdiction, and the power of a judge from that of a lawgiver, I mean when both are supreme, and the power of a lord from them both, is a distinction without real difference; for as he is our lord he gives us laws, and judges us by those laws: and, therefore, nothing is material in this inquiry, but whether the action can pass from unlawful to lawful; though because lawyers and other schools of learning use to speak their shibboleth, I thought it not amiss to endeavour to be understood by them in their own way. So again, that brother and sister should not marry, is supposed to be a law of nature; but yet God dispensed with it in the case of Cain and his sister: and this he did as a lord or as a lawgiver; he made it necessary to be so, and yet it was not necessary he should make it so; for he could have created twenty men and twenty women as well as one: but that which is incest in others, was not so in him; but there was no signal act of dominion or of judicature in this, but it was the act of a free agent; and done because God would do so; whether this be jurisdiction or dominion, let who can determine.

8. (2.) But in some things God did dispense by changing the matter, using that which men are pleased to call the right of dominion. Thus God did dispense with Abraham in the matter of the sixth commandment; God commanded him to kill his son, and he obeyed, that is, resolved to do it, and willed that which in others would be wilful murder. Now God was lord of Isaac's life, and might take it away himself, and therefore it was just: but when he gave Abraham command to do it, he did not do it but by dispensing with him in that commandment. It is true that God, by his dominion, made the cause for the dispensation; but yet it was a direct dispensation; and it is just as if God should, by his dominion, resolve to take away the lives of the men in a whole nation, and should give leave to all mankind to kill all that people as fast as they could meet them, or when they had a mind to it: and this was the case of the sons of Israel, who had leave to kill the Canaanites and their neighbours. God dispensed with them in the matter of the sixth and eighth commandments: for it is not enough to say, that God, as lord of lives and fortunes, had divested them of their rights, and permitted them to others: for that is not enough, that God, as Lord, hath taken away the lives, and liberties, and possessions of any man, or community of men: for that act of dominion is not enough to warrant any man to execute the Divine decree; nay, though God hath decreed and declared it concerning a crime that it shall be capital, yet a man must have more than this to make it lawful to put that man to death. He must be a minister of the Divine jurisdiction; he must have a power intrusted to him from God, and a commission to execute the Divine sentence; and from hence it follows undeniably, that since the delegate power is a delegate jurisdiction, and without this, a man may not put a capital offender to death; that, therefore, the Supreme Power from whence the delegation is commissioned, is also a power of jurisdiction; and therefore, if the words of their own art are true, this leave given to do that which, without that leave, were a sin against the law of nature, is properly and truly a dispensation.

9. (3.) The third way of dispensing is by applying the power of a judge to a certain person or community, and, by way of punishment, to take from him what cannot be taken from him but by superior power, or by the supreme; thus we are commanded, by the law of nature, to give nourishment, and to make provisions for our children; but if our children prove rebellious and unnatural, God can command us to neglect that duty, and to expose them to the contingencies of fortune. It is, by the law of nature, commanded to us to love and honour our parents, to be loving and kind to our children; but if parents enticed their children to idolatry, their children might lay their hands upon them, and stone them to death. It is a command and a prime rule of the law of nature, that we should do as we would be done to: but even in this original rule and great sanction, God did dispense with the Israelites, for they might not exact upon one another by usury; but to strangers they might: what they hated to have done to themselves, they were willing and expressly permitted to do to others. In these and the like cases, although an act of dominion or judgment might intervene, yet that is not enough to warrant the irregular action; there must be an act of jurisdiction besides, that is, if God commands it, or, by express declaration, warrants it, then it may be done. Thus God as a judge, and being angry with David, intended to punish him, by suffering his concubines to be humbled by his son in the face of all Israel: but though he did it justly, yet because Absalom had no command or warrant to do what God threatened, he was criminal. But Jeroboam and Jehu had commissions for what they did, though of itself it was otherwise violent, unjust, rebellious, and unnatural; and therefore, did need the same authority to legitimate it, by which it became unlawful. God often punishes a prince by the rebellion of his subjects; God is just in doing it: but he hates the instruments and will punish them with a fearful destruction, unless they do repent; in this case, nothing can warrant the subjects to strike, but an express command of God.

10. Thus, I conceive, the thing itself is clear and certain: but for the extension of this, the case is yet in question, and it is much disputed amongst them that admit this rule in any sense, how many laws of nature can be dispensed with: for if all, then the consequents will be intolerable; if not all, by what are they separated, since they all seem to be established by the bands of eternal reason. Some say that the precepts of the second table are dispensable, but not the first; but that is uncertain, or rather certainly false; for if God did please, he might be worshipped by the interposition of an image; or if he essentially should hate that, as indeed in very many periods of the world he hath severely forbidden it; yet the second commandment and the fourth have suffered alteration, and in some parts of them are extinguished. Others say that the negative precepts are indispensable; but not the affirmative. But this is not true; not only because every negative is complicated with an affirmative, and every affirmative hath a negative in the arms of it, but because all the precepts of the second table, the first only excepted, are negative; and yet God can dispense with all of them, as I have already proved.

11. But though it be hard to tell how far this dispensation and economy can reach, and to what particulars it can extend, because God's ways are unsearchable, and his power not to be understood by us; yet since our blessed Saviour hath made up a perfect system of the natural law, and hath obtained to himself an everlasting kingdom, so that his law must last as long as the world lasts, and by it God will govern mankind for ever; by the eternal reasonableness and proportions of this law, we can tell what is indispensable and what not; and the measure by which alone we can guess at it, is this,—every matter from whence the “ratio debiti,” or “cause of the obligation,” can be taken, is dispensable. Now because God is supreme over all his creatures, and can change all their affairs, and can also choose the manner of his own worship, therefore in these things he can dispense.

12. But in that essential duty, which his creatures owe to him, the case is different; for though God can exact more or fewer instances of affirmative duty, these or others, yet there cannot be an alteration of the main relation; and of the intrinsic duty, and the intercourse of the soul with God in the matter of the principal affections, there can be no dispensation. It is eternally and indispensably necessary, that we love God: and it were a contradiction that either God should command us to hate him, or that we could obey him if he did. For obedience is love; and, therefore, if we obeyed God commanding us to hate him, we should love him in hating him, and obey him by our disobedience.

13. Now if it be inquired, to what purposes of conscience all this inquiry can minister; the answer to the inquiry will reduce it to practice; for the proper corollaries of this determination of the question are these.

14. (1.) That our duty to God is supreme; it is only due to him; it cannot be lessened, and ought not, upon any pretence, to be extinguished; because his will is the only measure of our obedience; and whatsoever is in nature, is so wholly for God and for God's service, that it ought to bend, and decline from its own inclination to all the compliances in the world which can please God. Our reason, our nature, our affections, our interest, our piety, our religion, are, and ought to be, God's subjects perfectly; and that which they desire, and that which we do, hath in it no good, no worthiness, but what it derives from the Divine law and will.

15. (2.) That, in the sanction of the Divine laws, the reason obliges more than the letter: for since the change of the reason is the ground of all mutation and dispensation in laws, it is certain that the reason and the authority, that in the thing, this in God, are the soul and the spirit of the law: and though this must not be used so as to neglect the law when we fancy a reason, yet when the letter and the reason are in opposition, this is to be preferred before that. If the reason ceases, it is not enough of warrant to neglect the law; unless a contrary reason arises, and that God cannot be served, by obedience in that instance: but when the case is not only otherwise but contrary to what it was before; let the design of God be so observed, as that the letter be obeyed in that analogy and proportion. It is a natural law, that we should not deceive our neighbour; because his interest and right is equal to any man's else: but if God hath commanded me to kill him, and I cannot, by force, get him into my hand, I may deceive him whom God hath commanded me to kill; if, without such a snare, I cannot obey the command of God. But this is but seldom practicable, because the reasons, in all natural laws, are so fixed and twisted with the accidents of every man's life, that they cannot alter but by miracle, or by an express command of God; and therefore we must, in the use of this rule, wholly attend upon the express voice of God.

16. (3.) It hence also will follow, that if an angel from heaven, or any prophet, or dreamer of dreams, any teacher and pretendedly illuminate person, shall teach or persuade to any act against any natural law, that is, against any thing which is so reasonable and necessary, that it is bound upon our natures by the Spirit of God and the light of our reason,—he is not to be heard: for until God changes his own establishments, and turns the order of things into new methods and dispositions, the natural obligations are sacred and inviolable.

17. (4.) From the former discourses it will follow, that the Holy Scriptures of the New Testament are the light of our eyes, and the entire guide of our conscience in all our great lines of duty; because there our blessed Lord hath perfectly registered all the natural and essential obligations of men to God, and to one another; and that in these things no man can or ought to be prejudiced; in these things no man is to have a fear, but to act with confidence and diligence, and that concerning the event of these things no man is to have any jealousies; because since all the precepts of Christ are perfective of our nature, they are instruments of all that felicity of which we can be capable, and by these we shall receive all the good we can hope for: and that, since God hath, by his holy Son, declared this will of his to be lasting, and never more to be changed by any succeeding lawgiver, we must rest here, and know that no power less than God can change any thing of this, and that by this law we shall stand or fall in the eternal scrutiny.

RULE X.

The Law of Nature cannot be dispensed with by any human Power.

1. THE reason is, 1. Because nature and her laws have both the same author, and are relative to each other, and these as necessary to the support and improvement of human nature, as nourishment to the support of human bodies: and as no man can create new appetites, or make hay or stones to be our nourishment; so neither can he make, that our nature should be maintained in its well-being without these laws. 2. The laws of nature, being bound upon us by the law of God, cannot be dispensed withal, unless by a power equal, or the same, or superior to that which made the sanction: but that cannot be at all; therefore neither can they be dispensed with at all, unless it be by God himself. 3. Natural laws are all the dictates of natural reason; and he that dispenses with the law, must have power to alter the reason, which because it can never be done but by superinducing something upon nature greater than her own natural need, and none can do this but God; therefore none but he can dispense.

2. But because wise men^b have publicly said it, "Per jus gentium et civile aliquid detrahitur de jure naturali;" "by the law of nations and the civil laws, something may be diminished from the law of nature," it is to be considered what truth they could signify by those words: for unless by some instances of case they had seen it lawful, it is not to be supposed it could have been, by so wise persons, made sacred. But the following measures are its limit.

3. (1.) Whatsoever is forbidden by the natural law, cannot be permitted by the civil; because where the highest power hath interposed, there the inferior and subordinate hath no authority; for all it hath being from the superior, it cannot be supposed it can prejudice that, from whence it hath all its being; for if it could be otherwise, then either the inferior must be above the supreme, or the supreme must submit itself to what is under it.

4. (2.) Whatsoever is commanded by the law of nature, cannot be forbidden by the civil law; for God, who is here the lawgiver, is to be heard; and he sets up no authority against himself, nor gives any man leave to disobey him. These rely upon the same reasons, and are described above.

5. (3.) That which the law of nature hath permitted, and no more, may be made up into a civil law, or it may be forbidden, according to that rule in the law, "Quod licitum est ex superveniente causâ, mutatur:" "That which is only lawful by a supervening cause, may be changed." For rights are before laws in time and nature; and are only such licenses as are left when there are no laws. Commands and prohibitions of nature not being the matter of civil laws, unless it be by way of corroboration; there can no laws be made in a natural matter, unless there be restraints or continued permissions of their first rights. For that which, in morality, we call "indifferent,"—in nature we call "a right;" that is, something that is permitted me to do or to use as I see cause for, is a thing upon which no restraint is made; that is, there is no law concerning it: but, therefore, the civil law may restrain it, because the liberty and its use may do mischief, and there is no law hinders it to be disposed by men. For if I may, by my private power or interest, use any of it, or deny myself the use of it, much more may the civil power do it. I might not do it myself, if any law of God had forbidden me; but if no law of God hath forbidden, what can hinder but that the civil power may order it? such are natural liberty, community, powers of revenge, of taking any thing, of killing any man that injures me.

6. (4.) That which is confirmed by the law of nature, may, by the civil power, be altered and dispensed with: which happens in two cases.

1. When the obligation supposes a foregoing act of the will, and is arbitrary in one of the terms of relation. Titius owes a thousand pounds to Caius, and by the essential or natural laws of justice is bound to pay him; but because this supposes a private right in Caius, upon whom there is no restraint but he may use it, or let it alone; therefore Caius, being at his liberty, may refuse to use his power of demanding the money of Titius, and forgive it him; and if he do, Titius, although bound by the natural law to pay him, is, by the private power of Caius, dispensed with. Because in obligations, as in arguments, if there be one leg that can fail, the conclusion is infirm. If one part can be loosed, the continuity of the whole is dissolved.

2. The other case is like this, when the obligation is upon a condition, if the condition of itself fails or be annulled by any just power or interest, the obligation which was introduced by the law of nature, can be rescinded or dispensed with: for nature binds and looses according to the capacity of the things. It passes a temporal band upon temporal reasons and necessities, and an eternal band upon that whose reason can never fail, and where the necessity is indeterminate. And if a natural law could bind longer than that reason lasts for which it did bind, then a natural law could be unreasonable, which is a contradiction. But then if the law does not bind in this case beyond the condition; then it is but improperly to be called a dispensation, when it is relaxed; but it is usual to call it so, and it is well enough, for it means this great direction to conscience, that though the law of God be eternal, yet its obligation may cease in the foregoing cases: for even judges are said to dispense by interpreting the law and applying that interpretation to particulars.

7. (5.) The civil law can extrinsically change the natural law. For things may be altered or cease by an intrinsic or by an extrinsic cause. A father ceases to be a father when he dies, and he ceases to be a father if all his children die; this alteration is by an extrinsic cause; but to all effects and purposes it is the same as to the present case. Now, though nature cannot die, as species do not perish; yet nature may change, as individuals may die: that is, if the matter of the law be subtracted, or so changed that it is to be governed with another portion of reason, then the law also must cease as to that particular. For as in the body of man there is great variety of accidents and mutability of matter, but all that variety is governed by the various flexures of the same reason, which remains unchanged in all the complications and twistings about the accidents, and is the same though working otherwise: so it is in the laws of nature; whose reason and obligation remains unchanged, even when it is made to comply with changing instances; but then it cannot but be said to change, even as eternity itself hath successive parts by its co-existence with variety of times. Tribonianus swears fealty to Tarcinius Priscus, king of the Romans, and to his heirs for ever; by the laws of nature he is now obliged, but if he and his son Sextus be deposed and murdered, and a new government established in another form or in another time,—the law of nature cannot bind him to that which is not, and therefore he is disobliged.

8. The sum is this; when natural and prime laws are in prime and natural instances whose matter is unchangeable,—there the law of nature cannot be prejudiced by any but by the Lord of nature: and the reason of this is no other but the necessity and constitution of nature: God hath made it so, and it is so to be served, so to be provided for, and the law is a portion of the eternal law, an image of the Divine wisdom, as the soul is the image of the Divine nature. But when the natural laws are in a matter that can be prejudiced, and do presuppose contract, cession, condition, particular states, or any act of will, whose cause is not perpetual, the law binds by the condition of the matter; and the eternal law goes from its own matter as the immortal soul does from the body. Thus we say, that God's gifts are without repentance, and his love never fails, and his promises are for ever, and yet God does take away his gifts, and does repent of his loving-kindnesses, and takes away his love, and will not give what he had promised; but it is not because he changes in himself, but the correlative of his actions and promises are changed.

9. So that now, upon this account, the whole question and practice about the pope's power in dispensing in the natural law, will appear to be a horrible folly, without any pretence of reason; and the thing, by its chiefest patrons, seems not at all to be understood. For since the rules of nature are unalterable and eternal, the law being framed upon those rules complicated with matter, and persons, and events, is also eternal, excepting only where the matter is or can be changed. Now if the matter be in prime instances, as the conjunction of sexes, relation of parents and children, &c. the law is the same for ever; only this, if the matter, by a miracle or extraordinary act of God, be changed, by the same power the law is to be changed: but as we say rivers and seas run for ever, and yet Jordan was opened and so was the Red sea, and the perpetual course of the sun and moon was once stopped, but it reverted when the extraordinary case was past: so it is in the law of nature, which, in the prime instances and natural matter, is as unalterable as the course of the sun and seas.

But, 2. Sometimes the matter changes alone, or is changed to our hand, as in conditional contracts, and in this case the law ceases, and the obligation goes off as to that particular.

But, 3. Sometimes the matter is changeable by the will of the interested persons, and by none else but themselves, and they who have over them the power which themselves have: such as God, and under him, the supreme human power, their own princes. Now to apply this to the question of the pope's power in giving dispensations; I consider that,

1. To establish his power upon any words of Scripture, is to pretend that his power of dispensing is an act of jurisdiction and direct authority, that is, that he hath commission to do it with or without reason or cause founded in the thing itself, but only because he will: and he that does so, says he can do more than (as many of the most learned Roman doctors say) God can do; for he dispenses in the law of nature in no case, but when he changes the matter, in the prime or second instances of nature respectively, which when the pope can do, he also may pretend to a commission of being lord of nature: but it is certain, that for this there are no words of Scripture. But, 2. If this power of dispensing be such as supposes the matter already changed, that is, that there is a just cause, which is of itself sufficient, but is not so to him who is concerned, till it be competently declared,—then all the dispute will be reduced to this, whether he be the most probable doctor? for to expound when a natural obligation ceases, is not an act of power, but of wisdom; and that the pope is the wisest man, or the only wise man, it is also certain that there are no words of Scripture to affirm it. But besides this, in cases of this nature, there needs no dispensation; for the law ceases of itself; as in contracts made upon condition, when the condition is not performed. In human laws, where the subject is bound more by the authority than the matter of laws, the law may still be obligatory after the ceasing of the reason or matter of the law; and so there may be need of dispensation: but we speak here of laws bound on us by God and nature, in which the very ceasing of the matter, of itself, dispenses with the law. But, 3. If it be yet more than this, and that in a changeable matter, I mean, in things that are not prime instances of nature, and of lasting necessity, but in human contracts, promises, laws, and vows, which depend upon the pleasure and choice of men, but yet are corroborated by the law of nature, he pretends to a power of altering the case so as to make way for dispensation; then the pretence reaches to this, that the pope must be lord of actions and fortunes, and the wills of others and the contracts of men; that is, in effect, that no contract shall be valid unless he please; and no man shall choose for himself; or if he does, he needs not stand to it; and no man can have a right transferred to him by a contract, but it can be rescinded against the will of the interested person, and if he can have any such power to do thus much mischief, then justice will be the most contingent thing in the world; and the question will not be a question of theology, but of empire, and temporal regard, and therefore for this no words of Scripture can be pretended, because no words of Scripture of the New Testament ever did transfer an empire, or temporal power, to a spiritual person for a spiritual reason; so that this will be a question of war, not of peace and religion. To which I add this, by way of provision; that although supreme princes have, in some cases, power to rescind contracts of their subjects,—and parents, of their children; yet this is only, in their own circuits, done by mutual consent, in case of public necessity or utility, of which, by reason and the laws, they are made competent judges: which the pope also may have in his temporal dominions as well as any other prince: but this is not dispensation, but the annulling of contracts or promises; it makes them not to be at all, not to cease after they have a being, which is the nature of dispensation, of which we now inquire. But the matter of this question, and the particular instance, as it relates to the bishop of Rome, is of another consideration.

10. (6.) The civil law can add to the law of nature:—not only new obligations by affixing temporal penalties; but by requiring new circumstances to corroborate and consummate an action; not that the civil law of a prince or republic can annul any thing which nature hath confirmed, but it can hinder it from passing into a civil and public warranty. Thus a clandestine contract is valid by the law of nature; and in the court of conscience there are witnesses, and judges, and executioners, and laws, and penalties, to exact the performance of it; but when the civil or ecclesiastic law hath commanded, that in all contracts of marriage there should be witnesses, it must mean, that the contract shall not be acknowledged for legitimate, unless there be; and therefore, that the contract must be solemnly published, before it be civilly firm. No civil power can so enjoin witnesses, as that, if the contract be made without witnesses, it shall not be obligatory in conscience. For this obligation is before the civil law, and is bound by that power, by which the civil power hath a being. But the civil power, which cannot annul the act of nature and conscience, can superinduce something upon it. It cannot make the contractors to go back from what they have done, but to proceed to something more, that what was firm in the inward, may be confirmed in the outward court. By our laws, the clandestine contract is civilly null before publication; but in our religion, we believe it obligatory in conscience, and that it must come into publication. But by the laws of Rome, the whole contract is nullified, and the persons disobliged, and the marriage after consummation is dissolved. This is against the law of nature, but the other is a provision for it by additional security, that is, a taking care that the contracts of nature may not be denied.—For the confirmation of a natural contract nothing is necessary but a natural capacity not hindered by the Lord of nature.—Whatsoever, therefore, is superinduced upon nature, cannot disannul that, to which all things competently necessary are ingredient; a condition brought in by a less power cannot invalidate that, which, before that condition, was valid: but as civil powers derive their authority from natural laws and reason, so to these they must minister, and they may do it by addition and superfetation; but they may not violate them by irritation.

RULE XI.

That the Obligation to a natural Law does cease in any particular, is not to be presumed by every one, but is to be declared by the public Voice.

1. THIS depends upon the foregoing discourses, and is consequent to them. For the several dispensations in the law of nature being wrought by the change of their subject matter, the rule can never be changed; because that is eternal, and is abstract from matter; but the law may be dispensed with, because that is twisted with matter, which is not eternal. But then, because the several matters of laws can be changed by several powers respectively, that power which alters the matter, and consequently dispenses with the law, must, by some evidence or other, make the change apparent. If God by his power alters the case, and dispenses in the law, he also is to declare it: because he must do more; for he must give expressly a leave to do proportionable actions; he having bound us to the law of nature, leaves us so till he tells us otherwise: and the same also is the case, if the matter be changed by man; for by the law of nature we being bound to obey laws and perform contracts, must remain so bound, till he that holds the other end of the string, lets it go or tells us it is untied: because he hath an interest in it, which must not depend upon the reason of another; but upon that which is common to both. For although we all agree, that every rule of nature is unalterable, and every law is to be observed, yet in every thing where a change can be pretended, every man's reason is equal; and therefore is not to be made use of in relation to others. For we all agree that theft is evil; but whether this action or this detention be theft, men's reasons oftentimes cannot agree: and since every man's reason hath the same power and the same privilege, no man's single reason can determine, because there is no reason why yours more than mine. But therefore it is, that there must be some common reason to declare the case, and the man to be at liberty, and the law to be loose.

2. This hath no other variety in it, but this, that although the public voice must declare concerning those instances, that concern that matter of laws natural which is in her keeping, as God is to do in those, in which only he hath immediate power, yet every private man can declare the obligation of a natural law to be loose, when he holds one end of the string. If, by a natural law, Caius be tied to do me an act of kindness and justice, it is my right; and as long as I will demand it, I hold the band of the natural law in my hand; but if I let it go, and will quit my right, the obligation is off, because the matter is subtracted. The reason of all is the same. No man is a good judge in his own case, where there is the interest of another twisted with it: and it is unequal, that my reason should govern my neighbour's interest; or that his should govern mine: this would be an equal mischief, and therefore something indifferent to both must turn the balance, that there may be equal justice and equal provision. But if a man will quit his right, there is no wrong done. He can sufficiently declare his own will and the acts of kindness; and then the law that combines with the matter, takes the same lot.

RULE XII.

The Exactness of natural Laws is capable of Interpretation, and may be allayed by Equity, Piety, and Necessity.

1. WHATSOEVER can be dispensed withal, is either dispensed with by an absolute power of jurisdiction, or for some cause in the nature of the thing: and if the laws of nature can cease to oblige without reason, but by the will and the command of the Supreme, of God himself, much more may the same will and power do it, when there is also a reason: and if there be a reason to take off the obligation wholly in some particulars, then much rather may there be a cause to take off some part of the exactness upon a proportionable cause; if it may be dispensed with, it may also be interpreted by equity; for this is less than that in the same kind. Every man is bound to restore his neighbour's goods, when they are demanded; but if he calls for his sword to kill a man withal,—there is equity in this case, and I am not guilty of the breach of the natural law, if I refuse to deliver him the sword, when he is so violent and passionate. To pay debts is a natural law; but if a rich man calls for a sum of money which is his due, and I, by paying him to-day, shall be undone, and he, by staying till next week, shall not be undone,—I do not break the law of nature, if I detain the money a little longer, and offer him satisfaction for the wrong, if he have received any. I promised my brother to see him upon the ides of March; in my journey to him I broke my leg; now though I, by the natural law, am bound to perform promises, and it is possible, that for all my broken leg I might get to him by the time, yet there is equity in it and piety that I forbear to go with so great an inconvenience. “Surgam ad sponsalia, quia promisi, quamvis non concoxerim: sed non, si febricitavero: subest enim tacita exceptio, si potero, si debebo:” said Seneca.^c There is an equity and a reasonableness in all these things. “Effice, ut idem status sit, cum igitur, qui fuit, cum promitterem.” If the case be, when I am to perform, as it was when I promised, then I am bound “pro ratâ portione,” that is,

2. (1.) If it become impossible, I am wholly disobliged.

3. (2.) If it become accidentally unlawful, I am dispensed with.

4. (3.) If it become intolerably inconvenient, I am in equity to be relieved. For in these cases it is no breach of promise, but I am just if I desire to do it, and in the degree in which I am disabled, in the same I am to be pitied. “Destituere levitas non erit, si aliquid intervenerit novi. Eadem mihi omnia præsta; et idem sum.” “It is not levity when I am the same; but my powers and possibilities are changed or lessened.”—

But this is to be understood and practised with these limitations:

5. (1.) Not every change of case can excuse, or lessen, or alter the obligation, but such a change as makes the person pitiable, or the thing more vexatious to the doer, than it could be of advantage to the other.

6. (2.) If the cause does not continue, the first equity does not disannul the obligation, but defers it only, and it returns when the cause ceases.

7. (3.) The obliged person, as he is not wholly disobliged for the time, so neither for the thing itself; for if it be matter of interest, though without violation of nature's law it may be deferred, and does not bind the man to a guilt, yet it does to a new duty, the duty of giving satisfaction to him who suffered injury: for since, in the law of nature, all men's rights are equal, it is unnatural and unjust that to one there should be remission and ease, and to the other a burden. For no man is to be better by the hurt and injury of another.

8. (4.) If the cause be less, or if it be more, it ought not to be done, unless an interpretative leave be justly or reasonably presumed. In a great matter every man is presumed so charitable as to be willing to comply with his brother's need or sad accident. But if it be less, then the interpretative leave must be presumed upon the stock of friendship or experience, or something upon which wise men usually rely. Only in this case, the presumption ought to be less confident, and more wary.

9. This rule is to be understood principally in matters of justice, and relative intercourses: for in matters of religion and sobriety the case is different; because, in natural religion and natural measures of sobriety, which are founded “in primâ naturâ,” in the very constitution of man's soul and body, in the first laws of God, and the original economy of the body;—the matter is almost as unalterable as the rule.

CHAPTER II.

OF THE LAW OF NATURE, OR OF ALL MANKIND, AS IT IS COMMANDED, DIGESTED, AND PERFECTED, BY OUR SUPREME LAWGIVER, JESUS CHRIST, VIZ. OF THE CHRISTIAN LAW, THE GREAT RULE OF CONSCIENCE.

RULE I.

When the Law of Jesus Christ was established, the Old Testament, or the Law of Moses, did no longer oblige the Conscience.

1. THE doctors^a of the Jews say, that, at the command of a prophet, that is, of one that works miracles, it is lawful to break any commandment, that only excepted, which is concerning the worship of one God. Thus at the command of Joshua^b the children of Israel brake the precept of the sabbath at Jericho, and Samuel^c and Elijah^d offered sacrifice in places otherwise than the law appointed, and the priests in the temple did kill beasts and laboured upon the sabbath, and yet were blameless: and “circumcisio pellit sabbatum,” was their own proverb; on the sabbath they circumcised their infants, and the prophet Jeremy was author to the Jews “in secundâ domo,” that is, after they were taken captive, that they should change their computation by months, and not begin with Nisan.

2. For God, being the supreme Lawgiver, hath power over his own laws,—as, being a Creator, he hath over his own creation; he that gave being, can take it away: and the law may be changed, though God cannot. For God is immutable in his attributes, but his works have variety, and can change every day; as light and darkness succeed each other, and summer and winter, and health and sickness, and life and death, and perfect and imperfect; and he that commanded all men not to kill, might give a commandment to Abraham that he should kill his son; and when he had established the law of Moses, it was in his power, without any imputation or shadow of change, to give the world a new law, and a better.

3. To this purpose our blessed Lord was endued with power from on high to give a new law; for he was a great Prophet, and did many and mighty miracles, and advanced the spiritual worship of the only true God; and brought men from childish and imperfect usages, to the natural, spiritual, manly, and perfective manner of worshipping God; and therefore it was necessary that a change should be made: for in Moses’s law the rites were troublesome and imperfect, chargeable and useless, not able to wash away sins, nor to perfect the spirits of the saints; it exhibited nothing substantial, but by shadows pointed at the substance to be revealed afterwards: it was fitted to the weakness of imperfect people, and in some very great instances was exceeded by the lives and piety of some excellent persons, as Moses and David, who by humility, meekness, forgiveness, and charity, did acts of piety beyond the precepts of the law, and many did not divorce their wives, and yet by their law all were permitted to do it: for it might be said of Moses as by the lawgiver of whom Origen^e speaks, who, being asked if he had given to his citizens the best laws, answered, ὅτι οὐ τοὺς κατὰ πάντα καλλίστους, ἀλλ’ ὧν ἡδύνετο τοὺς καλλίστους, “not absolutely the best, but the best he could, considering the incapacity and averseness of his citizens:” so did Moses; he gave a better law than ever was before, and the best which that people and the state of things could then bear: but it was but for a time, and the very nature of the law required a better to succeed it, and therefore he that came and gave a better, was not to be rejected, because he disannulled the worse: εἰ δὲ οὗτοι πρὸς τὸν κατὰ φύσιν λεγόμενον μέσον εἶον ἀφορῶντες, καὶ ἃ προσίοιεντ’ αὐν καὶ οἱ πολλοί, οἷς τὰ ἐκτός ὡς τὰ ἀγαθὰ ἢ κακὰ, καὶ τὰ τοῦ σώματος ὡσαύτως ὑπείληπται, νομοθετοῦσιν, τί τις τὸν τούτων παραφέρων νόμον ἀνατρέπει βίον; “if other lawgivers (saith Porphyry^f) regarding that middle kind of life, which is said to be according to nature, and to those things of which men are capable, who esteem things good or evil by proportions of the body, have given laws symbolical, yet what hurt does he, that brings in better?”

4. (1.) For first it is certain, God himself did permit some things in Moses’s law, which himself had no pleasure in: I instance in the matter of divorces, of which God, by the prophet, said, “I hate putting away.”

5. (2.) The promises of Moses’s law, in which the whole obedience was established, and for which it was exacted, were wholly temporal and related to this life; and when the prophets and holy men of the nation began to speak openly of resurrection from the dead, and a life to come, it was an open proclamation of the imperfection and change of that law, by which nothing of that was promised and nothing at all spoken of, by which mankind should, by obeying God, arrive to that felicity, which all wise men did suppose God did design to him.

6. (3.) Although good things for this life were promised by the law of Moses, yet toward the end and expiration of it, the nation suffered a new dispensation of things; and the godly men were often persecuted, and the whole nation continually baffled, and subdued by him that would; by the Assyrians and Chaldeans, by the Persians and by Antiochus, by the Syrians and the Romans, and therefore it was necessary they should expect some better covenant, which should be verified in the letter, and make recompence for the calamities which their best men here did suffer.

7. (4.) The laws of Moses were such, which were not of things naturally and originally good, but which did relate to time, and place, and person; but it was a law, without which many ages of the world did live, and after it was established, it did only bind that people; for neither did Moses persuade his father-in-law Jethro to receive that law,—neither did the prophet Jonas persuade it to the Ninevites,—nor the prophets ever reprove the not observing it, in the Assyrians, or Egyptians, the Idumeans and Moabites, the Tyrians and Sidonians, or any of their neighbours, whose vices they oftentimes reprov'd severely: and the best men of the first and second world, Abel and Enoch, Noah and Melchisedec, Shem and Job, Abraham and Isaac, Jacob and Joseph, knew nothing of it, and yet were dear to God: but if the law had consisted of essential, prime, and natural rectitudes, it had been always and every where; and if it consist not of such, it is not fit to be lasting, but itself calls for a change when all the body and digest of laws, excepting some few that were before that law and shall be for ever, either were experiments of their obedience, or significations of some moral duty implied in the external ritual, or compliances with a present necessity, and to draw them far from imitation of the vile customs of the nations, or were types and shadows of something to come thereafter.

8. (5.) The law of Moses was a covenant of works, and stipulated for exact obedience; which because no man could perform, and yet for great crimes committed under Moses's law there was there no promise of pardon, no solemnity or perfect means of expiation,—by the nature of things, and the necessity of the world, and the goodness of God, a change was to be expected.

9. (6.) That their law and covenant should be changed was foretold by the prophets; particularly by the prophet Jeremiah,^g “I will make a new covenant with you in those days, and in your minds will I write it:” and when God had often expressed^h his dislike of sacrifices, in which yet the greatest part of the legal service was established, God does also declare what that is which he desires instead of it; even no other than the christian law,ⁱ “That we should give to every one their due, and walk humbly with God;” that they should obey him, and “give him that sacrifice of a contrite and a broken heart:” and if this be not sufficient indication of the will of God for the abolition of the Mosaic law, then let this be added which was prophesied by Daniel, “The Messiah shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease.”

10. (7.) It was prophesied^k that, in the days of the Messiah, the gentiles also should be the people of God; but, therefore, they were to be governed by a new law; for Moses's law was given to one people, had in it rites of difference and separation of themselves from all the world, and related to solemnities which could not be performed but in a certain place, and a definite succession and family; which things being the wall of partition and separation, because Christ hath taken away or confounded in an inseparable mixture and confusion, God hath proclaimed to the Jews, that Moses's law is not that instance of obedience, in which he will be any longer glorified.

11. From these premises the pretence of the Jews for the eternity of Moses's law will be easily answered. For whereas they say that God called it an “everlasting covenant,” it is certain that even amongst the Jews, the word “everlasting” did not always signify “infinitely,” but to a “certain definite period.” For the law relating to the land of their possession, in which God promised to them an everlasting inheritance; as their possession of the land is everlasting, so is the covenant, and they expired together: for all the demonstrations of the Spirit of God, all the miracles of Christ and his apostles, all the sermons of the gospel, all the arguments which were taken from their own books, could not persuade them to relinquish Moses's law and adhere to Christ: and therefore, when all things else did fail, God was pleased to give them a demonstration which should not fail; he made it impossible for them to keep Moses's law; for he broke their law and their nation in pieces. But as to the word “everlasting” and “eternal,” it was usual with them to signify but to the end of a life, or of a family, and therefore much rather of a nation. The band of marriage is eternal, but it dies with either of the relatives: and the oath of allegiance is for ever, but that “for ever” is as mortal as the prince. Thus also in Moses's^l law, “The servant whose ear was bored, should serve for ever,” that was but till the year of jubilee: and Hannah^m carried up her son to the temple when he was weaned, “that he might abide there for ever:” thus the priesthood of Phinehas was said to be for ever; but God who said that he “and his posterity should walk before the Lord for ever,” did put a period unto it in Eli.ⁿ But besides this, it is observable that the law and covenant of Moses, according to the manner of speaking of that and other nations, is used to distinguish it from the more temporary commands which God gave to persons and to families, and to the nation itself in the wilderness, which were to expire, as it were, with the business of the day, but this was to be for ever, even as long as they enjoyed a being in the land of their covenant: for thus we distinguish the laws of peace from the orders of war; those are perpetual, to distinguish from the temporality of these.

12. These arguments are relative to the Jews, and are intended to prove the abrogation of Moses's law against them. But to christians, I shall allege the words and reasons of the New Testament, so far as the thing itself relates to conscience. For not only the Jews of old, but divers christian bishops^o of Jerusalem, fifteen in immediate succession, did plough with an ox and an ass, and were circumcised; the converted Pharisees, the Ebionites, the Cerinthians, and the Nazaræi still did believe that Moses's law did oblige the conscience: and amongst us there are or have been a great many Old-Testament divines, whose doctrine, and manner of talk, and arguments, and practices have too much squinted toward Moses.

13. But against all such practices or pretences I produce the decree of the apostles at Jerusalem in the question of circumcision; the abrogation of which disannuls the whole law: "For I Paul say unto you, if ye be circumcised, ye are debtors to keep the whole law:" therefore, by a parity of reason, we are not debtors to keep the law, when that great sacrament and sanction of the law is annulled. To this purpose are those frequent discourses of the Holy Scriptures of the New Testament: "The law and the prophets were until John; since that time the kingdom of God is preached:"^p where the two terms of the law and the gospel are expressly described; John the Baptist being the common term between them both, so that "now we are not under the law, but under grace;"^q "we are dead to the law," and, that band being separate, "we are married to a new husband, even to Christ:" "who is also our High Priest, after the order of Melchisedec, not after the order of Aaron;"^r but then, "the priesthood being changed, there is made, of necessity, a change also of the law;"^s for this was not to last but till Christ's coming, "for the law was given but till the seed should come:" till then, "we were under the law as under a schoolmaster, but when faith came, we are no longer under this pædago;"^t it was but "until the time appointed of the Father:" and to this purpose St. Paul spends a great part of the epistles to the Romans and Galatians. For one of the great benefits which we receive by the coming of Christ, is, that we are now treated with by a covenant of faith, that is, of grace and pardon, of repentance and sincere endeavours; the covenant of Moses being a prosecution of the covenant of works, can no longer oblige, and therefore neither can the law; for the law and the covenant were the constitutive parts of that whole intercourse, they were the whole relation, and this is that which St. John said, "The law came by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ:" and ever since he was made our Lord and our King, he is our Lawgiver, and we are his subjects, till the day of judgment in which he shall give up the kingdom to his Father.

14. But the greatest difficulty is behind: for not all Moses's law is disannulled, for some is enjoined by Christ; and some is of eternal obligation; and such the decalogue seems to be: the next inquiry therefore is, what part of Moses's law is annulled by Christ. To this I answer by parts.

RULE II.

The Ceremonial Law of Moses is wholly void.

1. FOR this is that handwriting of ordinances which Christ nailed to his cross: and concerning this we have an express command recorded by the apostle,^u "Let no man judge you in meat or in drink or in respect of a holiday, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath days:" and, concerning the difference of meats, not only their own doctors say, "the precept of Moses is not obligatory any where but in Palestine," but they have forgot the meaning of the names of some of them, or at least dispute it, which is not likely they would so strangely have lost, if the obligation also had not been removed. But as to the case is confessed: for all the arguments, before alleged, proceed of this part of the Mosaic law, if any, this being chiefly made up of umbrages, figures, and imperfect services, relative to place and time, to families and separate persons, such which ever change of government could hinder, and which, in the conflict and concussion with other laws, did ever give place, even in that time when they were otherwise obligatory, which "could not cleanse the conscience nor take away sins;" but were a burden made to teach something else, like letters written upon little cubes, or given as appellatives to slaves that the children who were waited on by them, might learn the alphabet; but else they were a trouble, with no real perfective purpose of our spirits.

2. Quest. I know but of one difficulty which this thing can meet with, and that is made by the scrupulous inquiries of some tender or curious persons who suppose the difference of meats not to be wholly taken away, but that still, under the laws of the gospel, we are bound to abstain from blood and from things strangled; pretending for this scruple the canon of the apostles^x at Jerusalem; which enjoins this abstinence, and reckons it amongst the ἀναγκαῖα, "things necessary:" and this was, for long time, used and observed strictly by the christians: of which we have testimony from that law of Leo the emperor, where, having forbidden the use of blood stuffed in the entrails of beasts, he affirms that, in the old law, and in the gospel, it was always esteemed impious to eat it. And this was not only for the present, and for compliance with the Jews, but that, by the observance of some common rites, the gentile converts might unite with the believing Jews into one common church, but they suppose something of natural reason and decency to be in it; and the obligation to be eternal, as being a part of that law, which God gave to Adam, or at least to Noah after the flood; for they who use to eat and drink blood, are apt to degenerate into ferity and cruelty, and easiness of revenge; and if Origen's fancy had been true, it had been very material; for he supposed that the devils were fed with blood; but, however, certain it is that the church did, f livers ages, most religiously abstain from blood; and it was the great argument, by which the primitive Christians did confute the calumnies of the heathens imputing to them the drinking of human blood: they could not be supposed to do that, who so religiously abstained from the blood of beasts, as we find it argued in Tertullian,^z Minutius,^a and Eusebius,^b who also tells of Biblis, that she rather would lie than eat blood in a pudding: and in the canons commonly called Apostolical,^c it is forbidden to a clergyman to eat blood, under pain of deposition, to say a man under excommunication: which law was mentioned and supposed obligatory in the second canon of the council of Gangra; and long after by the canon of the council in Trullo; by the council of Worms under Ludovicus Pius;^d by Pope Zechary, in his epistle to Boniface; and from hence the penitential books had warrant enough to impose canonical penances upon them that did taste this forbidden flesh: and that they did so, is known and confessed.

3. But to the question and inquiry, I answer, 1. That the abstinence from blood is not a law of nature, or of eternal rectitude, as appears, first, in that it was not at all imposed upon the old world: but for a special reason given to the posterity of Noah to be as a bar to the ferity and inhuman blood-hirstiness, of which the old giants were guilty, and possibly others might afterwards. For the Jews reckon but six precepts given to Adam and his posterity after the fall. The first against strange worship: the second of the worshipping the true God: the third, of the administration of justice: the fourth, of disclosing nakedness, or a prohibition of uncleanness: the fifth, against shedding blood: the sixth, against theft:—and indeed here are the heads of all natural laws; but because the old world grew cruel to beasts, and the giants were degenerated into a perfect ferity, and lived on blood; therefore it pleased God to superadd this to Noah, that they should not eat blood; that is, that they should not eat the flesh of beasts that were alive; that is, “flesh with the blood:” and it is not to be despised that the drinking of blood is not forbidden; but the eating only: meaning, that the blood was not the main intention of the prohibition; but living flesh, that is, flesh so long as the blood runs from it: “flesh with the life thereof,” that is, “with the blood:”^e so run the words of the commandment; and therefore the doctors of the Jews expressed it by the not tearing a member of any live creature: which precept was the mounds of cruelty, God so restraining them from cruelty even to beasts, lest they might learn to practise it upon men. For God sometimes places some laws for defensives to others; and, by removing men afar off from impiety, he secures their more essential duty. 2. But even this very precept is, by all the world, taught to yield to necessity and to charity, and cruelty to beasts is innocent when it is charity to men: and therefore, though we do not eat them, yet we cut living pigeons in halves and apply them to the feet of men in fevers, and we rip the bellies of sheep, of horses, of oxen, to put into them the side of a paralytic; and although, to rude people and ignorant, such acts of security were useful, yet, to christians, it is a disparagement to their most excellent institution, and the powers and prevalencies of God’s Spirit, to think they are not upon better accounts secured in their essential duty. The Jews were defended from idolatry by a prohibition even of making and having images: but he is but a weak christian, who cannot see pictures without danger of giving them worship. 3. The secret is explicated by God in the place, where he made the law: it was first a direct design to introduce mercy into the world, by taking care even of beasts: and, secondly, it was an outer guard against the crime of homicide: and Irenæus, Tertullian, St. Cyprian, and St. Ambrose, expound the meaning of the whole affair to be nothing else but a prohibition of homicide: for as God would have men be gentle to beasts,^f so if beasts did kill a man, it should be exacted of them;^g neither the man’s dominion over the beast could warrant his cruelty over them, nor the want of reason in beasts bring immunity, if they killed a man, and the consequent and purpose of both these is expressed, ver. 6. “Whoso sheddeth man’s blood, by man shall his blood be shed:”—and all this put together is a demonstration how dear lives are to God; even the life of beasts is, in one sense, sacred: for even then when they were given to man for food, yet the life was not; they must first be dead, before they might be eaten: but, therefore, the life of man was sacred in all senses, and should be required of man and beast. But that God doth even take care for oxen, in the matter of life, appears in this prohibition, “flesh with the life thereof ye shall not eat;” that is, you shall not devour the flesh even while it is alive; for the blood is the life thereof; that is, when the blood is gone, you may eat, till then it is presumed to be alive. Now there can be no other meaning of the reason: for if blood were here directly prohibited to be taken and drunk or eaten, this reason could not have concluded it, “because it is the life, therefore you may not eat it,”—being no better an argument than this,—“you may not eat the heart of a beast, for it is the life thereof;” but the other meaning is proper, “ye shall not eat flesh with the blood, which is the life thereof,”—that is, so long as the blood runs, so long ye must not eat; for so long it is alive: and a beast may be killed, but not devoured alive. So that the prohibition of blood is not direct in the precept, but accidental; blood is forbidden, as it is the sign of life and the “vehiculum” of the spirits, the instruments of life; and so long as it runs, so long the life abides ordinarily; and therefore Zonaras,^h in his notes upon the council of Gangra, expounds the word αἷμα, or “blood,” supposed in that canon as unlawful to be eaten or drunken, by ἐξεπίτηδες ἐψόμενον, καὶ πηγγνόμενον, “blood diligently or fast running or following the wound, and thick;”

that is, as I suppose, "blood digested," to distinguish it from "serum sanguinis," or the watery blood, that is seen in beasts after they have bled, that they might not have scruple in minutes and little superstitions: χωρίς ἐπιτηδεύτου αἵματος, "without active blood,"—so Balsamo: and it is not impertinent to the main inquiry, that it be observed that the Jews use "life" instead of "blood;" and so does the vulgar Latin; that we might the easier understand the meaning to be of "life," or "living blood."—But then this is nothing to eating the blood, when the beast is certainly dead: and therefore it is observable, that they who did make a scruple of eating blood, did not, all of them, make a scruple of eating things strangled in which the blood remained: and therefore in some copies of the apostolical decree,ⁱ the word πνικτοῦ, or "strangled," is left out; and St. Austin observes, that, in his time, in Africa, the christians did not severely abstain from things strangled. For if the case were the same between blood running and blood settled and dead, then the reason of the commandment were nothing or not intelligible; and, besides, it would breed eternal scruples: since, in the very killing of beasts, there will some blood remain, and in the neck pieces and some veins every body hath observed some blood remaining even after the effusion by the knife. 4. This could not be a law, of nature, because not mentioned by Christ in all his law, which I have already proved to be a perfect digest of the natural law: only that sense of it which I have now given, is involved in a law of nature, and consequently enjoined by Christ, viz. under the precepts of mercy, according to that saying of the wise man, "a good man will be merciful to his beast;" and the Athenians put a boy to death, because he took delight to prick out the eyes of birds, and so let them fly for his pastime; as supposing that he who exercised his cruelty upon birds, being a boy,—would, in time, destroy men too. 5. Upon the account of this interpretation, we are to distinguish the material part from the formal; the blood as it is such a substance, from the blood, as it is alive; just as the εἰδωλόθυτα are to be differenced: for to eat the meat when it is sold in the shambles, is a thing indifferent, said St. Paul,^k though it was offered to idols; but this very meat might not be eaten in the temples, nor any where under that formality, as St. Paul there discourses: and, therefore, what the apostles, in their letter to the churches, call εἰδωλόθυτα, St. James, in the decision of the question, calls ἀλισγήματα τῶν εἰδώλων, "pollutions of idols,"—that is, all communications in their idolatrous portions and services: and so it is for blood; "abstain from life blood, or blood that runs while the beast is dying;" that is, devour not the flesh while the beast is alive, be not cruel and unmerciful to your beast: but if blood be taken in its own materiality when the beast is dead, it may be eaten as other things, without scruple; they being both in the same sense as in the same obligation, Αμα δὲ μὴ φαγέειν, εἰδωλοῖύτων δ' ἀπέχεσθαι.

PHOCYL.

ⁱ Acts xv. 20.

^k 1 Cor. x. 25.

There is a letter and a spirit in both of them. 6. One thing only I shall add to make this appear to have been relative, temporal, and ceremonial; and that is, that when God was pleased to continue the command to the sons of Israel in Moses's law, he changed the reason, only reciting the old reason for which it was imposed to the posterity of Noah and superadding a new one as relating to themselves: "For the life of the flesh is in the blood, and I have given it to you upon the altar to make an atonement for your souls; for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul."¹ So that to the blood there was superadded a new sacredness and religion; it was typical of the great sacrifice upon the cross, the blood of which was a holy thing, and it was also instrumental to their sacrifices and solemnities of their present religion: and, therefore, this ritual is to cease after that the great sacrifice is offered, and the great effusion of blood is past. But as they had a new reason, so also had they a new injunction, and they were interdicted the eating of any thing strangled; which they taking to be a pursuance of the precept given to Noah, were the more zealous of it; and lest their zeal might be offended, the first christians in their societies, thought fit to abstain from it. But this ever had a less obligation than the former, and neither of them had, in their letter, any natural obligation: but the latter was introduced wholly upon the Levitical account, and therefore did cease with it. 7. After this so plain and certain commentary upon this precept, I shall the less need to make use of those other true observations made by other learned persons: as that this canon was made for a temporary compliance of the gentile proselytes with the Jewish converts,—that this was not a command to abstain from blood, or strangled, but a declaration only that they were not obliged to circumcision; but they already having observed the other things, it was declared they need go no further: that where, as these things were said to be necessary, ἐπάναγκες, the meaning of the word is not absolute but relative; for it is ἐπ' ἀνάγκης ἔχειν, "to have a thing under some necessary condition," and so it happened to them to whom the apostles wrote; for they were gentile proselytes before they were christians, and so were tied to observe the seven precepts of Noah, before the Jews would converse with them; and therefore, that this did not concern the gentiles, after they were an entire church: for although it did while the separation lasted, and that there were two bishops in some great churches, as in Rome and Ephesus; yet when the church was of gentiles only, or conversed not with Jews, this could not relate to them. That blood should be forbidden in the formality of meat is infinitely against the analogy of the gospel: the decretory and dogmatical words of Christ^m being, "that nothing which enters into the mouth, defiles a man:" and the words of St. Paulⁿ are permissive and preceptive, "Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, eat, asking no question for conscience sake. For meat commendeth us not to God; for neither if we eat, are we the better, neither if we eat not, are we the worse:" and "the kingdom of God consisteth not in meat and drink, but in righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost."^o The result is this, that blood, as it is a meat, cannot be supposed here to be directly forbidden as naturally unlawful, or essentially evil, or of a proper turpitude: but if the apostles had forbidden the very eating of blood as meat, it must be supposed to be a temporary and relative command which might expire by the ceasing of the reason, and did expire by desuetude; but since it was not so, but a permitting the gentile proselytes and encouraging them, for present reasons, to abstain from running or life blood in the sense above explicated, according to the sense of the Jewish doctors and their disciples, it no way can oblige christians to abstain from blood when it is dead, and altered, and not relative to that evil which was intended to be forbidden by God to Noah, and was afterwards continued to the Jews. I end this with the words of Tertullian,^p "Claves macelli tibi tradidit, permittens esui omnia ad constituendam idolothytorum exceptionem;" "God hath given to us the keys of the shambles, only he hath forbidden the pollution of idols:"—in all other things you have your liberty of eating.

4. I am only now to give an account of the reasons of the ancient churches, why so pertinaciously and so long they refused to eat boiled blood, or any thing of that nature. But for that it is the less wonder, when we consider, that they found it enjoined by all the churches where the Jews were mingled; and the necessity lasted in some places till the apostles were dead, and the churches were persecuted: and then men use to be zealous in little things, and curious observers of letters; and when the succeeding ages had found the precedents of martyrs zealous in that instance, it is no wonder if they thought the article sufficiently recommended to them. 2. But if we list to observe that the Pythagorean philosophers were then very busy and interested in the persuasions of men and sects, and Pythagoras, and Plato, and Socrates, had great names amongst the leading christians, it is no wonder if, in the percolation, something of the relish should remain, especially having a warrant so plausible to persuade, and so easy to mistake as this decretal of the apostles, and the example of the ancients living in that time, which the heathens call the golden age.

Single life, and the abstinence from certain meats, and refusing of blood, and severity of discipline, and days of abstinence, were sometimes persuaded, sometimes promoted, sometimes urged, sometimes made more necessary, by the Montanists, the Essenes, the Manichees, the Novatians, the Encratites, the Pythagoreans, and the very heathen themselves,—when, because they would pretend severity, it became fit that the christians should not be or seem inferior to them in self-denial, discipline, and austerities. But I shall make no more conjectures in this matter; since if the church at that time did enjoin it, the canon was to be obeyed, and, it may be, in some places it was practised upon that stock; upon any other just ground it could not, as I have already proved. Only this; it cannot be denied but in the western church, where this decree and the consequent custom was quickly worn out, though it lasted longer even to this day in the Greek church, and Balsamo inveighs against the Latins for their carelessness in this article; yet there were some intervals in which by chance this decree did prevail; but it was when the bishops of Rome were so ignorant, that they could not distinguish the Old Testament from the New, but in some particulars did judaize. I instance in Pope Zechary, before mentioned; who, in his decretal to Boniface, the archbishop of Mentz, is very curious to warn him to forbid all christians with whom he had to do, they should abstain from some certain sorts of birds, as jackdaws, crows, and storks; but especially that christians should eat no hares, nor beavers, nor wild horses: and the council of Worms determined something to the like purpose, not much wiser; but what was decreed then, was long before reproved by St. Austin,^q affirming, that if any christian made a scruple of eating strangled birds, in whom the blood remained, he was derided by the rest; and that this thing, which was useful in the infancy of the church, should be obtruded upon her in her strength, is as if we should persuade strong men to live upon milk, because their tender mothers gave it them as the best nourishment of their infancy.

5. This thing being cleared, I know no other difficulty concerning the choice of meats in particular, or the retention of the ceremonial law in general, or in any of its instances, but what will more properly be handled under other titles.

RULE III.

The Judicial Law of Moses is annulled, or abrogated, and retains no obliging Power, either in whole or in part, over any Christian Prince, Commonwealth, or Person.

1. EITHER the judicial was wholly civil, or it was part of the religion. If it was wholly secular and civil, it goes away with that commonwealth to whom it was given; if it was part of the religion, it goes away with the temple, with the lawgiver's authority by cession to the greater, with the priesthood, with the covenant of works, with the revelation and reign of the Messias: and though the instances of this law, proceeding from the wisest lawgiver, are good guides to princes and commonwealths, where the same reasons are applicable in like circumstances of things, and in equal capacities of the subjects, yet it is wholly without obligation. In the judicial law, theft was not punished with death, but with the restitution of fourfold; and unless the necessities of a republic should enforce it, it were consonant to the design of christian religion, the interest of souls, their value, and pity, that a life should not be set in balance over against a sheep or a cup. In the judicial law of Moses, adultery was punished with death; but it will not be prudent for a commonwealth to write after this copy, unless they have as great reason and the same necessity, and the same effect be likely to be consequent; it was highly fitting there, where it was so necessary to preserve the genealogies, and where every family had honours, and inheritances, and expectations of its own, and one whole tribe expected in each house the revelation of the Messiah, and where the crime of adultery was infinitely more inexcusable by the permission of divorces and polygamy than it can be with us. But with us, and so in every nation, many considerations ought to be ingredient into the constitution of a capital law: but they have their liberty, and are only tied up with the rules and analogies of the christian law: only the judicial law of Moses is not to be pretended as an example and rule to us, because it came from a Divine principle; unless every thing else fit it by which the proportions were made in that commonwealth; for although God made aprons for Adam and Eve, it would not be a comely fashion for the gallants of our age and countries. But concerning this who desires to see long and full discourses, I refer him to Gulielmus Zepperus "de legibus Mosaicis," and the preface of Calvin, the lawyer, to his "Themis Hebræo-Romana."

2. But the thing in general is confessed, and the arguments now alleged make it certain: but then why it should not be so in every particular, when it is confessed to be so in the general, I do not understand; since there are no exceptions or reservations of any particular in the new law, the law of christianity. But in two great instances this article hath difficulty; the one is, 1. The approach of a man to his wife during her usual term of separation. 2. The other is concerning the degrees of kindred hindering marriage; both which being taken express care of in the judicial law, and yet nothing at all said of them in the laws of Christ, are yet supposed to be as obligatory to christians now, as to the Jews of old. Of these I shall now give account, because they are of great use in the rule of conscience, and with much unquietness and noise talked of, and consciences afflicted with prejudices and authority, with great names and little reasons.

3. Quest. Whether the judicial law of mutual abstinence in the days of women's separation, obliges christian pairs?

4. The judicial law declared it to be twice penal. Once it only inferred a legal uncleanness for seven days, Levit. xv. 24. But in the Levit. xx. 18, it is made capital to them both: "they shall be both cut off from the people."

5. From hence, Aquinas, Alexander of Ales, Bonaventure, and Scotus, affirm it to be a mortal sin for a husband then to approach to her: Peludanus and Cajetan deny it; and amongst the casuists, it is with great difference affirmed or denied, but with very trifling pretences, as if they were to give laws, and not to inform consciences upon just grounds of reason or religion.

6. They who suppose it to be unlawful, affirm this law to be ceremonial, judicial, and moral. It is ceremonial, because it inferred a legal impurity, or separation for seven days. It is judicial, by its appendant sentence of death, and a capital infliction. It is moral, because it is against charity, as being hurtful to the child in case any be begotten by such approaches. The whole ceremoniality of it is confessedly gone; but the punishment of it in the judicial law being capital, they urge it as an argument that it is moral. So that the whole weight lies upon this. That which was by the law of God punished with death, was more than a mere ceremony, and must contain in it some natural obliquity and turpitude. And in this case we need not to go far in our inquiry after it; for it is because of the great uncharitableness, as being a cause of monstrous productions, or leprosies and filthy diseases in the children: and as the former of these two signifies its morality, so this does formally constitute it; and this is confirmed by the words annexed to the prohibition: "For the nations committed all these things, therefore I abhorred them:"^r amongst which this in the question being enumerated, it will follow more than probably, that since this thing was imputed to the heathens, who were not under Moses's law,—it must be imputed, because it was a violation of the law of nature.

7. To these things I answer; (1.) That the punishment of all such approaches under Moses's law with death, was no argument of any natural turpitude and obliquity in the approach. For then circumcision would be necessary by a natural law, because every soul that was not circumcised was also to be cut off from his people. But if for this reason it were only to be concluded unlawful, then since this reason is taken away, and it is by no law of God punishable, nor yet by any law of man, it follows that now it cannot be called a mortal or a great sin, to which no mortal punishment is annexed, nor indeed any at all.

8. (2.) But neither was it just thus in the law of Moses. For by the law of Moses it was nothing but a legal impurity, a separation from the temple, and public sacrifices, and some sorts of commerce for seven days; and thus much was also imposed upon the woman, though she was locked up and conversed with no man, even for her natural accident: and if, by the gravity or levity of a punishment, we may make conjectures of the greatness of a sin, (of which I shall, in the third book, give accounts,) then it would follow that every such approach was nothing but a breach of a legal rite or ceremony, since it was punished only with a legal separation, which also was equally upon every innocent woman in that period.—Yea, but besides this it was made capital.—I answer, that could not be, if the case were the same; for two punishments are not in laws inflicted upon the same offence, directly and primarily: and, therefore, Radulphus Flaviacensis^s supposes here to be a direct contradiction in the letter of these two laws; and that they are to be reconciled by spiritual significations, in which only they are obligatory to us under the gospel; but I do not very well understand what he would have, nor any ground of his conjecture; but am content it is not material, since he confesses that the very letter obliged the Israelites, which how it is possible, and yet be contradictory, I shall never understand. Hugo Cardinalis says, that the first of these punishments was on him who did it ignorantly; but it was capital only to him who did it knowingly and voluntarily. But this is not probable; for then it would be in effect so that the man might only contract a legal impurity; and the woman be sure to die for it:

. Enimvero durâ lege hic agunt mulieres:

for although the man could often say truly, and might always pretend, that he did it ignorantly, yet the woman could not: for it is not likely that she should, with much probability, at any time say she did it ignorantly; and since it cannot be but by a rare contingency, it is not likely to be the subject matter of a regular law, and provided for by a daily and perpetual provision; especially since that case is already provided for in other periods, as being sufficiently included under them that by chance touch a woman so polluted: and therefore this does not reconcile the difficulty: but since it must be confessed, that on the woman (at least ordinarily) both these laws must have effect, and yet the woman cannot easily and ordinarily be supposed to be ignorant in such a case so as to need a law, (for laws use not to be made for rare contingencies,) it follows that this distinction is not sufficient to reconcile the difficulty. But Lyra and Abulensis have a better, saying that the legal impurity was the punishment only, when the fact was private; but it was capital when it was brought before the judge: and truly for this there was great reason. For since the woman also was to die, it is not to be supposed that she would accuse her husband and condemn herself, and such things use not to be done publicly: it is therefore to be supposed, that whoever did do this so as to be delated for it and convicted, must do it ἐν χειρὶ ὑπερηφανίας, "with the hand of pride," in contempt and despite of Moses's law; for which, as St. Paul witnesses, "a man was to die without mercy." But now from hence I infer, that since the contempt and open despite of the law only was capital, it was not any natural turpitude that deserved that calamity; it was nothing but a legal uncleanness, which every child had that did but touch her finger.

9. But then for the next argument, with which the greatest noise is made, and every little philosopher can, with the strength of it, put laws upon others, and restraints upon men's freed consciences; I answer, first, upon supposition that it were true and real, yet it does not prove the unlawfulness of such addresses. For if the man and woman have a right to each other respectively, there is no injury done by using their own right. "Nemo damnum facit, nisi qui id facit, quod facere jus non habet," saith the law.¹ But that is not the present case, for the married pair use but their own rights, which

God hath indulged. And therefore Paulus^u the lawyer, from the sentence of Labeo, hath defined, that no man can be hindered from diverting the water running through his own grounds, and spending it there, though it be apparent that his neighbour receives detriment, to whom that water would have descended. I know this may be altered by laws, customs, and covenants, but there is no essential injustice in it, if loss comes to another by my using my own right. To which I only add this one thing, because I am not determining a title of law in open court, but writing rules of conscience: that though every such interception of water, or other using of our right to our neighbour's wrong, be not properly injustice, yet unless he have just cause to use it, it is unlawful to do so, because it is uncharitable; because then he does it with a purpose to do his neighbour injury. And so it is in this; if any man or woman in such approaches intend hurt to the child, as hoping the child might not live, or if either of them designed that the child should by such means become hated, or neglected in provisions, and another preferred, then I doubt not but to pronounce all such mixtures impious and abominable: and to this sense those words of St. Austin^x in this article are to be expounded: "Per talem legem in Levitico positam non naturam damnari, sed concipiendæ prolis noxiam prohiberi." The thing itself is not naturally impure; but it is forbidden that hurt should be intended or procured to the child: for although, in the instance of Paulus above reckoned, the injury is certain, and the person definite and known to whom it is done, and in the present question both the event at the worst is but uncertain, and the person to be injured not yet in being, and therefore the case is much more favourable here than there, yet when this case does happen, there can be no excuse for it, because it is the act of an evil mind and an uncharitable spirit.

10. (2.) Upon supposition that this allegation were true, yet it follows not that all such approaches were unlawful: as appears in the case of a leprous wife, with whom that it is lawful to have congress, is so certain that it is told as an heroic story of Dominicus Catalusius, a prince of Lesbos, that he did usually converse with his wife that was a leper, as still knowing it to be his own flesh, which no man hates: but if with a leper (whose issue is as certain to be leprous, as in the other case to be any way diseased) it be lawful, the effect notwithstanding,—then the argument ought not to infer a prohibition, or conclude it to be unlawful. The same also is the case of both men and women in all hereditary diseases, and in any diseases which are resident in any principal part, with any of which if either of them be infected, it is (if this reason be good) equally unlawful for them to beget children, or to use the remedy which God hath given them against uncleanness.

11. If it be answered that there is difference in the case, because the present question being of short, frequent, and periodical separations, the married person may expect nature's leisure, who will in a short time return them to their usual liberties: but if they have a leprosy, that goes not off, but abides: and therefore either a child must be begotten with that danger, or not at all; and since it is better for a child to be born a leper, or subject to leprosy, than not to be at all; in this case there is indeed charity in some sense, but no uncharitableness in any to the child; and there is a necessity also on the parents' part. The same also is the case of a consumption, or any hereditary disease: but in the monthly separations there is no such need; because the abstinence is but short, and though a child be not then begotten, he loses not his being, as in the other cases.

^u Lib. ii. de aquâ pluviâ arcendâ.

12. To this I reply; that the difference of case pretended is not sufficient, 1. Because a consumption or a leprosy are no such incurable diseases, but that, for the preventing of uncharitableness and sad effects upon the child, they may expect nature's time; and if it be said, that there is, or may be, danger of fornication in so long abstinence; I answer, so there may be in the shorter, and is certainly to some persons: and if the danger be an excuse, and can legitimate the congression, even where there is hazard to have a diseased child begotten, in one case, then so it is in the other. For where there is the same cause in the same suscipient, there also will be the same effect: so that at least thus much will be gotten; that if there be a need, in the time of a short separation, then it is lawful; and if it can upon this account be innocent, it is certain that it is not naturally criminal. 2. Suppose even this affection or accident abides on the wife, as on the woman in the Gospel, who after twelve years' sufferance was cured by the touch of our Saviour's garment; then there is the same necessity as in an abiding leprosy, consumption, or hereditary disease, and yet in the Mosaic law those permanent emanations were to be observed by abstinence as much as the natural and transient; by which it is certainly proclaimed to be wholly a legal rite; because if this can abide, and during its abode an approach be not permitted, although the Jews were relieved by divorces, and polygamy, and concubinate, and so might suffer the law; yet christians, who are bound to an individual bed, will find a necessity, which if it were not provided for by a natural permission, the case of some men would be intolerable, and oftentimes sin be unavoidable, and that which by accident may be lawful and necessary, certainly is not essentially evil: for if it could, then he who is the author of such necessity, would also necessarily infer that evil, and so be author of that too, which is impossible to be true of God, the fountain of eternal goodness. But I add also this consideration; that, even in the Mosaic law, such congressions were permitted after child-birth. For the legal impurity lasted but seven days upon the birth of a man-child, "according to the days of the separation for her infirmity shall she be unclean;" that is, for seven days she shall have the same law upon her as in her usual period, but no longer; for that which is added,^y "that she shall then continue in the blood of her purifying three and thirty days;" it is not for abstinence from her husband, but from entering into the tabernacle, and from touching holy things: so that the uncleanness being determined five weeks before her purification was complete, must be in order to contract or to nothing.

13. But although upon supposition the allegation were true, yet the reason of it concludes not; yet the argument is infinitely the worse, since the supposition is false, and the allegation is not true. For besides that the popular heresies of physic and philosophy are now rarely confuted and reprov'd by the wise physicians of these later ages, who have improved their faculty as much as any of the schools of learning have done theirs, and the old sayings of philosophers in this matter are found to be weak, and at the best but uncertain; the great experience of the world is an infinite reproof to them who say, that by such congressions leprous or monstrous children are produced: for the world would have been long since very full of them, if such evil effects were naturally consequent to those meetings. St. Jerome^z was the first who brought this pretension into the christian schools (so far as I can learn): afterwards the schoolmen got it by the end, and the affirmative hath passed ever since almost without examination. But the schoolmen^a generally affirm, (being taught to speak so by Aquinas,) that it is partly ceremonial, partly moral, and that in this only it is obligatory, "ex damno quod sequitur ex prole;" which, because it hath no ground to support it, must fall into the common lot of fancies and errors, when their weakness is discovered. For although those physicians, which say that this natural emanation is a κάθαρσις, or "cleansing," do believe, that with the principles of generation, there may in such times be something "minus salubre" intermingled; yet besides that these are opposed by all them who say it is nothing but a κενώσις, or "evacuation;" both the one and the other are found to be imperfect, by the new observations and experiments made by a learned man who finds that neither one nor other can be the material part of nature's secret fabric. But however, whether he says so or no, since things are so infinitely uncertain, and man is made secretly and fashioned "in secreto terræ," these uncertain disputes are but a weak foundation of a pretext for a moral duty.

14. To the last objection: that—"God abhorred the nations for all these things:"—and amongst them this is reckoned; and therefore there was in this some natural impurity, for by no other law were they bound, and they could not be found to be transgressors against another: I answer; that "all these things" are to be taken "concrete et confuse," all indiscriminately in a heap, not all by singular distribution; as appears (besides this in question) by the instance of marriage in certain degrees: which the servants of God did use, and yet God delighted in them; for Abraham married his father's daughter, and yet this was reckoned amongst their catalogue of crimes,^b and so also in the case of the brother's wife, which is there reckoned, yet we know it was permitted and enjoined in the case of heiresses being childless widows: but when this thing was by God inserted into the digest of their laws and made capital, it happened to be mingled with other prohibitions, which were of things against the laws of nature. But to this objection I shall speak again in the question of cousin-germans, num. 36 and 37 of this rule.

15. The arguments now appearing to be invalid, I answer to the question, 1. That this abstinence was a Mosaic law, partly ceremonial, partly judicial, but in no degree moral. 2. That the abrogation of Moses's law does infer the nullifying of this, and hath broken the band in pieces. 3. That the band which tied this law upon the Jews, was fear of death, and fear of a legal impurity: which fears being banished, and no new one introduced by our Lawgiver, we are not under restraint: and if we will be careful to observe all that is commanded us in Christ's law, it will be work enough, though we bind not on men's shoulders unnecessary burdens. 4. It is a part of the spirit of bondage to be subject to ordinances; but God will now be served by a more spiritual religion, and to abstain, as in the present instance, and to think it is a part of God's service, is superstition; it is to worship him with an instance that he hath not chosen, or commended: and, therefore, it is remarkable that when St. Paul^c gave order to married pairs, μη ἀποστερεῖτε ἀλλήλους, "Defraud not one another;" he only gives this exception, "except it be by consent for a time, that ye may give yourselves to fasting and prayer; and come together again, that Satan tempt you not," διὰ τὴν ἀκρασίαν ὑμῶν, "for your want of power," and command over your desires and necessities. Abstinence, in order to special religion, is allowed and commended, and that by consent,—and that but for a sudden occasion,—and that so short, that it may not become an occasion of Satan's temptations; whatsoever is over and besides this, may be upon the account of Moses, but not of Christ and christianity. 5. I speak this only to take off a snare from men's consciences laid for the unwary by unskillful masters of assemblies, so that all I say of it, is, that it may be done lawfully. 6. But that which does only recommend it, is, where there is necessity that it be done. 7. It is sufficient though the necessity be not absolute, if it be only ordinary and probable: for if this were not so, instead of allaying storms, and appeasing scruples, and breaking snares, they would be increased and multiplied; for it will be a hard thing, in most cases of that nature, to say, that the necessity is absolute. 8. But since there is in such congressions a natural abhorrency amongst most persons, and a natural impurity; if that which invites to it be not at least a probable necessity, it must be a great undecency and violence of a wanton spirit. 9. It must always be without scandal and reproach. For even among the Jews it was only a legal impurity, if done without scandal; but if with contumacy and owning of it, it came to outface the modesty and authority of the law, then it became deadly: and so it may now, if that which is not of good report, be done and offered to the report of all them which can condemn the folly and impurity, but cannot judge of the necessity or the cause; and the fact, by becoming scandalous, is criminal, as much as when it is done without a probable necessity, and only upon lustful consideration.

16. Some, in their answers to this inquiry, make a distinction of the persons; affirming it in this case to be unlawful to ask, but lawful to pay a duty if it be demanded. But if it be naturally unlawful, it is then inexcusable in both: for neither must the one tempt to an unlawful act, nor the other consent to it: and there can be no obligation to pay that debt, which no man can lawfully demand. Neither of them hath a right, against God's law; and therefore the case is equal in them both. He or she that complies, does actually promote the sin, as well as the other that invites, and therefore in Moses's law they were equally criminal and punished with death. But if it be not naturally unlawful, (as it appears it is not,) then it may as well be demanded as yielded to, when there is a probable necessity; but concerning that, the passive party is to believe the other; for if it be known to be otherwise, he or she that consents, does consent to an act, which is made unlawful by evil circumstances.

Of the Prohibition of Marriage in certain Degrees.

17. But the next inquiry concerning an instance in the judicial law is yet of greater concernment: for all those degrees, in which Moses's law hath forbidden marriages, are supposed by very many now-a-days, that they are still to be observed with the same distance and sacredness, affirming, because it was a law of God with the appendage of severe penalties to the transgressors, it does still oblige us christians. This question was strangely tossed up and down upon the occasion of Henry VIII.'s divorce from Queen Catharine, the relict of his brother Prince Arthur; and according as the interest of princes uses to do, it very much employed and divided the pens of learned men; who, upon that occasion, gave too great testimony with how great weaknesses men, that have a bias, do determine questions, and with how great force a king that is rich and powerful, can make his own determinations. For though christendom was then much divided, yet before then there was almost a general consent upon this proposition, that the Levitical degrees do not, by any law of God, bind christians to their observation. I know but of one schoolman that dissents; I mean Paludanus; or if there be more, I am sure they are but very few,

Vel duo vel nemo.———

but the other opinion

Defendit numerus, junctæque umbone phalanges.

But abstracting from all interests, and relative considerations, I shall give as full accounts of this as I can, because the questions of degrees and the matters and cases of incest, are not so perfectly stated as the greatness of the matter and the necessities of the world require; and besides this, it is at this day a great question amongst all men,—whether brothers' and sisters' children, or cousin-germans, may lawfully marry?—which question supposes, that not only the Levitical degrees are still thought obligatory, but even all those other degrees, which by a parity of reason can be reduced to those measures. I shall therefore give an account of the sentence of all laws in this great question, which can be supposed to oblige us.

Of Parents and Children.

18. Concerning this, I suppose it to be evident that nature hath been as free in her liberties as in her gifts, open-handed enough to all; save only that she hath forbidden parents and children, higher and lower in the direct line, for ever to marry. Just as rivers cannot return to their fountains, nor evenings back again to their own mornings from whence they set out, nor yesterday be recalled, and begin again to-morrow. The course and order of nature is against it; and for a child to marry the parent is for to-day to marry yesterday, a going back in nature.

—illum, illum sacris adhibere nefastis,
—qui semet in ortus
Vertit, et indignæ regerit sua pignora matri.^d

19. To which may be added this other sufficient natural reason: that, if a son marries his mother, she who is in authority greater by right of geniture, becomes “minor in matrimonio,” less upon the same material account upon which she became greater; and the duty and reverence of a mother cannot be paid to her by him who is her husband: which I find well intimated by Phædra to Hippolitus, Matris superbum est nomen, et potens nimis. SENECA.

It is a contradiction of rights that the same person should be the superior mother, and the inferior wife: which hath also some proportion between a father and a daughter, as being indecent that she from him should claim the rights of a wife, to whom she owes the duty of a father.

20. Besides these, there is a natural abhorrency of such mixtures: “Contra pudorem esse,” said Paulus the lawyer; “it is against natural modesty:” which was rarely verified in the trial which the emperor Claudius made (wittily and judiciously, like that of Solomon upon the two harlots) upon a wicked woman who called him (who indeed was her son) a stranger, a beggar, the son of another woman, and supposititious, that so she might defeat him of his father's inheritance. The emperor, espying her malice, and suspecting her machination, found out this trial: “If he be not your son, yet because he is young and handsome, rich and possessed of the inheritance, the title of which you would snatch from him, you shall marry him, and so possess him and the inheritance too.”—She, though desperately base, refused that offer, and though she was unnaturally malicious, yet would not be unnaturally incestuous; and chose to suffer the shame of discovery rather than the horrors of such a mixture.

21. But all this was sufficient to make it to become a natural law, without the authority of God intervening. This made it to be excellently reasonable to be established into a law, and therefore God did so, and declared it, and did not trust man's reason alone with the conduct of it: but then it became an eternal law when God made it so: and that was at the very first bringing of a wife to Adam. “For this cause shall a man leave his father and his mother,” said God,^e by his servant Moses, declaring to us what God then made to be a law, “and shall cleave unto his wife, and they shall be one flesh.” This could not on both sides concern Adam, who had no natural father and mother, and therefore was a law given to all that should be born from him; when they took a wife or husband respectively, they must forsake father and mother, for between them and their children there could be no such intercourse intervening: and so the Jews, particularly Rabbi Selomoh, expounds the place; and it was necessary this should then be declared, for as yet the marriage of brother and sister was not forbidden, saith the Gemara Sanhedrin; and in obedience to this, because Adam had no other, he laid aside the love of earth and rain, of which he was produced, said Isaac Abravanel: and by this, they usually reconcile the seeming difference between these words and the fifth commandment. A man shall leave his father and mother;^f and yet he must honour his father and mother: he must never leave to honour them: but when he intends to marry, he must forsake all thoughts of contracting with either of them. Now the mother and the wife being the opposite terms in the progression, he must leave one, and adhere or be united to the other, it must needs be that dereliction, or forsaking, or going from the mother, not relating to honour, but to the marriage, means that the child must abstain and depart from all thoughts of such conjunction. A mother is not less to be loved, less to be honoured, after marriage than before; and therefore in no sense relating to this is she to be forsaken, therefore it must be in the other: and this our blessed Saviour recorded also in his law, where whatsoever is not sufficiently found, cannot pretend to be a law of nature, as I have already proved.

22. And now this being established and recorded as a law of nature in that way only that is competent, the disagreeing sentences of some men, and the contrary practices of nations, is no argument against it. Indeed I said in the first chapter, that the consent of nations is not sufficient to establish a natural law: for God only makes the sanction; but when he hath made it and declared it, the disagreeing practices of great portions of the world cannot annul the establishment. It is not sufficient to prove it to be a natural law, because wise people consent to it; but if God have made it so, it is a natural law, though half the world dissents: and therefore we are not, in this affair, to be moved at all, if wise men should, in any age, affirm the marriages of sons and mothers to be lawful. So Diogenes and Chrysippus affirmed upon a ridiculous conceit, that cocks and hens did not abhor it. Against which impertinent argument,^g although it were sufficient to oppose the nar-yet it is better to set down this reasonable proposition;—That a thing is against the law of nature, when, being forbidden by God, it is unnatural to men, though it were not against the nature of beasts.—But as the authority of these men is inconsiderable, and their argument trifling, so also the disagreeing practice of some nations in this particular is wholly to be despised:

— Gentes tamen esse feruntur,
In quibus et nato genetrix, et nata parenti Jungitur —. Metam. 10.

The Assyrians, the Medes, and Persians, especially the most honoured persons amongst them, their kings and their magi, did use it frequently:

Nam magus ex matre et nato nascatur oportet.

23. But the original and cause of this horrible and unnatural custom, we can so reduce to its first principle, that there can remain no suspicion but that they did prevaricate the law of nature. For when Nimrod had married his mother, Semiramis, and presently introduced the worship of fire, making that to be the Assyrian's and Persian's god, he was gratified by the devil. For, as Saidus Batricides, the patriarch of Alexandria, reports, the devil out of the fire spake to his first priest, that none should officiate in his rites, unless he would first lie with his mother, his sister, and his daughter. And Sham, the priest, (for that was the name of the beast,) did so, and so together with his prince became an authentic precedent to all generations of degenerate brutes; and was imitated by all that empire.

But what Xenophon said of the Persians, is also true of all the nations together, who were debauched by their laws and accursed customs: "Non eo minus jus esse, quia à Persis contemnebatur;" "It is still the law of nature, though prevaricated by the Persians, and their subjects, and friends."—For when any thing appears to be so τοῖς πλείστοις, καὶ ἀδιασπρόφοις, καὶ μετὰ φύσιν ἔχουσιν, "to most, and to the uncorrupted nations, and to them who live according to natural reason,"^g it is a great presumption, it is indeed a natural law; and is so finally, if a command of God hath intervened in that instance: for by the Divine appointment it is made a law,—and by the matter, order, and use of it, it is natural. But for the rest to whom these things seemed otherwise than God and nature did agree,—they were abused by none but by their own lusts; they were as a punishment of their vilest sins given over εἰς πᾶσιν ἀριμίας, to unnatural, to dishonourable, and unreasonable desire,

— Cui fas implere parentem
Quid rear esse nefas?

But this was the product of their idolatry, and some other basenesses: of the first St. Paul is witness,^h that as a consequent of their forsaking the true God, they were given over to unnatural lusts; and Lucan observes the latter of the Parthians,

— epulis vesana meroque
Regia, non ullis exceptos legibus horret Concubitus —.

Now what is the effect of superinduced crimes and follies is most contrary to nature; and it were unnatural to suspect that she had not made sufficient provisions in this prime case, upon pretence, because some unnatural persons have spoiled and defaced or neglected her laws.ⁱ One thing by the by I shall insert. I find Socrates noted by some, that he said, "there is, in the marriage of parents and children, nothing to be reprov'd but the disparity of age." But this is a mistake;^k for though he brought that incompetent reason against it, yet for other causes he abhorred it: accounting it to be a law established by God and nature, μήτε γονέας παῖσι, &c. "That parents and children should abhor such marriages." For God and all the world, heaven and earth, do so: insomuch that a Roman philosopher was, in his dream, warn'd not to bury the corpse of a Persian, who had married his mother.

Μὴ θάψῃς τὸν ἄθαντον ἔα κυσὶ κύρμα γενέσθαι
Γῇ πάντων μήτηρ μητροφθόρον οὐδέχεται ἄνδρα.

"The earth, who is the common mother of all, will not receive into her womb him, that defiled the womb of his mother:"^l and the story says, that the ground spewed out the corpse of such a one that had been buried: and Virgil^m affirms, that in hell there are torments prepared for him,

Qui thalamum invasit natæ, vetitosque hymenæos,

"who pollutes his daughter's bed," and defiles himself with such forbidden entertainments.

Of Brothers and Sisters.

24. (2.) But though nature forbids this, yet the other relations are forbidden upon other accounts. Nothing else is against the prime laws of nature, but a conjunction in the right ascending and descending line. The marriage of brothers and sisters was at first necessary; and so the world was peopled: all the world are sons and daughters, descending from the first marriages of brother and sister. But concerning this, that I may speak clearly, let it be observed, that although the world does generally condemn all such and the like marriages, under the title of "incestuous," yet that is not properly expressed, and leaves us to seek for the just grounds of reproof to many sorts of unlawful marriages, and some others are condemned by too great a censure. The word "incest" is not a Scripture word, but wholly heathen; and signified amongst them all unchaste and forbidden marriages, such which were not hallowed by law and honour; an inauspicious conjunction "sine cesto Veneris," in which their goddess of love was not president; marriages made without her girdle, and so "ungirt," "unblessed." This word, being taken into the civil law, got a signification to be appropriate to it; for there were three degrees of unlawful marriages: "damnatæ," "incestæ," and "nefarie."—"Damnatæ nuptiæ" are such, which the law forbids upon political considerations; such as are between the tutor or guardian and the orphan or pupil, between a servant and his mistress, between a freedman and his patroness; and such was, in the law of Moses, between the high priest and a widow; and in christianity, between a priest and a harlot, and between any man and her whom he defiled by adultery, while her first husband was alive,—all marriages with virgins professed and vowed. There is in these so much unreasonableness of being permitted, that by the law they stood condemned, and had legal punishments and notes of infamy proportionable. "Incestæ nuptiæ" are defined in the lawⁿ to be "coitio consanguineorum vel affinium;" "the conjunction of kindred or allies," meaning, in those instances which are by law forbidden: and these are forbidden upon differing considerations from the former, viz. for their nearness of blood and relation, which the laws would have disseminated more or less,—for their approach to unnatural marriages,—for outward guards to the laws of nature,—for public honesty, and compliance with the customs of their neighbours, of the same interest, or the same religion, or for necessary intercourse. But because unskilful persons or unwary have called "unnatural" mixtures by the name of "incestuous," as incestuous Lot, and the incestuous Corinthian; therefore what any law calls "incest," they think they have reason to condemn equally to those abominable conjunctions. But neither ought "incest" to be condemned with a hatred equal to what is due to these;^o neither ought these to be called "incest:" for in true speaking these are not "incestæ nuptiæ," but "nefarie," and "naturæ contrarie," "wicked or abominable, and contrary to nature;" for although the law sometimes calls those mixtures, which are between kindred, by the title of "nefarie," or impious, yet it is to be understood only of that kindred, which is by the law of God and nature forbidden to marry: so the gloss^p in Authentic. de Incest. Nupt. affirms, so Archidiaconus, Johannes Andreus, Covaruvias, and the best lawyers: and the word is derived from the usage of it in the best authors: "Feræ quoque ipsæ Veneris evitant nefas;" the conjunction of parents and children is "nefas Veneris," and the marriages "nefarious." Now of this deep tincture none are, excepting marriages in the right ascending and descending line. The marriages of brothers and sisters are incestuous, and the worst degree of it; and so forbidden by the laws of all civil nations: but, therefore, they are unlawful only because forbidden by positive laws; but because the prohibition is not at all in the laws of Christ, therefore it cannot be accounted against the prime law of nature, of which that is a perfect system. Not that it can, in any case of present concernment or possibility, become lawful, or for any reason be dispensed withal by any power of man: for it is next to an unnatural mixture, hath in it something of confusion, and blending the very first partings of nature, it is of infinite vile report, intolerably scandalous, and universally forbidden. But though this be enough, yet this is not all.

25. Michael of Ephesus^q says, that at the first these marriages were indifferent, but made unlawful by a superinduced prohibition. And indeed, if they had been unnatural, they could not have been necessary. For it is not imaginable, that God, who could with the same facility have created a thousand men, and as many women, as one, would have built up mankind by that which is contrary to human nature: and therefore we find, that among the wisest nations, some whom they esteemed their bravest men did this. Cimon the son of Miltiades, married his sister, Elpinice, "non magis amore quam patrio more ductus," said Cornelius Nepos, "not only led by love, but by his own country's custom." So Archetolis, the son of the brave Themistocles, married his sister, Mnasiptolema. Alexander, the son of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, married his sister, Olympias; Mithridates married his sister, Laodice; Artemisia was sister and wife to Mausolus, king of Caria: so was Sophrosyna, to Dionysius, of Syracuse; Eurydice, to Ptolemæus Philopater; Cleopatra, to Ptolemæus Physcon; Arsinoë, to Ptolemæus Philadelphus; whom when Sotades had reproved upon that account, saying, οὐκ εἰς ὁσίην τρυμαλίσαν τὸ κέντρον ὤθεῖς, he imprisoned him. But I need not bring particular instances of Egyptians, for Diodorus Siculus affirms, that they all esteemed it lawful, and Dion Prusæensis says, that all the barbarians did so.^s

26. But all the Greeks^t did so too, having learned it from their first princes, whom^l after-ages had turned into gods, —Dii nempe suas habuere sorores:

Though I suppose that this is but a fabulous narrative, in imitation of the story of Cain and Abel, as appears by their tale of Jupiter and Prometheus; which is well noted by the observator upon the mythologies of "Natalis Comes," under the title of "Jupiter." But that which moves me more than all this, is the answer which Tamar gave to her brother Amnon: "Now therefore speak unto the king, for surely he will not withhold me from thee," and yet she was his father's daughter, his sister by the paternal line:—and Abraham told the king of Gerar concerning Sarah, his wife; "and yet indeed she is my sister, she is the daughter of my father, but not the daughter of my mother;" that is, the daughter of Terah, as was generally supposed, of which I shall yet give further accounts. Now it is not to be supposed, that either Abraham before, or David after the law, would have done or permitted any thing against the law of nature: and if it was against positive law, as it happened in the case of Amnon and David, the marriage might be valid though forbidden, and the persons be excused upon some other account, which is not proper here to be considered.

27. But I again renew what I said before, this discourse is not intended so much as secretly to imply that it can now at all be, or be made, lawful, or is at any hand to be endured. For the marriage of brother and sister is against a secondary law of nature; that is, it stands next to the natural prohibition, and is against a natural reason, though not against a prime natural law. Every reason, indeed, is not a sufficient indication of a law, nor a natural reason of a natural law; but when the reason is essential to nature consigned by God, then it is: and as a reason approaches nearer to this, so the action is more or less natural or unnatural; and this is the case of brother and sister. For the reverence which is due to parents, hath its place here also, "propter recentem admodum parentum in liberis imaginem;" and therefore it is, with greater reason, forbidden; and if it were not, the whole world might be filled with early adulteries. For the dearnesses of brother and sister, their cohabitation, their likeness of nature and manners, if they were not made holy and separate by a law, would easily change into marital loves: but their age and choice would be prevented by their too early caresses: and then since many brothers might have the same kindness to one sister, or might have but one amongst them all, the mischief would be horrible and infinite.

Dulcia fraterno sub nomine furta tegemus.
Est mihi libertas tecum secreta loquendi,
Et damus amplexus, et jungimus oscula coram;
Quantum est, quod desit! — Metam. l. 9.

28. For these and other accounts, which God best knew, he was pleased to forbid the marriage of brothers and sisters: this law, the Jews say, God gave to Adam under the title "De non revelandâ turpitudine;" but yet so, that it was not to be of force till mankind were multiplied: but then it took place as men did please. But this they say upon what ground they please; for it is highly improbable that the law of nature should be allowed years of probation, or that it should be a prime law of nature, which the nature of things and the constitution of the world did make necessary to be broken. But because God did afterwards make it into a law, and there is now very great reason that it should be a law, and the reason is natural, and will be perpetual, and all christian nations, and all that have any formed religion, have agreed to prohibit such marriages:—he that shall do so unreasonably, and as things now stand, so unnaturally and so foolishly as either to do it, or teach it, must be of no religion, and of no people, and of no reason, and of no modesty.

Of Mothers-in-Law, and their Husband's Children.

29. That the marriage of these is not against the law of nature, St. Austin^a does expressly affirm in his questions upon Leviticus; saying that "there is forbidden the discovering his father's nakedness;" but this is not to be understood of the father while he is alive, for that is forbidden in the prohibition of adultery: "Sed ibi prohibetur matrimonium contrahi cum illis, quas seclusa lege licet uxores ducere;" "marriage is there forbidden to be made with them, with whom otherwise it were lawful to contract:" but for this there can be no reasonable and fair pretence. For a mother-in-law and a mother are all one in the estimation of all the laws of the world, and therefore were alike in the prohibition; and the contrary was never done but by them who had no pretence for it, but "quod libet, licet;" "whatsoever a man hath a mind to do, that he may do;"—for this was the argument which Phædra courts Hippolytus withal;

Nec, quia privigno videar coitura noverca
Terruerint animos nomina vana tuos.
Ista vetus pietas, ævo moritura futuro,
Rustica Saturno regna tenente, fuit.
Jupiter esse pium statuit, quodcunque juvaret;
Et fas omne facit, fratre marita soror. Ovid.

The impiety of their gods seemed to be their warrant, and their pleasure was all their reason, their appetite was their argument. But this we find sufficiently condemned by St. Paul, "it is a fornication, which is not so much as named amongst the gentiles,—that one should have his father's wife." Cajetan supposes, that this Corinthian did lie with her while his father was alive; because the apostle calls her not the widow, but the wife of his father. I am of his opinion, but not for that reason; because that expression he uses not so much to describe the person as to aggravate the crime: but that it was in his father's lifetime I am induced to believe by the word πόρνεια, "fornication," which though it be often used for "adultery," yet I find it not used for "nuptiæ nefariæ," or that which is usually called "incest." But however, that which St. Paul notes here and so highly abominates, is not the adultery, but the impiety of it; not that it was a wife, but his father's wife; and therefore although even so it were a high crime and of a deep tincture, yet the unnaturalness and the scandal of it St. Paul here condemns: it was the same that Antiochus did to Stratonice, the wife of his father Seleucus, and that which Reuben did to the concubine of his father Jacob; a thing so hateful to all nature that the very naming of it is a condemnation; and therefore is all one with the prime natural law of prohibition of the conjunction of parents and children; for she that is one flesh with my father, is as near to me as my father, and that is as near as my own mother; as near I mean in estimation of the law, though not in the accounts of nature, and therefore, though it be a crime of a less turpitude, yet it is equally forbidden, and is against the law of nature, not directly, but by interpretation.

^a Quest. 61.

Of Uncles and Nieces.

30. Now if the nearest of kin in the collateral line were not forbidden by a law of nature, much less are they primely unlawful that are further off. The ascending and descending line cannot marry, but are forbidden by God in the law of nature: so mothers-in-law and their husband's children: and brothers and sisters are, by the laws of all the world, and for very great reason, forbidden, but not by the law of nature. But for all other degrees of kindred, it is unlawful for them to marry interchangeably, when and where they are forbidden by a positive law, but not else; and therefore the marriages of uncles and nieces, or aunts and nephews, become unlawful, as the laws of our superiors supervening make it so, but was not so from the beginning, and is not so by any law of Christ.

31. In the civil law of the Romans, it was lawful for the uncle to marry the brother's daughter, and this continued by the space of two hundred and fifty years from the days of Claudius to the reign of Constantine, or thereabouts: and though this began among the Romans upon the occasion of Claudius's marrying Agrippina, yet himself affirms, (as Tacitus^x makes him to speak,) "Nova nobis in fratrum filias conjugia: sed aliis gentibus solemnia, nec lege ullâ prohibita." "Indeed it is new to us, but to other nations usual and lawful:" and the newness of it scared Domitian so that he refused it; and not many did practise it: only I find that a poor obscure libertine, T. Alledius Severus, did it, as Suetonius observes: but it was made lawful by the civil law, and allowed in the rules of Ulpian; and when Nerva had repealed the law, Heraclius reduced it again, and gave the same permissions.

32. But that which moves me more is, that it was the practice of the Jews, the family of Abraham, and the council of the wise men to do so, as Ben Maimon the famous Jew reports: "In monitis sapientum habetur, ut in uxorem ducat quis ante alias, neptem ex sorore, seu ex fratre neptem, juxta id quod dicitur, à carne tuâ ne te abscondas:" and Josephus does suppose, that when Abraham said of Sarah, "she is my sister, the daughter of my father," the truth is, she was his father's grandchild, that is, the daughter of Abraham's brother; for unless it had been a known thing in that nation, that Abraham's family would not have married their german-sisters, it could have been no security to Abraham to pretend her to be so: for she might be his wife and his sister too, unless such marriages had been unlawful and rejected. But then when Abraham was reproved for his lie, he helped the matter out with a device; she was his father's daughter, that is, by the usual idiom of that family, the child of his father descending by his brother: and this was St. Austin's^y opinion, "Nam qui maxime propinquant, solebant fratres et sorores appellari;" and Cicero^z calls his cousin Lucius, brother; so Lot^a is called Abraham's brother, though he was but the son of his brother Haran, just as near as his wife Sarah was to him, whom for the like reason he called sister. But of this I shall yet give a further account. But whether Josephus said true or no, Abraham said true, that is certain; either she was his half-sister, or his brother's daughter; either of which is forbidden in Leviticus; and this sufficiently declares that they have their unlawfulness from a positive law, not from any law of nature.

33. If it were needful to instance in any other great examples of such marriages, it were very easy to do it. Amram, the father of Moses, married his aunt, as some suppose; Diomedes and Iphidamus, among the Greeks, married their mother's sisters; and Alcinous took to wife Arete, his brother's daughter. Andromede was promised to her uncle Phineus. One of the Herods married his brother's daughter, and yet was not (so far as we find) reproved for it; and he gave his own daughter to his brother Pherotas; and some suppose this to be the case of Othniel, in the days and under the conduct of Joshua. For the words in the story are these:^b "And Othniel the son of Kenaz, the brother of Caleb, took it: and he gave him Achsah his daughter to wife:" but of this I shall give a particular account: for this being against the law of Moses by which they were bound, was not to be supposed easily to have been done by so pious persons: but all that I contend for, is, that it was not unlawful before the law of Moses: against these marriages there was no "opus scriptum in cordibus," no law of nature, but they became unlawful upon another account; and therefore it was unlawful to them only, to whom that account was to be reckoned.

Of the Marriage of Cousins-German.

34. From the premises it will abundantly follow, that no person ought to be affrighted with the pretences of any fierce and mispersuaded person, that the marriage of cousins-german is against the law of nature: and in this case a man need least of all to fear; for the law of nature is a known and evident thing, it is notorious and felt, and if any man shall need to be told what is against natural reason, which is the matter out of which all natural laws are framed, he may as well have need to be reminded, when he is hungry or thirsty. For although some persons have got a trick to scare their proslaves from a practice to which they have no mind by telling them it is against the law of nature, when they can prove it upon no other account to be unlawful, so making the law of nature to be a sanctuary of ignorance and an artifice to serve their end, just as the pretence of occult qualities is in natural philosophy; yet concerning the law of nature, it being imprinted in our hearts, explicated by christianity, relying upon plain, prime, natural reason, a man may as much need to be told when himself does a thing against his own will, as when he does against his own reason and his own nature. Only it is certain, that when education and our country customs have, from the beginning, possessed our understandings and our practices, so that we never saw any other usage of things or heard talk of any other, it looks as if it came from nature, and were something of her establishment : so St. Paul to the Corinthians, “ does not even nature herself teach, that it is a shame for a man to wear long hair ? ” that is, even in nature there is the signification of some difference in that matter, which custom hath established into a law : but in such cases as these, a wise man can easily distinguish words from things, and appearances from firm establishments. But that the law of nature hath nothing to do in the marriage of cousins-german, save only that she hath left them to their liberty, appears from all the premises, which in this instance, as being further removed, must needs conclude stronger than in their own.

35. But then, in the next place, if the inquiry be made, what it is in the judicial law of Moses, which is the main of our present inquiry, supposing the judicial law of Moses could, in any of its instances, oblige christians, yet cousins-german were still free to marry : for I do not so much as find it pretended by any one to be there forbidden, except St. Ambrose, who disputing fiercely against Paternus for marrying his son to his grandchild by another venter, that is, so as the young gentleman was uncle to his wife, in anger against that, says that by the law of God (meaning in Leviticus) cousins-german are forbidden to marry, much more (says he^c) uncle and niece : “ Qui enim leviora astringit, graviora non solvit sed alligat : ” “ He that binds to the less, does not untie the greater. ” But the event of this is only that St. Ambrose is by all learned men condemned for an ἀμάρτημα μνημονευτικόν, “ a slip in his memory : ” and men ought to be wary, lest great names abuse them by opinion and mistaken zeal.

But the law is this, Lev. xviii. 6. “ None of you shall approach to any that is near akin to him, to uncover their nakedness : I am the Lord. ” Here the questions use to be,

- 1. What is meant by “ none of you ? ”
- 2. What is intended by “ near of kin to you ? ”
- 36. “ None of you : ” “ Vir vir non accedet : ” ἄνθρωπος ἄνθρωπος in the LXX. “ A man, a man shall not approach : ” so it is in the Hebrew : that is, say the Rabbins, “ the Jew and the gentile shall not. ” I shall not contend for it, or against it. I suppose it may well be admitted, that potentially all mankind was included, that is, all who were born to Israel, or adopted by being proselytes, were bound to this law, Jews, and gentiles too when they became Jews in religion, but that it included others, that conversed not with the nation, that were strangers to their laws, is as if we should say the Parthians were to be judged by the Gallic laws, or the Persians guided by the Greeks. But the purpose of them who would introduce this sense, is, that it might be intimated that these degrees here mentioned were forbidden by the law of nature, and consequently obliging all christendom : the contrary whereof because it appears from the premises, I shall only add, that no nation of old did observe all these laws, and that there was never any sufficient argument to enforce upon us their obligation, and because it must needs remain to us as it was before the law,—if they were not obliged then, neither are we. But this I suppose they might be, and some of them were obliged by special laws before the collection and publication of the body of Moses’s law. For as the law of Christ is a collection and perfect explication of the law of nature and essential reason ; so Moses’s law was a collection of all the wise and prudent laws, by which God governed those nations and those ages which were before Moses. Thus the law of the sabbath was one great member of this collective body of the Mosaic law ; but it was given before the solemnities of mount Sinai. The law that the brother should raise up seed unto his brother who died without issue, was also given to that family before the publication of it by Moses, as appears in the story of Judah and Tamar’s quarrel about Onan and the rest. And thus also I suppose, that all or most of these laws of marriage were given to the nations of the east and south, descending upon them by the tradition of their forefathers ; from God derived to Adam in part, and in part to Noah, and something of it to other patriarchs and eminent persons, and at last by the commandment of God united into a digest by Moses.

37. And upon this account it is, that God said that “ the Canaanites had polluted themselves in all these things, and therefore the land did spew them out ; ” which, although it cannot infer that these laws did naturally oblige, as I have already discoursed,^d yet that they were, by some means or other, bound upon them, is probable enough, though in this matter there be no certainty. But in this there is ; for that all mankind was not bound by all these laws of consanguinity and affinity, appears in all the foregoing instances : and the marriages of the patriarchs must conclude them to be as impious as the Canaanites in theirs, or else that these laws did not oblige all mankind ; and if not from the beginning, then not now : if these laws were not natural, they are not christian, which also will further appear in the sequel.

2. But there will be more consideration upon the second quære, what is meant by “ near of kin to you ? ”

38. Our English is not sufficiently expressive of the full sense of it. The Latin is something nearer to the Hebrew, “ Vir non accedet ad propinquitatem carnis suæ ; ” “ To the nearness of his flesh, ” πρὸς οἰκεῖαν σαρκός, or as other books, πρὸς οἰκεῖαν σαρκός, “ ad domesticam carnis suæ, ” “ to her that is so near of kin, that they usually dwell in the same house ; ” that is, parents and children, brothers and sisters, or our parents’ brothers and sisters. In these cases, there being ever the same account of consanguinity and affinity ; this rule takes in all that is there forbidden. But it is highly observable that there is great difference between “ propinqui ” and “ cognati. ” God never forbade to marry our kindred, but he forbade to marry the nearness of our flesh. Which phrase when we rightly understand, this whole question will be quickly at an end.

39. For “ near of kin ” is an indefinite word, and may signify as uncertainly as “ great ” and “ little ” do : nothing of itself determinately, but what you will comparatively to others: and it may be extended to all generations of mankind where any records are kept, as among the Jews they were: from Judah to Joseph, the espoused of the blessed Virgin, from Benjamin to Michael, from Levi to Heli: and thus it is in great proportion amongst the Spaniards and Welch, and, in all nations, in their greater and more noble families. The Welch do, to this day, esteem him near of kin to them, whom the English do not: and since we see the prohibition of marriage with kindred hath been extended sometimes, and sometimes contracted, it is necessary that all lawgivers do express what is meant by their indefinite terms.

40. Hemingius gives a rule for this as near as can be drawn from the words and the thing. "Propinquitas carnis," saith he, "quæ me sine intervallo attingit." That is, "she that is next to me, none intervening between the stock and me:" that is, the propinquity or nearness of my flesh above me is my mother, below me is my daughter, on the side, is my sister, this is all: with this addition, that these are not to be uncovered for thy own sake; thy own immediate relations they are: all else which are forbidden, are forbidden for the sakes of these: for my mother's or my father's, my son's or my daughter's, my brother's or my sister's sake; only reckon the accounts of affinity to be the same: "Affinitates namque cum extraneis novas pariunt conjunctiones hominum, non minores illis quæ è sanguine venerunt:" said Philo;^c "Affinity makes conjunctions and relations equal to those of consanguinity:" and, therefore, thou must not uncover that nakedness, which is thine own in another person of blood or affinity, or else is thy father's or thy mother's, thy brother's or thy sister's, thy son's or thy daughter's nakedness. This is all that can be pretended to be forbidden by virtue of these words, "near of kin," or "the nearness of thy flesh."

41. And this we find expressed^f in the case of the high priest's mourning: "The high priest might not be defiled for the dead among his people, but for his kin that is near unto him, he may;" that is, for his mother, and for his father, and for his son, and for his daughter, and for his brother, and for his virgin-sister. This is the "propinquitas carnis," she that is immediately born of the same flesh that I am born of, or she out of whose flesh I am born, or she that is born out of my flesh, is this "near of kin." There is no other propinquity but these, all else are removed; and when a bar does intervene, all the rest are or may be accounted "kindred," but "not near of kin," not the nearness of my flesh, which only is here forbidden.

42. Only this more: that since the prime natural law does forbid the marriage of the ascending and descending line, that is, fathers and children, and so consequently and by a stronger reason, grandchildren, and downwards for ever in descent; God was pleased to set a προφυλακή, "a bar and a hedge" round about this to keep men off, far off from it,—that if men would be impious, they might not, at first, come to the highest step: and, therefore, as God placed the prohibition of brother and sister under, so on the side of it he forbade the marriage of uncles and aunts: for they are thy father's or thy mother's "near kin," they are to them the "propinquitas carnis;" therefore, for the reverence of father and mother the Jews were bidden to keep off one step more; for the last step of lawful is soon passed over into the first step of unlawful, and therefore God was pleased to set them further off. And the christian divines and lawyers, well understanding this, express the prohibition to this sense: that uncles and aunts are not to be married, because they are "loco parentis," they are "quasi parentes," images of fathers and mothers, for the reverence of which, the marriage of our uncles and aunts respectively are forbidden. This is just as it was forbidden to the Jews to make an image; which thing could not have any moral or natural obliquity; but it was set as a προφυλακή, "a guard and a hedge" to keep them off from worshipping them. The case is the same here: for the Jews were as apt to comply with the Egyptians and Canaanites in their incestuous mixtures, as in their idolatrous worshippings; but, therefore, the hedges were placed before them both. But half an eye may see the different accounts, upon which, in this place, was passed an equal prohibition.

43. But besides all this, what better determination can we have of these indefinite words of "near of kin," or "the nearness of thy flesh," (for those are the words in the Hebrew, so they are to be rendered,) than the express particulars made by God himself in that very place; where none are reckoned in the equal collateral line, but brothers and sisters, and their "affines" or allies" their husbands and wives respectively; none in the unequal collateral line, but uncles and aunts and their allies; in the ascending and descending line, fathers and mothers, their children and their grandchildren with their allies; in all which there is nothing at all that concerns cousins-german, neither upon any thing of this account can they be supposed to be forbidden, or to be "the nearness of our flesh."

44. But if any scrupulous person shall inquire further, and suspect that some degrees or persons are forbidden to marry that are not here expressed, but included by a parity of reason, as it happens in another instance: for it is not forbidden to marry our mother's brother's wife; but because here it is made unlawful to marry father's brother's wife, it is to be concluded also for the other, there being the same degree and the same reason.

45. I answer to this by parts; 1. It is very likely that it is so intended, that in equal cases there is an equal prohibition; but it cannot certainly be concluded and relied upon that it is so. 1. Because upon this account cases of fear and scruple might very much be multiplied to no purpose. For I remember, that Fagius reckons, out of the books of the Rabbins, twenty persons forbidden to marry, which yet are not reckoned in Leviticus. 2. Because of the rule of the law,^g "Quod lege prohibitoria non vetitum est, permissum intelligitur:" "In negative precepts that which is not forbidden, is presumed to be allowed." And to add more out of fear is either to be wiser than the lawgiver, or to suspect him to be apt to quarrel by unknown measures, and secret rules of interpretation. 3. Because I find, that, amongst wise nations, the same degree does not always admit the same prohibition. To marry my father's sister was forbidden, and it was not forbidden to marry my brother's daughter, but it was sometimes practised amongst the Hebrews; and they give this reason for it; because young men, daily frequenting the houses of their grandfathers and grandmothers, converse with their aunts, and are therefore forbidden to marry, lest such conversation should become their snare: but to the houses of their brethren their address is not so frequent, their conversation more separate, and their interest and expectations less, and therefore to marry the daughters of their brother might with more safety be permitted, because there is less temptation. Thus by the laws given to the sons of Noah, the Jews observe, that it was permitted to marry the sister by the father's side, but not our sister by the mother. It was Abraham's case; for as Saidus Batricides, the patriarch of Alexandria about seven hundred years since, in his Ecclesiastical Annals, tells out of the monuments of the east: "Terah begat Abraham of his first wife Jona; and, she being dead, he married Teheviha, and of her begat Sarah—Abraham's wife: and this is it which he said, 'she is the daughter of my father, but not the daughter of my mother:—' from whence they suppose this not to be permitted, and that the other was; for so R. Jarchi glosses those words of Abraham now quoted: "Quoniam inter gentes ratio consanguinitatis paternæ neutiquam habebatur:—" "Because among the gentiles" (meaning by the law of nature, or the law given to Noah) "there was little or no account made of kindred by the father's side in the matter of marriages." So amongst the Romans, after the time of Claudius, it was permitted to marry the brother's daughter, but not the sister's daughter, as appears in the rules of Ulpian; but the reason of this particular instance, I confess, I cannot learn; I only observed it to this purpose, that amongst wise nations, the same degree hath not the same prohibition.

46. But I am willing enough to admit it with these cautions.

(1.) That there be not only the same degree, but the same reason: for as Ulpian well observes in his rules: "In quarto (gradu) permittitur (connubium) extra eas personas, quæ parentum liberorumque locum habent:—" therefore, says he, they add that the great aunt by the father's and by the mother's side, and the sister's niece, may not be married, "Quamvis quarto gradu sint," "although they are in the fourth degree:" because the prohibition is not always for the nearness or for the degree, but for the proper reason; and if you could suppose a woman to live to see six generations of her line, yet it is unlawful for her to marry that sixth degree of nephews, and not unlawful to marry the first degree of cousins.

47. (2.) In the descending line, the case is otherwise than in the equal line. Here the further off the persons are, the less reason still there is they should be forbidden: but in the descending line, the further the persons are removed, the greater cause there is they should be forbidden: therefore, there is no comparison between the cognation of uncles and their nieces, and the cognation of cousins in the equal lines: because the reason distinguishes them, not the kindred or nearness to the common parent.

48. (3.) It is true which is affirmed in the law, "In pari cognationis gradu, par idemque jus statuatur:—" "When the cognation is the same, the law is so too;" that is, if it be measured in the same kind of cognation: ascending compared to ascending, equal collateral to equal collateral, unequal to unequal; for when the comparison is of things in the same order, then not only the degree but the reason is most commonly the same too, and that is principally to be regarded.

49. But though I am willing enough to admit this rule with these cautions, yet many others will not, nor think it reasonable that any thing should be supposed to be forbidden in the Levitical law, but what is there set down, excepting the descent of children, in which it is not easy to prevaricate beyond the degrees forbidden expressly, if a man had a mind to it; and it was never heard of, that a marriage was thought of between a woman and her great-grandfather: and they give this reason why they limit themselves to the degrees expressed. Because unless God had intended there a perfect enumeration of all the persons forbidden to contract marriages mutually, it cannot be imagined why he should be pleased to repeat some degrees twice which are equally forbidden in the several instances: for if the parity of cognation were to be the measure, then those degrees, which are twice repeated, might, without such repetition, have better been reduced to the rule, under which they were sufficiently prohibited.

50. (2.) But whether it be or be not so, yet it can no way reach to the case of cousins-german: for there is, in Leviticus, no degree equally near that is forbidden, except of such persons which are in the place of parents, who are prohibited upon another account.

51. But that which ought to put it past all question that the marriage of cousins-german was not prohibited by the Levitical law either expressly or by consequence and parity of reason, is this: because it was practised by holy men, both before and after the law, and so ordered to be done by God himself. In the law, there are no words against it, no reason against it expressed or intimated in a parity of prohibition given to something else; and it was frequently practised amongst persons of a known religion, and was, by God, given in command to some persons to do it; therefore nothing is more certainly warranted, excepting only express commandments.

52. The particulars I relate to in Scripture, are these; Jacob married his cousin-german Rachel, the daughter of his uncle Laban. Amram,^b the father of Moses, begat him of his cousin-german Jochebed. That she was his aunt is commonly supposed, but the LXX and the vulgar Latin report her to be his aunt's daughter, though by the style of the Hebrews she was called his aunt: just as Hanameel is called in some books the uncle of the prophet Jeremy,ⁱ when he was really his uncle's son; and so the vulgar Latin Bibles read it: and Lot was called "brother" by Abraham, when he was his brother's son. Caleb having promised his daughter Achsah to him that should take Kirjath Sepher, she fell to Othniel the son of Kenaz, Caleb's brother; so Pagnine and Arias Montanus read it, "filio Kenaz fratris Caleb," meaning Kenaz to be Caleb's brother: so that Othniel and Achsah were brother's children; for it cannot be supposed that Othniel was Caleb's brother, and so was uncle to Achsah; for that being forbidden in the law of Moses, under which Othniel and Achsah lived, was not a thing so likely to be done, and consented to by Caleb: as I have already noted.^k

53. But the matter was made more notorious in the case of Zelophehad's daughters;^l who, because they were heiresses, were commanded to marry their kindred; and they married their father's brother's sons. This was a special case, but therefore it was a special command; and what was, in all cases, lawful, was made, in this case, necessary. For if the woman was an heiress, she was to pleasure her own family rather than strangers. And this was not only amongst the Jews, but amongst the Greeks and Latins, as appears by that of the comedy,—

Lex est ut "orbæ, qui sunt genere proximi, his nubant;" et "illos ducere" eadem hæc lex jubet.

TER. in Phor.

If the woman was without children (add also) and without a father, that is, if her father be dead,—the next of kindred was bound to marry her: and therefore, when Æschylus^m calls the marriage of certain cousins-german λέκτρα ὧν θέμις εἶργει, "marriages which the law forbids," and affirms μυίνεσθαι γένος, "the family is stained by it,"—the scholiast adds, that therefore "these marriages are unlawful, because the fathers were alive;" and so it was not unlawful upon the stock of kindred; but because the maid was ἐπικληρῖτις, an "heiress," and might not marry without her father's leave. This woman was called among the Greeks ἐπιδικαζομένη, "a woman determined by law," and already judged to such a marriage; πατροῦχος, and ἐπικληρος, or ἐπικληρῖτις, and to them that were so, it was not free to marry any one; they must marry their kindred;—

Hic meus amicus illi genere est proximus,
Huic leges cogunt nubere hanc.—ADELPHI.

And we find in the old civil law, that one Cassia was declared inheritrix upon condition, "Si consobrinus nupsisset:"ⁿ "if she did marry her cousin-german:" and Papinian^o affirms, "conditionem illam, si consobrinam duxeris, hæreditatis institutioni utiliter adjici posse;" it is a legal and a fair condition, and may be the limit of an inheritance, that the heiress be bound to marry her cousin-german. And this in some measure was the case of Ruth,^p whom Boaz, great-grandfather to king David, did marry by the right of a kinsman. "Now it is true," saith he, "that I am thy near kinsman, howbeit there is a kinsman nearer than I:" which kinsman, because he refused to marry Ruth, Boaz took her to wife, and she became a mother in the line of the Messias; for Christ came out of her loins according to the flesh.

54. Into which line because this argument hath led me, I offer it to consideration as the last and greatest example of the lawfulness and holiness of such marriages under the law of Moses, and as a warranty to all ages of the christians; the blessed Virgin Mary, the mother of our most blessed Saviour, was married to her cousin-german,—as was supposed upon this reason: for her husband Joseph was the son of Heli, saith St. Luke;^q that is, the legal son of Heli; for Jacob begat him, saith St. Matthew. Now Heli and Jacob were brethren, the sons of Matthat, who was grandfather to Joseph and Mary; for unless, by the cognation of Joseph and Mary, the same genealogy had served for them both, the reckoning of the genealogy of Joseph could not have proved Jesus to have descended from David. But if this instance should fail, and that their consanguinity (for they were cousins) did stand at further distances; yet there are examples, and reasons, and authentic precedents, already reckoned, enow to warrant us in this inquiry.

55. By all which it appears, what was the state of these marriages under the law of Moses; and yet all the scruple, at which weak persons start or stumble, is derived from that sanction in Leviticus: which, in despite of all reason, and all precedents, and all observations whatsoever, they will needs suppose to be a natural and moral law, so making eleven commandments: for certain it is, that the ten commandments was to the Jews the sum of their moral law: in which, since some things that were ceremonial were inserted, it is not likely that any thing that was moral should be omitted. In the ten words of Moses, there was nothing less than their whole moral law, though something more there was: but this of forbidding cousins to marry was no where put. If it had been put in Leviticus, it was but national and temporary; for I have proved it was not against the law of nature, which permitted nearer relatives than cousins-german to marry. I have also proved that the sanction of Moses did only oblige Jews and proselytes; that if they had obliged at all, yet cousins-german are not there expressly forbidden,—and if they be not there expressly forbidden, they are not forbidden at all; but in case that other degrees of equal distance and reason were there forbidden, though not expressed, yet this of cousins-german is not, by any consequence or intimation of that, forbidden, because no degree is there forbidden which can involve this, but it hath a special case of its own, in which this is not at all concerned, and all this I strengthened with examples greater than all exception.

56. It remains now that we descend to the christian law, and inquire, whether our great Master and Lawgiver, Jesus Christ, hath forbidden cousins-german to marry? But this is soon at an end; for Christ spake nothing at all concerning marriage but one sentence which reduced it to the first state of nature, save only that he left us, in all things, bound by the laws of nations and our just superiors, of which two last I shall give account in the following periods. But of that which Christ said, the sum is this only: "For this cause shall a man leave father and mother and cleave to his wife, and they two shall be one flesh." By which words he did establish all that was natural and moral in this affair. "A man shall leave father and mother:"—by these words are forbidden the marriage of parents and children. "He shall cleave to his wife:"—by this is forbidden "concubitus masculorum." "His wife:"—by this is forbidden adultery, or the lying with another man's wife, and extra-nuptial pollutions. "Erunt duo,"—"they two:"—by that is forbidden "polygamy." "In carnem unam,"—"shall be one flesh:"—by this is forbidden bestiality, or the abuse of "caro aliena," the flesh of several species; which are all the unlawful and unnatural lusts forbidden by God in the law of nature, and that which was afterwards given to all mankind, and inserted in the Levitical law as the consummation and main design of the other prohibitions, which were but like hedges and outer guards to these.

57. There is in the New Testament only one law more which can relate to this question of marriages: "Provide things honest in the sight of all men;" and "Follow after things which are of good report;" that is, whatsoever is against public honesty, the law of nations, the common sense of mankind, that is not to be done by christians, though of the instance there be no special prohibition in the laws of Jesus Christ; and Modestinus the lawyer said well, "In nuptiis non solum quod liceat, sed etiam quid honestum sit, semper est respiciendum." Concerning which, lest there be a mistake in it, I premise this caution in general, that we do not take false or weak estimates of public fame and honesty. Nothing but the laws of God and men, or the universal sentence of that part of mankind with whom we any ways converse, is the measure of public honesty. Thus for a bishop to ride a hunting in his pontificals, or for a priest to keep an alehouse, is against public honesty: of the same nature are, for a woman to paint her face, or to go in man's apparel. But—when a thing is disputed on both sides by good and learned men, to do either is not against public honesty;—that is a certain rule; for when a thing is called good and honest by wise and good men, the question is divided, and therefore cannot be united against either of them. Upon this account St. Paul reprov'd the incestuous Corinthian, because he had done a fact which was not so much as named, that is, approved amongst the gentiles, that "one should have his father's wife." Caracalla indeed did it afterwards; and it was, before his time, done in the family of Seleucus; but these were insolent examples, ever disallowed by the Romans and all the nations within their circuit; and consequently the Greeks had, long before St. Paul's time, been more restrained in their too great licentiousness of marriages. And when the custom of this thing had procured a license for it amongst the Scots, St. Margaret, wife to Malcolm III. their king, did reduce the contrary law of nations, and forbade a son to marry his father's wife, or a brother to marry his brother's widow.

58. Beyond this the New Testament having nothing, if we reduce this to the present question, we must consider whether the marriage of cousins-german be against public honesty or good report, that is, whether it be condemned by the law of nations and the prevailing sentences or practice of wise men.

59. Concerning this, I find that Plutarch, speaking of the ancient laws and usages of the Romans in marrying their kindred, says, It was a practice before it was a law: and there happened to be a case of a good man who had a great advantage by marrying his cousin-german; upon occasion of which the people made a law that it should be permitted to any one to do it, ψηφισάμενος πᾶσιν ἐξεῖναι γαμεῖν ἄχρις ἀνεψιῶν, τὰ δὲ ἀνωτέρω κεκωλύσθαι. Now this was very ancient; and before this law for it, I find no law against it; only if Claudius in Tacitus said true, they were "diu ignorata," no notice of them, or but seldom examples. Concerning which discourse, though men are pleased to talk as serves their turns, yet it is very certain that the elder the times were, the more liberty there was of marrying their kindred. However, there was an early law for it and none against it, that I find; and when it began to be considered, "tempore addito percrebuerunt," said Tacitus,^r "they in time grew frequent." In the oration of Sp. Ligustinus, in Livy, there is this clause, "Pater mihi uxorem fratris sui filiam dedit:"—"My father gave to me for wife his own brother's daughter:"—and Quintilian, mourning for the immature death of his son, affirms that "he was designed to be son-in-law to his uncle." So Cicero^s says that his sister married Melinus, his cousin-german; and Augustus Cæsar gave his daughter Julia to Marcellus, the son of his sister Octavia. The brave Brutus, who was the example of a rare moral man and a noble patriot, was married to Portia, the daughter of his wife's uncle, Cato; and that incomparable prince, Marcus Antoninus, the philosopher and emperor, was married to his nearest cousin, Annia Faustina; she was his cousin-german. But thus it was at the beginning; and thus it was at the ending of the Roman state and empire. At the beginning; the two daughters of Servius Tullius were married to their cousins-german, Lucius and Aruns, the nephews of Priscus Tarquinius. Livy^t indeed says, It was not certain whether these young gentlemen were uncles or cousins-german to their wives; that is, whether they were sons or nephews to Tarquinius Priscus; but Dionysius Halicarnassensis contends earnestly that they were nephews. Toward the declination of the Roman period and state, we find that Constantius, the emperor, gave his sister to her cousin, Julianus.^u

60. These, and all the foregoing examples of the wisest, of the best, of the most holy persons, patriarchs and kings, consuls and philosophers, lawgivers and saints, the practice and customs of the greatest and most civil nations, are infinitely sufficient to dash in pieces this weak pretence, (if any should make use of it,) that the marriage of cousins-german is against public honesty, and so consequently not of good report: for that which God never forbade, but sometimes did actually command,—which the patriarchs did practise,—which the church of the Jews never scrupled at, but always were accustomed to it,—which wise men and good men have done without reproof,—which was admitted by the law of nations, and is no where contradicted in Scripture, which records many authentic precedents of such marriages,—in all reason ought to be of good report. And certainly nothing hath done dishonour and so lessened the fame and good opinion of such marriages, as the very making a question concerning its lawfulness, and making a scruple even after the question is well determined. To be suspected, lessens the fame of any man or any thing. The doing justice to this article will do it reputation enough.

61. If we now shall inquire how the civil law of the Romans did determine of these marriages, we shall be helped much in the cure of the former fear. For if the law of the Romans allowed it, that law which had so many brave and wise composers, and which so many nations allowed of and practised, and still do in very many kingdoms and republics, we have no reason to think it can be of ill report. But concerning this the matter is not very disputable, it is notorious that the civil law did allow it.^x Paulus the lawyer said; ^y “Si nepotem ex filio et neptem ex altero filio in potestate habeam, nuptias inter eos me solo auctore contrahi posse Pomponius scribit, et verum est:” and Antoninus the emperor said, “Non videri potest sub specie turpium nuptiarum viduitatem tibi induxisse, cum te filio sororis suæ consobrino tuo, probabili consilio, matrimonio jungere voluerit.” I need in this say no more. It was always permitted in the Greek and Roman laws, till the time of Theodosius, who being overruled by St. Ambrose, forbade it by an express law; “tantum pudori tribuens continentiae, ut consobrinorum nuptias vetuerit tanquam sororum,” said Aurelius Victor; he thought it more nice and modest if he should enlarge the laws, and restrain what was not restrained before: but this, as it arose suddenly, so as suddenly was extinguished; for it was abrogated by Arcadius and Honorius’s sons, whose constitution to this purpose is in Justinian,^z in which these words are remarkable, “Revocata prisce juris auctoritate, restinctisque calumniarum fomentis, matrimonium inter consobrinos habeatur:” “The law that forbade them was occasioned and fomented by calumnies; which being dispersed, the authority of the ancient law was recalled.”

62. This only I am to admonish; that in the Theodosian code the law of these emperors seems to say otherwise, as is to be seen under the titles of Sinuptiæ ex rescript. petant: et De incestis nuptiis. But the forgery is notorious enough. For when Alaric, king of the Goths, had commanded his subject Arrianus the lawyer to make a breviary of the code, he fitted those laws to the customs of his own country, and so abused the law of Arcadius and Honorius, as appears plainly by comparing those constitutions which passed under the fingers of Arrianus, with those which under the same rubrics are in the code of Justinian. For in this there is not one word spoken of the marriage of cousins-german under those titles. And as he hath done in the breviary of the Theodosian code, so hath he done in the epitome of Caius’s institutions, (he, or some such fellow as bad,) and made the civil law as he pleased expressly against the known sanction of all the old law of the braver Romans.^a The same also was done by Theophilus, who recited this law according to the manners of his own time, and recites the law of Justinian exactly contrary to Justinian’s sense, by clapping a perfect negative to his direct affirmative. But Curtius, the Latin interpreter of Theophilus, hath set it right again according to the true intent of the civil law. But, it may be, I do not well to trouble the question with these little things, when the great lines of duty are so plain and legible: and concerning this we have a full testimony from St. Austin;^a who having observed that in his time cousins-german did not often marry: “Experti sumus (says he) in conjugii consobrinorum etiam nostris temporibus quam raro per mores fiebat, quod fieri per leges licebat, quia id nec Divina prohibuit, et nondum prohibuerat lex humana.” That is, “for cousins-german to marry was neither prohibited by the laws of God nor man;” and so we have a testimony beyond exception concerning the civil law, and the law of God, and the law of the church, till his time. Now if it be objected that he says it was done but seldom, it is no wonder. St. Ambrose and Theodosius, a little before that time, had caused some restraint, and made the matter uneasy: and besides this, if any man could observe concerning any one sort of persons how seldom they marry, that is, how few examples any one man can observe of any degree, though never so distant, this will appear but light, as the dew upon a flower, or the down of a thistle. It is lawful for a father and his son to marry a widow and her daughter; and for two brothers to marry two sisters; and no man questions any thing of it; but “quam raro hoc per mores fiat;” how many examples can any one man reckon? Can he tell so many in one age and of his own notice, as to make them up a multitude?

63. That which is to be inquired next into, is the canon law; and that indeed does forbid it: but how, and to what purpose, and with what obligation, will not be wholly useless to consider.

64. (1.) In the very first canons of the church, (excepting only that one framed in the council of Jerusalem,^b) which are commonly called the canons of the apostles, there is a caution against incestuous marriages, but the instances are only, "He that marries two sisters, or his brother's widow or daughter;" the penalty is, "He may not be received into holy orders:" but for the matter of cousins-german, it was not forbidden until St. Austin's time; and thereabouts, it was true, that "Nondum prohibuerat lex humana, Divina nunquam;" "God's law had never, and till then man's law had not, forbidden it;"—that is, it was then in all senses lawful: and in the synod of Paris, almost six hundred years after Christ, those are defined to be unlawful marriages, "quæ contra præceptum Domini contrahuntur," "which are against the Divine law;" none else; amongst which the present case is not to be suspected: and in the old canons of the church, all the prohibited instances were comprised in these verses, which was their authentic table:

• Nata, soror, neptis, matertera, fratris et uxor,
Et patris conjux, mater, privigna, noverca,
Uxorisque soror, privigni nata, nurusque,
Atque soror patris, conjungi lege vetantur.^c

But in some assemblies of the bishops, about this time, a little before or a little after, the manners of the nations being spoiled with wars, rudeness, and barbarism, they contracted incestuous marriages: and it was therefore thought fit, that, as the marriages of uncles and nieces were forbidden, as a hedge to keep them farther off from father and mother, son or daughter,—so this of cousins-german was set as a προφυλακή, or an "outward court," to keep them from marrying brother and sister. And therefore Harmenopolus says, they were forbidden by the laws of the Greeks. And it was amongst them no more than was highly needful, for a reason which every one knows. But both there, and in the Latin church, when the prohibition of cousins' marriage is joined in the same decree with the marrying of sisters, the cause is rendered too suspicious. And yet there was an external cause, that had influence upon these sanctions of the church. The Goths then prevailed by the sword, and the church, to comply with the conqueror, was forward to receive this law from them: for the Goths had it before the Romans, and it is very probable that those barbarous people were the great precedents and introducers of the prohibition.

65. (2.) These laws were made by time and accidents, and were extended or contracted as it pleased the popes of Rome, who (as one observes) were, for a long time, "iniquiores et invidi in maritos," apt and easy to make all restraints upon marriages. If it were seasonable and fit, it were not useless to observe many instances out of the canon law to this purpose. But I forbear; that which I now observe, is, that the prohibition amongst them began with cousins-german; then it went to the third and fourth degrees; then to seven; then to four again; sometime to six, as in the synod at Cabaillon; sometimes "usque dum generatio agnoscitur, aut memoria retinetur," "as long as any memory of kindred remains;"—and that will be very far in Wales, where they reckon eight degrees and special names of kindred after cousins-german, and then kin for ever: and truly these canonists^d proceed as reasonably as their principles would admit. For if cognation or consanguinity was the hinderance of marriage, wherever they could reckon that, they had some pretence to forbid marriage: but if they only forbade it upon the accounts of nature, or by the precedent of the Divine law given to Moses, they were to stop there where nature stopped, or the Divine law. But that they would not, as knowing it to be an easy thing to make laws at the charge of other men's trouble.

66. (3.) The reasons why the projectors of the canon law did forbid to the fourth or to the seventh degree, were as fit a cover for this dish as could be imagined. They that were for four, gave this grave reason for it: "There are four humours in the body of a man, to which, because the four degrees of consanguinity do answer, it is proportionable to nature to forbid the marriage of cousins to the fourth degree." Nay more; "there are four elements;" ergo, to which it may be added, that there are upon a man's hand four fingers and a thumb. The thumb is the "stirps," or common parent: and to the end of the four fingers, that is, the four generations of kindred, we ought not to marry, because "the life of a man is but a span long." There are also four quarters of the world; and indeed so there are of every thing in it, if we please, and therefore abstain at least till the fourth degree be past. Others who are graver and wiser, (particularly Bonaventure,) observe cunningly, that "besides the four humours of the body, there are three faculties of the soul, which being joined together, make seven, and they point out to us that men are to abstain till the seventh generation." These reasons, such as they are, they therefore were content withal, because they had no better: yet upon the strength of these they were bold, even against the sense of almost all mankind, to forbid these degrees to marry.

67. (4.) When the canonists appointed what degrees of kindred they would have restrained from mutual marriage, they took their precedent and measure from the civil law, making this their standard, that so long as by the civil law inheritances did descend, so long by the canon law it should not be permitted to kindred to marry: and upon this account they forbade marriage to the seventh degree, because so far the laws appointed inheritances to descend. Now that this is a weak and a false ground, appears, because inheritances descend even to the tenth degree: and yet suppose it otherwise, yet the popes and other compilers of the canons overshoot their mark extremely: because, while they, forbidding marriages to the seventh degree, pretended to follow some proportions and usages of civil law, do yet reckon the degrees otherwise than the civil law does, and consequently do forbid marriage to the fifteenth civil degree exclusively. For whereas by the canon law so far as either of the persons is distant from the common parent, so far is he distant from the other in the equal line; so that, by this computation, cousins-german are distant in the second degree, and no more: by the civil law there are accounted so many degrees as there are persons besides the common parent, so that, in this computation, cousins-german are distant in the fourth degree; and consequently, the seventh canonical degree is the fourteenth civil degree, the unequality and unreasonableness of which all lawyers will deride. The same is, in proportion, to be said of their later reduction of the canonical prohibition to the fourth degree inclusively.

68. (5.) These laws, gathered by the Roman canonists, are not now, nor ever were they, obligatory but by the consent of the people, and the allowance of princes. For bishops, in their mere spiritual impresses, have no proper legislative power, where princes are christian: and, if the prince please, he may enlarge or restrain their power, so that he make no intrenchment on the Divine law, and do what is useful and profitable. "Fac legi tuæ sepem," said the Jews; "it makes the law firm if you put a hedge about it;" and where viler people, who had no fear of God, were apt to marry sisters or aunts, it was not ill to prohibit something that was lawful, lest they should run into what is unlawful. But this is matter of prudence only, and ought to be separated from the question of lawful or unlawful. But then when the prince does not bind, the subjects are free. "Honesta et justa esse quæ regi placent, et regno utilia:" "Those things which please the king and are profitable to the kingdom, are honest and just." It was truly said, but ill applied, by Antiochus Seleucus.

69. (6.) These laws are neither allowed by the prince, nor by the ecclesiastical state in England; and because they were useless and burthensome, they were laid aside; for they were but drains for money, and levies of rents; for even under the pope, the way was, and is now, open enough to cousins-german, if they have gold enough to purchase the lead. And so it was, when the civil law was tuned to the air of the canon law, and both to the manners of the Goths. Cousins might marry with a dispensation from the prince; a form of which is to be seen in Cassiodore.^c But this is one of the many blessings of the protestant religion, that we are not tied to pay money for leave to do a lawful action; so that, as the Jews were wont to say, "He that hath married a wife that is too near of kindred, let him turn proselyte, and then she is not of kin to him," I may in some sense use in the contest between our laws, and those of the Roman churches; "he that hath, or desires to marry, a wife of his kindred which is not too near by God's law, but is by the pope's law,—let him become a protestant, and then though nothing can be allowed to him which God hath forbidden, yet that leave which God hath given him, man shall not take away."

70. (7.) If it were at all considerable what is done by the canon law, there is a new device brought in of spiritual kindred; and marriages forbidden to be between such as answer at the font for the same child; that is, if we value the Roman canons, all mankind are in perpetual snare, and that to no purpose.

71. (8.) But as for the present inquiry, it is considerable that the canon law itself does not pretend it to be against the Divine law, but does it wholly upon other accounts, as I have already instanced; and this appears in the epistle of Rabanus to Cardinal Humbert: "Quod pontifices usque ad sextum vel septimum gradum conjugium prohibent, magis ex consuetudine humanâ quam ex lege Divinâ eos præcepisse credendum." The canons did not intend to signify it to be against the law of God for cousins to marry in the degrees forbidden by the canon law.

72. (9.) And after all, the laws of England do expressly allow it; as is to be seen in the tables of marriage set up in churches usually, and in the statute of 32d of Henry VIII. chap. 38. And it is observable, that in England they were allowed to do it ever since they were christians, unless they were papists. For till Pope Gregory's time, and Austin the monk, (though christianity had been here almost five hundred years before,) it was used by the Britons: and Pope Gregory did not think it fit, that Austin should put a restraint upon them (as is to be seen in the British Councils collected by that learned and good man, Sir Henry Spelman); but it was no little interest and power which the popes afterwards procured in the families of princes and other great personages, by giving leave to them to marry their near relatives; and their posterity, for their own sakes, would, in all likelihood, preserve that power, to which (as things then went) they did owe their legitimation.

73. Although I have passed through all laws that can oblige us, in this present inquiry,—yet because the chief disquisition is concerning the natural law, and whether or no any prohibition can from thence descend upon the marriage of cousins-german, is the main question; it will be proper here to add one topic more, that is, the prudence or reasonableness of the thing.

74. Concerning which it is observable, that who-soever shall go about to assign the proper reasons why certain degrees are forbidden to marry by the law of God, will, by experience, find it to be too hard for his head: and Rabbi Menahen Racanaten-sis observed, "Quod ad rationem attinet interdictorum incesti, magistri traditionum de eâ nihil certi acceperunt:" "The masters of traditions have received no certain account of those reasons, for which God forbade incestuous mixtures." Indeed, if we could find out the prime and proper reason, then, by proportions to it, we could better understand how far the prohibitions were to be extended. But this is to be despaired of. But yet men have ventured to give such reasons as they could,—which how far they are applicable to the present question, shall be considered.

75. (1.) That kindred ought not to marry, is therefore decreed, "ne æmulatio fiat in eâdem domo," says one. The same degree of kindred will be apt to love the same man, and so emulation will arise. Well, suppose that: but if it does, the marrying one of them will determine all the rest, and quiet the strife. But because this proves too much, it proves nothing at all. For upon the same account, a young man should not marry in a family where there are many daughters, "ne æmulatio fiat in eâdem domo," "to avoid emulation and competition."

76. (2.) Cousins would do better not to marry, says another,^f "ne habeat duas necessitudines una persona," "that one person may not be a double relative:" for so names will be confounded, and the same person shall be father and cousin to his own child. But what if he be? and what if a king be both a lord over, and a son under, his own mother? What if a man be a father and a judge, a brother-in-law and a natural brother, as when two brothers marry two sisters? The more relations and necessities there are, it is so much the better, and a twofold cord is not easily broken.

77. (3.) It were well that cousins might not marry, that by their kindred they might be defended from the injury of their husbands, in case they should need it.—Well, suppose this too: yet, 1. This does not at all concern the man; for he will not need a defence by his kindred against his wife. 2. For the woman, unless she marries all her kindred, the other may be a defence against the violence of one whom she does marry; and will be more likely to prevail in the defence against a kinsman, than against a stranger. 3. But if a woman be brought to that pass, her cousin shall do her little advantage against her husband; for such defences do but exasperate and make eternal animosities: but the laws are the best defences. 4. If the cousin will be a sure defence against the husband's injury; then if the cousin be married to her, he will be sure to do her no injury. For he that will do evil himself, is but an ill security to be engaged against another; and he that will prevaricate in the duty of a husband, will hardly secure the peace of the woman by the duty of a kinsman.

78. (4.) St. Austin's scruple is this: "Inest nescio quomodo humanæ verecundiæ quiddam naturale ac laudabile, ut cui debet causa propinquitatis verecundum honorem ab eâ contineat quamvis generatricem tamen libidinem." "There is, in the modesty of mankind, something that is natural and laudable; by which they abstain from congression with them, to whom they owe the honour of reverence and modest bashfulness." This, indeed, is a good account, where the modesty of nature does really make restraints and owes duty and reverence: and, therefore, is one of the most proper and natural reasons against the marriage of parents and children, and is, by the allowance of some proportions, extended to brother and sister: but if it be sent out one step further, you can never stop it more, but it shall go as far as any man please to fancy: therefore let it stop, where God and nature hath fixed its first bounds; and let not the pretence of a natural reason or instinct carry us whither nature never did intend; for it is certain she gave larger commissions, however the fears, or the scruples, or the interest of some men have made them to speak otherwise: and I remember, concerning Cicero, who sometimes speaks against the marriage of cousins, that it is but too reasonable to suppose he did it to remove suspicion from himself; it having been objected against him, by Q. Fusius Calenus, in Dio,^g that he was too kind and amorous to his own daughter: "Filia matris pellex tibi jucundior atque obsequentior quam parenti par est;" so unequal, so uncertain a way it is to trust the sayings of a man, when so frequently the man's opinion is not caused by his reason, but by a secret interest.

79. (5.) Pope Gregory, in his epistle to the archbishop of Canterbury, tries another way: "Experimento didicimus ex tali conjugio sobolem non posse succrescere." "If cousins-german marry, they will have no children." But the good man did not remember, that the whole nation of the Jews came from the marriage of the two cousins-german of Jacob, Rachel and Leah: and although, by this discourse, it seems it was a usual practice to do it; for from the practice only he could pretend to an observation of this event; yet as to the event of the thing itself, it is a very great experience which the world hath, by which his observation is confuted.

80. (6.) But the best reason given against the convenience of it, for none pretends higher, is, that it were better if cousins-german should not intermarry "propter multiplicandas affinitates," as St. Austin expresses it, "ut conjugii augeant necessitudines," "that so they might scatter friendships and relations in more families for the dissemination and extension of charity."—For cousins being already united and loving, it were well by marriage to endear others which are not so loving, not so united. Of this every one makes use that is pleased to dissuade these marriages. But to this I answer, 1. That suppose this were well, and without objection as to the material part, yet this does no ways prove it unlawful, and indeed is not, by the contrivers of it, intended it should; as appears in Philo and Plutarch, from whom St. Chrysostom and St. Austin did borrow it. 2. There may be one inconvenience in it, and yet many conveniences and advantages, which may outweigh that one; and that there are so, will appear in the sequel. 3. This very reason, when Philo, the Jew, had urged in general, for the scattering friendships, and not limiting alliances to one family, he adds, "Quod respiciens Moyses alias etiam multas propinquorum nuptias vetuit;" meaning, that this argument is sufficiently provided for by the restraints that Moses made,—and if we marry out of those limits, the friendship is enough scattered. For beyond brother and sister, uncles and nieces, the relation is far enough off to be receptive of, and to need the renovation or the arrests of friendship.

^f Cicero de Fin.

81. (7.) It were well if cousins-german did not marry, lest, by reason of their usual familiarity, converse, and natural kindness, fornications should be secretly procured; it being too ready for natural love to degenerate into lust.—I answer, that therefore let them marry as the remedy. For it were a hard thing that cousins, who do converse and are apt to love, should, by men, be forbidden to marry when by God they are not. For this aptness to love being left upon them, together with their frequent conversation, is a snare; which because God knew, he permitted them to their remedy; and if men do not, they will find that their prohibition of marriage will not be a sufficient security against fornication. For brothers and sisters, where the danger is still greater, God hath put a bar of positive law, and nature hath put the bar of a natural reason and congruity, and the laws of all mankind have put a bar of public honesty and penalties, and all these are sufficient to secure them against the temptation; and this was observed by a wise man^h long since in this very instance: αὐτίκα δ' οὐχ ἔρα ἀδελφὸς ἀδελφῆς, ἄλλος δὲ ταύτης· οὐδὲ πατήρ θυγατρὸς, ἄλλος δὲ ταύτης. “The father is not in love with the daughter; nor a brother with his sister:” the reason is, καὶ γὰρ φόβος καὶ νόμος ἱκανὸς ἔρωτα κωλύειν, “fear and the laws are restraint enough for this love:” but because to cousins this bar is not set, the greater propensity they have to love, the more need there is they should be permitted to marry. And this very thing was observed by Rabanus, in his epistle to Humbert. “Hujusmodi prohibitiones adulterii occasionem præbere;” “such laws of restraint are occasions of adultery;” and therefore he infers from thence, “Bonum esse ut, prætermisiss illis prohibitionibus, legis divinæ servetur constitutio.”—It were good, if standing in the measures of the Divine law, we should lay a snare for no man's foot by putting fetters upon his liberty, without just cause, but not without great danger.

82. I know of no more reasons pretended against this affair; I think these are all; and, I am sure, they are the most considerable. But then on the other side, although it were hard to require any more reason for the marriage of cousins-german, than we do for any other marriage, that is, that we love the person, that she be virtuous and fitted for our condition, yet I say “ex abundanti,” that there are conveniences and advantages which are not contemptible, nor yet are so readily to be found in the marriage of other persons.

83. (1.) There is the advantage of a great and most perfect parity of condition, that is regularly to be expected. There is no upbraiding of kindred, greatness or weakness of fortune occasioned by the difference of elder or younger brothers (for this being in all families, is not a reproach to any); and here is the greatest probability of a similitude of passions, humours, and affections; and they that have experience in economical affairs, know that these things are not contemptible.

84. (2.) It is observable, that, when God intended to bless a family and a nation, there he permitted, and, in some cases, commanded, the marriage of cousins-german, as in the families of Israel. And although it was lawful for one tribe to marry into another, as appears in David, who married Michal, Saul's daughter, of the tribe of Benjamin; and the Benjamitish families were restored by the intermarriages of the other tribes, after that sad war about the Levite's concubine; and Hillel, the Pharisee, was of the tribe of Benjamin by his father, and of Judah by his mother;—yet this was done so seldom, that it was almost thought not lawful; but the most general practice was to marry in their own nearer kindred, in their own tribe.

85. (3.) In the case of the ἐπίκληροι, or “heir-esses,” it was commanded, both in the Hebrew and in the Attic laws, that cousins-german should marry, lest the inheritance should go from the family, of which I have already given an account; but now I only observe the reasonableness and advantage. St. Austin's “largius sparge amicitias” is nothing; for when any considerable advantage is to be done, certainly our own are to be preferred before strangers. And the same also is true in proportion, when any one of the family is, passionately and to pious purposes, in love with his cousin.

86. (4.) In the case of an aunt's daughter to be married to her cousin by her mother's brother, there is this advantage to be gotten to the female side; she preserves her father's name in her own issue, which she had lost in her own person and marriage.

87. (5.) In the accidents of household conversation, and in the satieties of a husband's love, the stock of kindred comes in by way of auxiliary forces, to establish a declining or tempted love: and they understood this well, who made it an objection against the marriage of kindred, lest the love, being upon two accounts, should be too violent,—as Aristotle, in the second book of his Politics, seems to intimate. But I suppose that they who are concerned in such marriages, will not fear the objection; but they have reason to value the advantage.

—dum pietas geminato crescit amore. OVID. Met. x.

While the marital love is supported with the cognition.

88. (6.) St. Austin'sⁱ argument is to me highly considerable: “Fuit antiquis patribus religiosæ curæ, ne ipsa propinquitat se paulatim propaginum ordinibus dirimens longius abiret, et propinquitat esse desisteret, eam nondum longe positam rursus matrimonii vinculo colligare, et quodammodo renovare fugientem:”—“The dearness of kindred will quickly wear out, and cousins will too soon grow strangers, therefore the patriarchs had a religious care to recall the propinquity which was dividing and separating too fast; and as it were, to bind it by the ties of marriage, and recall it when it was flying away.” And indeed there is no greater stability to a family, no greater band to conjugal affections, than the marriage of cousins.

89. I should now speak no more to this question, but that I have often met with a trifling objection, concerning which I could never find any reasonable ⁱ Lib. xv. c. 16. de civit. Dei.

pretence, or ground of probability to warrant it: "Second cousins may not marry, but are expressly forbidden; therefore, much rather first cousins, though they be not named."—To this I answer, that I never knew the marriage of second cousins forbidden, but by them who at the same time forbade the marriage of the first; and indeed I have searched and cannot fix my eye upon any thing, that I can imagine to be the ground of the fancy: therefore, I can say no more to it; but that the law of God does not forbid either, nor the laws of our church or state, nor the laws of nature or nations, or right reason, but these marriages have advantages in all these. And we find that Isaac married his second cousin, and that was more for it than ever could be said against it. Abraham was careful, and Rebecca was careful that their children, respectively, should marry within their own kindred: for it was so designed, because those families were to be greatly and specially blessed; and they called one another into the participation of it. I conclude this question with as much warranty to the marriage of cousins-german, as can derive from the premises; they may without scruple own it, and say,

Viderit amplexus aliquis, laudabimur ambo.

I know no other pretences of any instance obliging christians derived only from the judicial law. These two do not oblige; and, therefore, the rule is true in its direct affirmation.

RULE IV.

The Ten Commandments of Moses, commonly called the Moral Law, is not a perfect Digest of the Law of Nature.

1. THE JEWS in their Cabala say, that the law of God was made before the creation of the world two thousand years, and written in black burnt letters on the backside of a bright shining fire; according to that of David, "Thy word is a lantern unto my feet, and a light unto my path."—Their meaning is, (for under fantastic expressions they sometimes intended to represent a material truth,) that the decalogue, or their system of moral precepts, was nothing but an express of the tables of the law of nature, long before Moses's time given and practised by their fathers. But this was not a perfect system; it was the best that ever was since Adam broke the tables of the natural law, and let sin and weak principles into the world; and it was sufficient in the present constitution of the world; but even this also was but like "a pædagogus to bring us to Christ." In the schools of Moses they practised the first rudiments of perfection; but Christ was the last, and therefore the most perfect, lawgiver; and they that did commence under Moses the servant of God, were to proceed under Jesus Christ the Son of God: and therefore, the apostle^k calls Christ τέλος τοῦ νόμου: and if we will acknowledge Christ to be our lawgiver, and the gospel to be his law, called in the New Testament, "the law of liberty," "a royal law;" then we must expect that our duty shall be further extended than to a conformity in our lives to the ten words of Moses.

2. I do not here intend to dispute, whether Christ hath given us laws, of which, neither before Moses nor since, there are any footsteps in the Old Testament; for I think there are none such, but in the letter or in the analogy they were taught and recommended before: but this I say; that some excellencies and perfections of morality were by Christ superadded in the very instances of the decalogue; these also were bound upon us with greater severity, are endeared to us by special promises, and we, by proper aids, are enabled to their performance; and the old commandments are explicated by new commentaries, and are made to be laws in new instances to which by Moses they are not obliged; and some of those excellent sayings which are respersed in the Old Testament, and which are the dawns of the evangelical light, are now part of that body of light which derives from the Sun of righteousness: insomuch that a commandment which was given of old, was given again in new manner, and to new purposes, and in more eminent degrees; and therefore, is also called a new commandment. Thus the conversation evangelical^l is called "an old commandment" and "a new one." So that in the whole this will amount to the same thing as if they were new commandments. I will not, therefore; trouble this article with those artificial nothings; or endeavour to force any man to say Christ hath given us new commandments; but this I suppose to be very evident, that we are by Jesus Christ obliged to do many things, to which the law of Moses did not oblige the sons of Israel; but whether this was by a new imposition, or a new explication of the old, it matters not, save that some men will be humoured in their own manner of speaking.

3. I give an instance; the christians are obliged to love their brethren, and their neighbours; the Jews were so too: but Christ commanded us to love those whom the Jews did not call brethren or neighbours; even all that have the same nature, even all that are in calamity. For to the question asked by the Pharisees, "and who is our neighbour?"—Christ answered by the parable of him that fell among the thieves; he that is in need, is our neighbour.—The Jews understood this to mean nothing but one of the same nation or religion; the rest they hated. Here then is a new duty; to which the Jews, in the same latitude and in the same expressions, were not bound by the decalogue; and this is as much as a new commandment; for it is new to me, if it imposes a new duty. So if God forbids incest, and by it only means the conjunction of parents and children,—if afterwards he commands us to abstain from brother and sister, uncles and aunts; this is a new law under the old words. The Jews^m might hate their enemies; but christians have none, that is, they have none whom they are to repute such by a legal account. The seven nations in Palestine were, legally and properly, to be accounted enemies; but to christians all are to be esteemed as brethren in some account or other; οὐδεὶς ἐχθρὸς τῷ σπουδαίῳ, "To a good man no man is enemy;"^a so that by alteration of the subject matter, the old law is become new, that is, we have a new law. "Lex vetus amorem docet in proximos, nova in extraneos;"^o "The old law teaches love to neighbours, the new to strangers:" that is, to such whom the Jews called so; but yet the christians are to treat as neighbours. For that is a duty to us, which was not so to them; and we may perish for omitting that, to which they were not obliged so much as under the pain of a legal impurity.

4. But not only in the object of our duty, but in the expression and signification of action, Christ is a new lawgiver. They and we are bound to love our brethren; but the precept of love did not bind them to what we are bound: we must die^p for our brethren; and of this we have an express commandment, which, it is certain, they had not; and no sign of it in their moral law. And it is not the same words, but the same intention of duty that makes the same law. The Jews were bound to love their wives; but an easiness of divorce did consist with that duty exacted by that law, but it will not do so in ours. Now as, in moral actions, a degree alters the kind,—so it is in laws; for every new degree of duty that is required, supposes a new authority or a new sanction to infer it; for the same law does not in one age directly permit an action, and in another forbid it; it does not reward in that person, which in another it will condemn.

5. But I add other instances. If repentance be a precept, and not only a privilege; it is certain that in the gospel there is a precept which was not permitted, much less enjoined; for this obedience supposes Christ to be our Redeemer in nature, before he is our lawgiver; and therefore, that it could be no part of their moral law. But repentance is not, properly and primarily, a law of nature; for though it was the first action of religion that we find was done in the world,—yet it is such a one, as supposes nature lapsed; and therefore at the most can be but adopted into the law of nature: but yet because it is as much a part of the law of nature, as restitution is a part of natural justice, this instance is not, altogether, an improper illustration of this rule.

6. But there are also many things, for which provisions are made in the law of nature; for which there is no caution in the decalogue. I instance in the matter of incest; and if any man will reduce it to the fifth commandment, it is certain he must then suppose only the mixture of parents and children to be, and that of brother and sister not to be, incestuous; for these cannot come under the title of father and mother; and if it be referred to the seventh commandment, it will be as improper as to suppose jeering to be forbidden in the sixth. I could add, that there being but two affirmative precepts in the decalogue, there is no caution against sins of omission in any other instances.

7. I will not instance in those precepts which relate to our blessed Lord himself, and are superinduced by christianity upon the law of nature; such as are "faith in Jesus Christ,—hope of eternal life,—fraternal correction,—avoiding scandal,—custody of the tongue in many instances,—the sacraments,—to stand fast in christian liberty,—searching the Scriptures,—humility,—mortification,—bearing the infirmities of the weak,"—and many more; all which proclaim Christ to be our lawgiver; but do not properly denote the imperfection of the decalogue, as it is the system of the laws of nature.

8. But I add from the very stock of nature many others. For though by the decalogue we are forbidden to do evil, yet we are not commanded to do good: and that is a material consideration; and cannot by way of reduction be brought hither: because they are wholly different things, and are the effects of several reasons, and to be encouraged by distinct promises or immunities respectively, and are not consequent to each other. For the sons of Israel and all the world are bound to do evil to no man, but are not bound to do good to every man: the first is possible, the second is not: and the Jews never understood, that they were bound to give alms by the sixth commandment: and, in nature, the obligation to do good is upon a positive account; as the obligation itself is. Of the same nature is gratitude,—readiness to help a man in need,—to keep a secret intrusted to us,—to perform promises: all which are of greater concernment to mankind than to be intrusted only to analogies, uncertain inferences, and secret corollaries; and yet for these there is no provision made in the ten commandments.

9. Neither can this measure of the decalogue be reproved by saying, that "all these laws of nature, and all the laws of Christ, may be reduced to the decalogue." I know it is said so very commonly, and the casuists do commonly use that method, that the explication of the decalogue be the sum of all their moral theology; but how insufficiently, the foregoing instances do sufficiently demonstrate; and therefore how inartificially, will also appear in the violence and convulsions, that must needs be used to draw all these dissonances into one centre. I remember that Tertullian^q (I suppose to try his wit) finds all the decalogue in the commandment, which God gave to Adam to abstain from the forbidden fruit: "In hac enim lege, Adæ datâ, omnia præcepta condita recognoscimus, quæ postea pullulaverunt data per Moysen."—And just so may all the laws of nature and of Christ be found in the decalogue, as the decalogue can be found in the precept given to Adam: but then also they might be found in the first commandment of the decalogue; and then what need had there been of ten? It is, therefore, more than probable, that this was intended as a digest of all those moral laws, in which God would expect and exact their obedience; leaving the perfection and consummation of all unto the time of the gospel: God intending by several portions of the eternal or natural law to bring the world to that perfection from whence mankind by sin did fall; and by Christ to enlarge this natural law to a similitude and conformity to God himself, as far as our infirmities can bear. It was very well said of Tertulian,^r “Intelligimus Dei legem etiam ante Moysen; nec in Oreb tantum, aut in Sinâ et in Eremo primum, sed antiquiorem, primum in Paradiso, post patriarchis, atque ita ex Judæis certis temporibus reformatam: ut non jam ad Moysis legem ita attendamus, quasi ad principalem legem, sed ad subsequentem quam certo tempore Deus et gentibus exhibuit, et re-promissa per prophetas in melius reformavit:” “The law of God was before Moses, neither given in Horeb nor in Sinai, in the wilderness, nor in the land, but first given in paradise; afterwards to the patriarchs, and then being reformed it was given to the Jews: so that we are not to look after Moses’s law as the principal, but to the law that comes after the law of Moses, which being promised by the prophets, God, in the fulness of time, gave unto the gentiles in the times of reformation.”

10. The effects of this rule in order to conscience are these:

1. That we acknowledge Christ to be our Lord and Master, our Lawgiver and our Teacher.

2. That we understand the ten commandments according to his commentary.

3. That the customs, explications, glosses, and usages of the Jews may not be the limit of our practice.

4. That we expect not justification by our conformity to the decalogue.

5. That we endeavour to go on to perfection; not according to the pattern which Moses, but which Christ showed in the mount.

6. That we do not reckon any system of the natural law, but the books of the New Testament.

7. That we do not esteem it sufficient for us to live according to nature, (as the expression is commonly used,) but that we live according to grace, that is, the measures of reformed nature. For in this sense these words of Justin Martyr are true and useful, τὸ κατὰ φύσιν βιοῦν οὐδέπω πεπιστευκότος ἐστίν, “To live according to nature is the ornament or praise of one, that is yet an unbeliever:” meaning that the disciples of Jesus must do more. For according as the world grows in age, so also it is instructed in wise notices; and it must pass on to glory by all the measures and progressions of grace; and all that law by which we live in all the periods of the world, is nothing else but the several degrees and promotions of the law of nature. For children are governed by one measure, and young men by another, and old men still by a more perfect; and yet the whole is nothing else but right reason drawn into laws, and that which fits our nature bound upon us by the decree of God: some laws fit our natures, as they are common to us and beasts: some fit us as we are next to angels; and some fit us as we are designed to immortality, and the fruition of God; and the laws of nature do grow as our natures do. And as we see it is in matters of speculation, those principles enter into us, or are drawn from their hidden places, in our age, of which we had no sign in our youth; and when we are children, we admire at those things, and call those discourses deep and excellent, which, when we are grown up, we are ashamed of, as being ignorant and pitiful;—so it is in our manners, and so it is in our practical notices; they all grow, till they arrive at their state and period: but because the eternal laws of God,—that is, those laws which are not fitted to times, and persons, and relations, but to the nature of man, that is, to all mankind,—intend to bring us to God and to all that perfection of which we are capable; therefore it is that they also must increase according to the growth of nature: when therefore the nature of man was rude and in its infancy, God drew out of the eternal fountain but a few of these natural laws: but he still superadded more as the world did need them; and at the last by his Son, who, by his incarnation, hath adorned our nature with a robe of glory, hath drawn out all those, by which we are to converse with God and men in the best and greatest intercourses; that he might enable our nature to dispositions proper and immediate to a state of glory. Not but that they all were potentially in the bowels of the great commandments; but that God did not, by any prophets or lawgivers, draw them all forth, till the great day of reformation, at the revelation of the Son of God. But in this the sentence of Irenæus^s is wise and full; “Consummata vitæ præcepta in utroque testamento cum sint eadem, eundem ostenderunt Deum, qui particularia quidem præcepta apta utrisque præceptis, sed eminentiora et summa, sine quibus salvari non potest, in utroque eadem suasit:” “The precepts of perfect life are the same in both Testaments, and do demonstrate the same God of both; who indeed hath given, severally, several instances of commandments; but the more eminent and the chief, without which salvation is not to be had, are the same in both:” meaning, that there are the same general lines of religion and of justice in the Old and in the New; but the special and particular precepts are severally instanced by Christ and Moses.

RULE V.

All the Explications of the moral Law, which are found in the Prophets and other holy Writers of the Old Testament, are to be accounted as Parts of the moral Law, and equally obliging the Conscience.

1. HE that will explicate the Mosaic law according to the perfections of the gospel, does expound the words of a child by the senses and deepest policies of a witty man. I have seen some parts of Virgil changed into impure Fescennines; and I have also seen them changed into the sense and style of the gospel; but Virgil intended neither, though his words were capable of both; and yet the way to understand Virgil is by the commentaries of men of his own time, or nation, or learned in the language and customs of the Romans. So it is in the decalogue of Moses. If christians understand it by all the severities and enlarged notices of the gospel, they accuse their own commentary as too large, or the practice of the Jews, who never obeyed them at that rate; and therefore all those wild reductions of all good and bad to that measure is of no good use, but it is full of error, and may have some ill effects; of which I have already given caution: but then because they may be explicated and can admit a commentary, as all laws do beyond their letter; there is nothing more reasonable, than that the commentaries or additional explications of their own prophets and holy men, and the usages of their nation, be taken into the sacredness of the text and the limits of the commandment.

^r Lib. adv. Jud.

2. Thus when God had said, "Thou shalt do no murder;" when Moses, in another place, adds these words, "Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart;"¹ nor be mindful of an injury: this is to be supposed to be intended by God in the commandment; and to be a just commentary to the text, and therefore part of the moral law. When they were commanded to worship the God of Israel, and no other: this was to be understood according to David's commentary; and when he had composed forms of prayer to God, to pray to him was to be supposed to be a duty of the commandment. God commanded that they should "honour father and mother," which appellative when Moses and the holy writers of the Old Testament had given to princes and magistrates, and had, in another place, expressly commanded obedience to them, it is to be supposed that this is an explication of the fifth commandment.

3. This also is to be extended further, and by the sayings of the prophets they could understand what things were permitted by Moses, which yet God loved not: and that the commandment had a further purpose than their usages would endure: and though (as our blessed Lord afterwards expressed) "Moses permitted divorces for the hardness of their heart,"—yet that "from the beginning it was not so," and that greater piety was intended in the commandment, they were sufficiently taught by the gloss, which God himself inserted and published by the prophet Hosea, "I hate putting away."—In this and all other cases, the natural reasonableness of things, natural justice, and essential piety, and the first institution of them, were the best indications of these effects which such sayings of the prophets and other holy men ought to have in the enlargement of the moral law, or restraint of privileges and liberties.

4. The use of this rule in order to the government of conscience is to describe of what usefulness in our religion, and what influence in our lives, is the Old Testament; all the moral precepts which are particulars of the natural law or universal reason, are either explications of the decalogue or precepts evangelical, by which the old prophets did "prepare the way of our Lord, and make his paths straight." It is the same religion, theirs and ours, as to the moral part: intending glory to the same

God by the same principles of prime reason, differing only in the clarity and obscurity of the promises or motives of obedience, and in the particular instances of the general laws, and in the degrees of duties spiritual: but in both, God intended to bring mankind to eternal glories by religion or the spiritual worshippings of one God, by justice and sobriety, that is, by such ways as naturally we need for our natural and perfective being even in this world. Now, in these things, the prophets are preachers of righteousness, and we may refresh our souls at those rivulets springing from the wells of life, but we must fill and bathe ourselves "in fontibus Salvatoris," "in the fountains of our blessed Saviour;" for he hath anointed our heads, prepared a table for us, and made our cup to overflow, and "of his fulness we have all received, grace for grace."

5. But this is, at no hand, to be extended to those prohibitions or reprehensions of their prevarications of any of the signal precepts of religion, by which, as themselves were distinguished from other nations, so God would be glorified in them. For sometimes the prophets represented the anger of God in a ceremonial instance: when either they sinned with a high hand in that instance, that is, with despite and contempt of the Divine commandment, or when the ceremony had a mixture of morality, or when it was one of the distinctions of the nation, and a consignation of them to be the people of God. But this will be reduced to practice by the next rule.

RULE VI.

Every thing in the Decalogue is not obligatory to Christians, is not a Portion of the moral or natural Law.

I. WHEN Moses delivered the ten commandments to the people, he did not tell them in order which was second, which was fifth: and upon this account they have been severally divided, as men did please to fancy. I shall not clog these annotations with enumerating the several ways of dividing them; but that which relates to the present inquiry is, whether or no the prohibition of graven images be a portion of the first commandment; so as that nothing is intended, but that it be a part or explication of that: and that it contain in it only the duty of confessing one God, and entertaining no other deity, viz. so that images become not an idol, or the final object of our worship as a God; and therefore that images are only forbidden as "Dii alieni," not as the representations of this one God, and they are capable of any worship but that which is proper to God: or else it is a distinct commandment; and forbids the having, or making, and worshipping any images, with any kind of religious worship. These are the several effects, which are designed by the differing divisions of the first table; I will not now examine, whether they certainly follow from their premises and presuppositions; but consider what is right, and what follows from thence in order to the integrating "the rule of conscience." That those two first commandments are but one, was the doctrine of Philo the Jew (at least it is said so); who, making the preface to be a distinct commandment, reckons this to be the second; "Deos sculptiles non facies tibi, nec facies omne abominamentum solis et lunæ, nec omnium quæ sunt supra terram, nec eorum quæ repunt in aquis, ego sum Deus Dominus tuus zelotes," &c.—And the same was followed by Athanasius,^u "This book hath these ten commandments in tables; the first is ἐγώ εἰμι Κύριος ὁ Θεός σου· δευτέρον, οὐ ποιήσεις σεαυτῷ εἰδωλον οὐδὲ παντὸς ὁμοίωμα. 'I am the Lord thy God:' the second, 'thou shalt not make an idol to thyself, nor the likeness of any thing:—' and this division was usual in St. Cyril's^x time, who brings in Julian thus accounting them; "I am the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt: the second after this: 'Non erunt tibi Dii alieni præter me, non facies tibi simulachrum,'" &c. And the same way is followed by St. Jerome^y and Hesychius:^z these make the introduction to be one of the commandments: and those which we call the first and the second, to be the second only.

2. Of the same opinion, as to the uniting of these two, is Clemens Alexandrinus;^a and St. Austin,^b "Et revera quod dictum est, 'non erunt tibi Dii alieni;' hoc ipsum perfectius explicatur, cum prohibentur colenda figmenta: "the prohibition of images is a more perfect explication of those words, 'Thou shalt have no other gods but me.'"—To the same sense Venerable Bede,^c St. Bernard,^d the ordinary gloss, Lyra, Hugo Cardinalis, Lombard, the church of Rome, and almost all the Lutheran churches, do divide the decalogue.

3. On the other side, these are made to be two distinct commandments by the Chaldee paraphrast,^e and by Josephus;^f "Primum præceptum, Deum esse unum, et hunc solum colendum. Secundum, nullius animalis simulachrum adorandum."—And these are followed by Origen,^g Gregory Nazianzen,^h St. Ambrose, and St. Jerome,ⁱ even against his opinion expressed in another place,—St. Chrysostom, St. Austin, or whosoever is the author of the questions of the Old and New Testament, Sulpitius Severus, Zonaras; and admitted as probable by Venerable Bede; but followed earnestly by all the churches that follow Calvin; and by the other protestants, not Lutherans.

4. In this great contrariety of opinion, that which I choose to follow, is the way of the church of England; which as it hath the greater and more certain authority from antiquity, so it hath much the greater reasonableness. For when God had commanded the worship of himself alone, excluding all false gods,—in the next words he was pleased also to forbid them to worship him in that manner, by which all the gods of the nations were worshipped, which was, by images: insomuch that their images were called gods, not that they thought them so; but that the worshipping of false gods, and worshipping by images, were by the idolaters ever joined.

Now this being a different thing from the other, one regarding the object, the other the manner of worship,—it is highly reasonable to believe that they make two commandments. 2. God would not be worshipped by an image, because none could be made of him; and therefore it is remarkable that God did duplicate his caution against images of him, by adding this reason to his precept, "Remember that ye saw no shape, but only heard a voice:" which as it was a direct design of God, that they might not make an image of him, and so worship him as the idolaters did their false gods, so it did, indirectly at least, intimate to them, that "God would be worshipped in spirit and truth;" that is, not with a lying image: as every image of him must needs be: for it can have no truth, when a finite body represents an infinite spirit. And this is most likely to be thus: because this being a certain digest of the law of nature, in it the natural religion and worship of God was to be commanded, and therefore that it should be spiritual and true, that is, not with false imaginations and corporal representment, was to be the matter of a commandment. 3. Since the first table did so descend to particulars as by a distinct precept to appoint the day of his worship; it is not unlikely that the essential and natural manner of doing it should also be distinctly provided for, since the circumstantial was: but that could not be at all, if it was a portion of the first commandment; for then the sense of it must be according to the first intention, that images should not become our gods. 4. The heathens did not suppose their images to be their gods, but representments of their gods; and therefore it is not so likely that God should, by way of caution, so explicate the first commandment; when there was no danger of doing any such thing; unless they should be stark mad, or fools, and without understanding. 5. When God forbade them to make and worship the likeness of any thing in heaven and earth,—he sufficiently declared, that his meaning was to forbid that manner of worshipping, not that object; for by saying it was "the likeness of something," it declared that this likeness could not be the object of their worshipping; for because it is the image of a thing, therefore it is not the thing they worshipped; and it cannot be supposed of a man, that he can make the image of the sun to be his God, when he makes that image of the sun, because he thinks the sun is the most excellent thing. When, therefore, in the first commandment, he had forbidden them to acknowledge the sun, or any thing else but himself, to be God,—in the next, he forbids the worshipping himself or any thing else by an image. But of this I shall speak more afterwards; because it relates to the moral duty.

5. But I observe, that all those moderns who confound these two commandments, have not that pretence which the ancients had; and have quitted all that by which such confusion could have been, in any sense, tolerable. For Philo, and those ancients who followed him, reckon the first commandment to be, "I am the Lord thy God," &c.; by which God would be acknowledged to be the Lord: and the second did forbid "any other besides him." So that there might be some appearance of reason to make the first commandment affirmative, and the second negative; the first to declare who is God; the second to forbid polytheism: the first to declare his entity; the second, to publish his unity: the first to engage their duty to him who had so lately endeared them by freedom from captivity; the second to forbid the adopting the gods of the nations with whom they were now to converse. I confess that these reasons are not sufficient; for they multiply where there is no need, and make a division without difference; and leave all those periods, which are about images, to be of no use, no signification; and concerning their own practice and religion in the matter of images, though it is certain they wholly derived it from the commandment, yet they take no notice of any warrant at all derived from thence; but supposing that they did make the division for these reasons, and that these reasons were good, yet all the moderns quit all this pretension, and allow but three commandments to the first table, and divide the second into seven; to effect which they make two commandments against concupiscence: concerning which I will not say they might have reckoned more according to the multiplication of the objects; four as well as two: but this I say, as it is wholly without necessity, and very destitute of any probability, so it is done against the very order of words. For although Moses, in Deuteronomy, reckons the concupiscence of the wife first, yet in Exodus, which is the copy of the decalogue as it was given, Moses reckons the concupiscence of the house first: so that the ninth commandment lies in the body of the tenth; and the tenth lies part of it before the ninth, and part of it after: which is a prejudice against it greater than can be outweighed by any or all the pretences, which are or can be made for it: especially since, by the opinions of the Roman doctors, these two cannot, as they lie here, make two objects: for to covet another man's wife, is the same as to covet another man's servant, that is, as a possession; for multitude of wives was great riches, and the peculiar of princes, as appears in Nathan's upbraiding David, and the case of Solomon: but to covet the wife "propter libidinem," is forbidden by the seventh commandment, as the Roman doctors teach, and under that they handle it. Therefore the wife, and the servant, and the beast of another man, being here forbidden to be desired as matter of covetousness, make but one object, and consequently but one commandment: and if because a difference can be fancied, the wife and the house make two objects, then the servant makes a third; for a house differs from a wife no more than a servant from a house; the use of these is as different as of those, and can make as distinct objects of appetite and desire; and therefore, either they all must make but one commandment, or they must make more than two.

6. But the church of Rome and the Lutherans have several interests, for other reasons they have none in so doing. The church of Rome confounds the two commandments, lest the worshipping of images should appear to be forbidden. For if it be a distinct commandment which forbids the worship of images,—then, because all false objects of worship are sufficiently forbidden in the first, it will not be a competent answer to say, "we do not worship images as gods, we do not make idols of them;"—for to worship any thing as God is not forbidden in the second commandment, but in the first: but, therefore, lest the second commandment should signify nothing, it follows, that the taking of images into religion, or the worshipping God, whether true or false, by an image, is there forbidden. But if these two commandments were one, then they suppose that this of forbidding images, being a pursuance of the prohibition of having any other gods, expounds itself only to mean, the making images to be God; which because they do not, they hope to stand upright in the scrutiny concerning this commandment.

7. But to this I return this account: that although it be certain that if these commandments be divided, it will follow that this manner of religion by image-worship is particularly forbidden as a false manner of worshipping, and consequently is, upon no pretence, to be introduced into religion; yet if we should suppose them to be but one commandment, it will not follow that images are not forbidden to be used in religious worshippings. For if God forbade them to make "deos sculptiles," "engraven gods," that is, to worship such gods as may be depicted or engraven, such as the sun and moon, Apis and Jupiter; the ox of Egypt, or the fire of Persia; then, by the same reason, we conclude that "deus sculptilis" is no god, and therefore, to make the God of Israel to be a god depicted or engraven, does dishonour and depress him to the manner of an idol. For, therefore, in the decalogue recited by Philo, and in the sense of all the ancients, the reason against making an engraven god is, "Ego sum Deus tuus zelotes," "I am thy God, I am thy jealous God;" that is, "I who cannot be represented by such vanities, I am thy God,—but they are not, who can."—Add to this; that since the doctors of the Roman church make the decalogue to be the fountain of all moral theology, and, by that method, describe all cases of conscience; it is necessary that they take into the body and obligation of every commandment not only what is expressed in the letter and first signification, but the species, the relations, the similitudes, the occasions, any thing that is like the prohibition, and concerning which we cannot tell whether it be or no; and upon this account, if they can retain images, or think to honour God by the use and worshipping of them, they may be confident of any thing, and may as well use some pollutions of the flesh, as such pollutions of idols.

8. But there is also more in it than thus. For although it is usually supposed by learned persons, that Philo the Jew, Athanasius, St. Jerome, and St. Austin, are of opinion that the two commandments are not to be divided, but are all one; yet if we look into their sayings, we shall find them to have other effects than they suppose. For they, making the preface to be the first commandment, "I am the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt," do suppose, that the object of religion and Divine worship is sufficiently declared, in that they think the same of that as all other men do of the following words: "Thou shalt have no other gods but me;" viz. that God, proposing himself as their God, whom only they were to worship, did by that sufficiently exclude the worship of all false gods, or giving Divine worship to any thing besides himself: so that, when the object is sufficiently provided for, as it is in the first commandment, however it be computed, the former arguments will return upon them, and it will be most probable, that the next provision be made for the manner of the Divine worship; and then the use of images in religion, and the religious worship of them, will be, by a necessary and immediate consequent, forbidden: for the forbidding "deos sculptiles,"—forbids not only other gods; but forbids them with that reason and demonstration. They that can be engraven or painted, are no gods, and therefore images and false gods are equally forbidden; wherever an image is joined to a god, there is a false god, or no true God: for an image and the true God are inconsistent. So that, wherever there are two commandments before that of taking God's name in vain, as it is amongst all the ancients, (Clement Alexandrinus only excepted,)—there it is most likely, that the first provides for the object of Divine worship affirmatively, and the second for the manner negatively; and the effect of this will be, that they are, in their division of the decalogue, almost wholly destitute of authority or warrant from the ancients, for they all make four commandments in the first table, at least. The Jews usually indeed did reckon five: taking in that of honouring our parents, but they always made that of the sabbath to be the fourth: by all which it must needs be, that they must lie under the same objection, which they would fain avoid: and though they confound those two which we usually now reckon the two first, yet because the Jews and ancient christians who reckoned otherwise, did account one commandment to the same purpose as we reckon the first; that which follows can never be proved to mean any thing but a prohibition of that manner of Divine worship by images: for it implies, that to worship God by an image, is to worship an idol: an image of God, when it is worshipped, is an idol, for neither can the true God have an image, neither will he be worshipped by an image. Now, though this will not at all concern the images of saints, but only the worship of God by an image, yet even this also, when they think this image-worship shall be a worshipping and honouring of God indirectly, and an act pleasing to him, will come under this commandment, as certainly and more apparently than fornication or intemperance shall come under the sixth or seventh; whither their doctors usually reduce them.

9. This thing more I am willing to add concerning the division of the decalogue: that when the ancients did reckon the preface or introduction to be the first commandment; it is not certain that they put the words of "Thou shalt have no other gods but me" to the second. For as for Philo, he does not recite them at all, but reckons the second otherwise than it is in Moses's books; and it is not certain, how he thought in this question, to him that well considers his copy of the decalogue. For he thus begins: "I am the Lord thy God, who brought thee out of the land of Egypt. Thou shalt not make any graven gods to thyself; nor any abomination of sun and moon: nor of any thing that is on the earth, or that creeps in the waters: I am thy Lord, the jealous God," &c. Now in this, which is first and which is second, is plain enough, though Philo does not number them: but whether the words of that, which we call the first commandment, by him are understood in the first or in the second, does not hence appear. But then for St. Athanasius, whom the adversaries reckon theirs, the case is yet clearer against them; for "I am the Lord thy God," he reckons to be the first, omitting all that which follows until the second commandment: but the second he plainly and perfectly reckons as we do, "Thou shalt not make to thyself an idol, or graven image, nor the likeness of any thing." So that it is probable, he begins the first commandment with the preface; but it is certain he reckons the second as we do. St. Jerome and St. Austin are pretended for them; but they also testify against them, and against themselves, by an uncertain and contradictory sentence, as I have showed; indeed the apostate Julian is much more for them, and does confound those which we call the two commandments, but yet reckons one before them, just as Philo: so that, excepting Julian, there will be found in antiquity "vel duo vel nemo," scarce one or two that is on their side. However against them there is a great authority and very great probabilities of reason; of which, in the following periods, I shall add a more full account: in the mean time, as the church of Rome is destitute of any just ground of their manner of dividing the ten commandments, so they will find, it will not serve that interest they have designed.

10. But then for the Lutheran churches, they have, indeed, as little reason for their division, and a much less interest and necessity to serve and provide for. They, therefore, thrust the second into the first, lest it should be unlawful to make or to have pictures or images; for they still keep them in their churches, and are fearful to be aspersed with a crime forbidden in the second commandment; they keep them, I say, but for memory only, not for worship or direct religion. But in this they are more afraid than hurt. For suppose the second commandment to be distinct and wholly against images and their worship; yet every thing in the commandment is not moral, though the commandment itself be. For God was pleased to appoint such temporary instruments of a moral duty as were fitted to the necessities of that people; but such instruments were but like temporary supporters, placed there but till the building could stand alone. But whether this clause of having or making images be referred to the first or to the second commandment, it is all one: if to the first, it means, that therefore they are not to be made by them, lest they become the object of Divine worship: if to the second, then they were not to be made, lest they become instruments of a false manner of the Divine worship: but in both, the prohibition is but relative, as appears in the parallel places of Levit. xix. 4. but especially Levit. xxvi. 1. "Ye shall make ye no idols, nor graven image, neither rear ye up a standing image, neither shall ye set up any image of stone in your land, (to bow down unto it,) for I am the Lord your God:" by which it is plain, that the prohibition is not terminated on the image, but referring to religion; and is of the same nature as the forbidding them to converse with idolaters, or to make marriages with them; which God himself expressed to be, lest they learn their evil customs; and all the reason of the world tells us, that such clauses, whose whole reason is relative and instrumental, may be supplied by other instruments, and the reason of them or their necessity may cease, and consequently there can be no part of a natural law, whose reason, without a miracle and the change of nature, can never alter. So that this fear of theirs being useless, they may, without prejudice and interest, follow that which is more reasonable. And this was sufficiently indicated by the act and words of God himself, who gave order for the brazen serpent to be made, and the images, or rather hieroglyphics, of cherubim to be set over the propitiatory;^k which it is not to be supposed he would have done, if it had been against his own eternal law: he suffered them not to worship them, but to make them, to show that this was not against the moral part of the commandment, though that was: and the ark could endure the five golden mice and the five golden emerods, because though they were images, yet they were not idols, that is, were not intended for worship; but because Dagon was, it fell before the ark; that could not be suffered: and in Solomon's temple, beside the pomegranates and other imagery, there were twelve brazen bulls; but they were not intended for worship, and therefore, it was free to the Jews to use them or not: but the calves of Dan and Bethel, because they were "fusiles dei," graven images used in Divine worship, were an abomination; and upon the shekel of the sanctuary was impressed the image of Aaron's rod and a pot of manna, or thurible; it was lawful, while there was no danger of worshipping them.

11. This, then, is the first instance of the rule: the having or making of images, though it be forbidden to the Jews in the second commandment, yet it is not unlawful to christians. But of this I shall say more in the following periods.

12. Now concerning the religion of images, that is, worshipping God by them directly or indirectly, —whether that be lawful to christians; although I have sufficiently declared the negative already, by reproving the great ground of that practice, I mean, the thrusting the two commandments together, and have proved that they ought not to be so confounded; or if they ought, yet that the worship of images is not concluded from thence to be lawful or permitted, yet I hope it will be neither useless nor unpleasant, if I determine this case upon its proper grounds, in these two inquiries: 1. Whether it be lawful to make a picture or image of God? 2. Whether it be lawful to worship God by a picture?

Quest. Whether it be lawful to make a picture or image of God?

13. I answer negatively: and that upon the plain words of God in Deuteronomy, which, upon the account of the fifth rule, are to be accounted as an explication of the moral law, and therefore, obligatory to christians: as relating to the matter of the commandment, giving a natural reason for a natural duty, and pursuing that with argument, which before he had established with authority, and writing that in the tables of the heart, which at first he delivered to Moses in tables of stone.^l "Take ye therefore good heed unto yourselves; for ye saw no manner of similitude in the day when the Lord spake unto you in mount Horeb out of the midst of the fire: lest ye corrupt yourselves and make you a graven image, the similitude of any figure, the likeness of male or female," &c. Now why did God so earnestly remind them that they saw no image, but because he would not have them make any of him? And this is frequently pressed by God in that manner, which shows it not only to be impious to do it against his commandment, but foolish, and impossible, and against all natural reason. "To whom will ye liken God? or what likeness will ye compare unto him?" said God by the prophet:^m meaning, that there is none, there can be none: and you may as well measure eternity with a span, and grasp an infinite in the palm of your hand, as draw the circles and depict him that hath no colour or figure, no parts nor body, no accidents nor visibility. And this St. Paul argued out of Aratus;

Καὶ τοῦ μὲν γένος ἐσμὲν.

"We are his offspring:" that is, we are made after his image and similitude; Christ is the prototype, and we are efformed after his image who is "the first-born of all creatures:" man is made after the likeness of God; not man in his body, but man in his soul, in his will and powers of choice, in his understanding and powers of discerning, in his memory and powers of recording; and he that cannot make the image of a will, or by a graven image represent the understanding of a man, must never hope to make any thing like God: there is no way to do that, but to make a man; and that although it be but an imperfect image of God, yet an image it is, and the best that is upon the earth. But now from hence the apostle argues,ⁿ "Forasmuch then as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone graven by art and man's device:" If the invisible, inexpressible part of man is the image of God, and we are his sons by creation, expressing in our souls some little things of his infinite perfection, it cannot be supposed, that this image can make an image like God; and, if it cannot be like him, it is not to be made for him; for nothing is more unlike him than a lie. The Athenians were a dull people, and knew not how to answer St. Paul's argument; but we are, now-a-days, taught to escape from this. For it is said, that it is true,—God's essence cannot be depicted or engraven; but such representations, by which he hath been pleased to communicate notices of himself, can as well be described with a pencil as with a pen, and as well set down, so that idiots may read and understand as well as the learned clerks. Now because God was pleased to appear to Daniel like "the ancient of days," and the Holy Ghost in the shape of "a dove," and Christ in the form of "a man," these representations may be depicted and described by images without disparagement to the divinity of God.

14. To these I give these answers: 1. The vision of Daniel seeing "the Ancient of days," tells of no shape, nothing like an old man; but by that phrase did seem to signify the eternal God; he tells of a head and hair like "pure wool," that is, pure and white, one of the synonyma of light or brightness, like that of his garment, "like snow; his wheels were a burning fire, his throne a fiery flame;" that is, in effect, when Daniel was asleep, he had a vision or fantasm in his head: where he had a representment of the eternal God, in a circumfusion and a great union of light and glory, which he, when he was awake, expressed by metaphors imperfectly telling what fantasm that was, in which he perceived the representment and communication of God; that is, he there set down the shadow of a dream of a bright shining cloud: for the metaphor is a shadow, and his vision was a dream, and what he dreamt he saw, was but the investiture of God; like as when God, by his angel, went in a cloud of fire before the sons of Israel; nay, not so much, for that was really so,—this but a prophetic ecstasy in his sleep: the images of which are but very unfit to establish a part of Divine worship, and an article of practice, against natural reason and the letter of a commandment. But, 2. I demand, whether did Daniel see the eternal God then or no? If he did not, then, at the most, it was but an angel of light in the place of God: and then this can never infer the lawfulness of making any image of God, for it was only God's angel, or a globe of glory instead of God, and not God that appeared in his own person. But if it be said he did see God, it apparently contradicts the scripture: "No man hath seen God at any time:" and again, "the eternal God, whom no man hath seen or can see."° The issue then is this,—Daniel did not see God the Father, neither could he: therefore God the Father was not represented to him by any visible species: therefore neither can we, by any help or authority from this dream. And it is not sufficient to say, that though Daniel did not see God's essence, yet he saw the representment; for he did not see any representment of God; he did not see God by any thing that expressed his person: for as for essences, no man can see the essence of a bee or a bird; but sees it by some proper representment, but yet by that representment he properly and truly sees the bird: but Daniel did no way see God's person or nature, not so much as by any fantasm or image: an angel of light, or the brightness of an angel, he might dream of in the ecstasy: but in no sense could he be said to see God, except only by his angel or ambassador. So that when it is said, "No man can see God," it cannot be meant, that God's essence cannot be seen; for this had said no great matter; for no essence can be seen; but it must mean that God "dwells in an inaccessible light, whither no man can approach," out of which he will send no emissions of representment or visibility; for, if he had so done at any time, or would do at all,—it were not true, "that no man had seen him, or could see him:" for if he had communicated himself personally in any representment or visibility, then he had been seen, and in that instance, and at that time he were not the invisible God. 3. Suppose Daniel's vision had been of God himself: yet as it was done to him by special favour, so it was for a special purpose; it was for a design of prophecy, and to declare future events in the matters of war and peace; not to establish a practice prejudicial to a commandment: and it is strange that a vision or night's dream, expressed by way of rapture and clouds of metaphor, communicated to one man, signifying uncertainly, told imperfectly after the manner of raptures and prophetic ecstasies, intended to very distant purposes, never so extended by his own nation, or used to any such end, should yet prevail with christians (who are, or ought to be, infinitely removed from such a childish religion and baby tricks) more than an express commandment, and natural and essential reason, and the practice both of all the Jews and the best christians. There is nothing in the world, though never so bad, but by witty and resolved men may have more colours laid upon it, to set it out, than this can from this pretension. 4. The vision itself, if it were expressed in picture as it is set down, would be a most strange production of art, and a horrid representation of nature; and unless something were supposed which is not expressed, it would be a strange new nothing. For "the Ancient of days" does, by no violence, signify an old man; for it being a representment of eternity, is the worst of all expressed by an old man; for that which is old, is ready to vanish away; and nothing is more contrary to eternity. Again, here is no mention of the appearance of a man. There is, indeed, mention of a "head," but neither of man nor beast, bird nor fly, expressed; and hair like "pure wool," but in what it is like, excepting only the purity, is not told, nor can be imagined: after this there is nothing but "a throne of flames and wheels of fire;" and all this together would make a strange image, a metaphor to express eternity,—a head of I know not what, light without substance,—visibility without a figure,—a top without a bottom,—the whiteness of wool instead of the substance of hair,—and a seat upon wheels,—and all in flames and fire : that it should ever enter into the head or heart of an instructed man to think that the great, the immense, the invisible, the infinite God of heaven, that fills heaven, and earth, and hell, should be represented in image or picture by such a thing, by such a nothing, is as strange and prodigious as the combination of all the daughters of fear, and sleep, and ignorance. 5. After this vision of Daniel, it was, in the church of the Jews, esteemed as unlawful as ever to make an image of God ; and by this the primitive christians did not believe a warrant or confidence could be taken to do any thing of that nature : and they that, now-a-days, think otherwise, have a new understanding and a new religion, defying a commandment, and walking by a dream : and are such, whom a precept cannot draw, but they follow what they understand not, and what was not intended to conduct their religion, but to signify only the events and great changes of the world. 6. If because mention is made of “the Ancient of days” in Daniel, it were lawful to picture God like an old man, we might as well make a door, and say it is Christ,—or a vine, and call it our master,—or a thief, and call it the day of judgment :—a metaphorical or mystical expression may be the veil of a mysterious truth, but cannot pass into a sign and signification of it ; itself may become an hieroglyphic, when it is painted, but not an image, which is a μορφή εἰδουδς, and the most proper representation of any thing that can be seen, and is not present. They that paint a child to signify eternity, do it better than they who, by an old man, signify him that can be no older to-morrow than he was yesterday. But by this I only intend to note the imprudence and indecency of the thing : the unlawfulness is upon other accounts, which I have reckoned.

15. Concerning the humanity of our Saviour, that being a creature he might be depicted, I mean it was naturally capable of it ; it was the great instrument of many actions, it conversed with mankind above thirty years together, it was the subject of great changes, and the matter of a long story, and the conduit of many excellent instructions ; and therefore might without all question be described, as well as Cæsar’s, or Meletius, Mark Antony, or the kings of the gentiles. It might be done ; and the question being here only of the making or having of it, abstractedly from all other appendages or collateral considerations, I need say no more of it under this title ; but that it is neither impious nor unreasonable of itself, to have or to make the picture or image of Christ’s humanity, or rather of his human body. For against this there is neither reason nor religion, and if it be made accidentally unlawful, that is not of present consideration.

16. But for the usual image of the Holy Ghost in the form of a dove, the pretence is great and fair ; no less than the words of Scripture. For in this instance, that reason ceases, for which God did prohibit the making of his image : for here they did not only hear a voice, but also they saw a shape ; for the Holy Ghost descended in the likeness of a dove ; ἐν σωματικῷ εἶδει, “in a bodily shape.” So St. Luke. To this I answer, that the Holy Ghost did not appear in the shape of a dove at all ; but the dove, mentioned in the story, relates only to the manner of his descending, and hovering over Christ. And this, 1. appears by the words in St. Matthew, εἶδε τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ Θεοῦ καταβαῖνον ὡσεὶ περιστερὰν, he saw the Spirit of God “descending like a dove,” that is, as doves use to descend, hovering and overshadowing of him. 2. The word ὡσεὶ, which signifies an imperfect resemblance, or a limited similitude, does not infer the direct shape of a dove : but something of it ; the motion or the quantity, the hovering or the lighting, like that of his appearance on the day of Pentecost : cloven tongues, ὡσεὶ πυρὸς, “as it were of fire ;”^p that is, something of it ; to shine, it may be,—but not to burn ; to appear bright, but not to move. 3. This appears yet more plainly in the words of St. Luke, καὶ καταβῆναι τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον σωματικῷ εἶδει, ὡσεὶ περιστερὰν ἐπ’ αὐτόν. “The Holy Ghost did descend in a bodily shape, as a dove upon him ;” where the “bodily shape,” cannot mean the bodily shape of a dove, for then it must have been ὡσεὶ περιστερᾶς, “as of a dove,” like that of the Acts, ὡσεὶ πυρὸς ; but it must wholly be referred to καταβῆναι : he “descended” as a dove uses to do : but then for σωματικὸν εἶδος, “the bodily shape,” it was nothing but a body of light ; the greatest visibility, called by the apostle,^q μεγαλοπρεπὴς δόξα, “the excellent glory :” which, indeed, was the usual investiture of God’s messengers in their appearances and visibilities ; and that there appeared a fire in Jordan at that time, Justin Martyr against Tryphon the Jew affirms expressly. 4. That this similitude was relative to the motion, or the manner, of a dove’s descent, is so much the more probable, because this acception and understanding of it is more agreeable to the design and purpose of the Holy Ghost’s descending. For by “flying” the Jews did use, in their symbolical theology, to signify a Divine influx or inspiration, saith Rabbi Jaccai, upon the ninth of Daniel : the descent, therefore, of the Holy Ghost, in the manner of a dove’s flight, signifies the gift of the Spirit of God to his holy Son ; who received him not by measures, but the fulness of him : and from his fulness we all receive our portions.

17. I cannot deny but that, amongst learned men, there is a great difference of apprehension concerning it ; and the generality of men, without examining it, suppose the Holy Ghost to have descended, being invested with the direct shape of a dove ; ἐπελθόντος ἐν εἶδει περιστερᾶς πνεύματος, so Justin Martyr : for he expresses the words otherwise than all the four evangelists ; they all say, ὡσεὶ περιστερὰν, meaning, “as a dove descends ;” he changes the case, and makes it to be the shape or “form of a dove ;” φάσμα ὄρνιθος, so Origen calls it ; “the phantasm or appearance of a bird ;—yet I will for the present suppose it so, because the ancients did generally believe so. But then I answer to the objection, That, 1. although the ancients did suppose it so—yet, in the sixth council, that at Constantinople,^r it is expressly forbidden to depict Christ like a lamb, or the Holy Spirit like a dove. 2. Suppose the fancy of the ancients to have some reality in it, yet it amounted to no more than this, it was nothing but a light of fire effigiated into such a resemblance; or, like a bright cloud which represents strange figures imperfectly, any thing according to the heart or fancy of them that behold it; and therefore is not so imitable, as if it were a direct and proper appearance: so the gospel of the Nazarenes expresses it, καὶ εὐθὺς περιέλαμψε τὸν τόπον φῶς μέγα, “presently a great light did shine round about the place;”—and their apprehension of a dazzling light in such a resemblance, is but an ill warrant to make a standing figure and proper imagery. 3. Tertullian¹ supposes, it was really and properly a very dove indeed; and if so, the whole business is at an end: for any dove may be pictured, but the Holy Ghost must not be pictured in that shape, though his errand and design was ministered to by a dove. 4. And that, indeed, is the proper and full solution of this objection. Supposing that the shape of a dove did appear, yet this no way represented him, or was to be used as a sign of him: and therefore it is observable, when God^u had told the Baptist how he should know the Messiah, and that the Holy Ghost should consign and signify him,—he makes no mention of a dove, but of descending only; not only plainly intimating that the mention of a dove was for the similitude of motion, not of shape, but also to signify that the Holy Ghost himself was not at all to be represented as a dove. But then, if there was the shape of a dove, as the ancients suppose, it looks downwards, not upwards, and was a symbol not to signify any thing of the divinity or the personality of the Holy Spirit; but to signify something in Christ, or in Christ’s body the church, to represent the excellency and sweetness of Christ and of the church,^x his perfection and our duty, the state of his institution and of our religion, and so they who thus teach of the apparition of a dove, express the symbol. The dove was to represent that great meekness which was in Christ, and which he would insert into his institution, as no small part of a christian’s duty; which our blessed Saviour was pleased also to express^y in the same similitude, “be as harmless as doves.” Philo says that, in the Jews’ discipline, a dove signifies wisdom, that is, a good, a wise, a gentle, and debonair comportment, not the severity of retirement, and a philosophical life, but of a civil, sweet, and obliging conversation. Some say, that this dove did relate to that dove which signified to Noah, by an olive-branch of peace, that God was again reconciled to the world; and so did it please God to use the like symbol, when he would signify that reconciliation, which was by Christ to be effected, and of which the other was but a weak representation, and type, or figure. The world was now also to be renewed at the appearance of this dove; but, because this no way relates to the person or the nature of the Holy Ghost, it can no way hence be inferred, that the Holy Ghost may be represented by an image. This apparition, if it was at all, was symbolical of something below, not representative of any thing above: and in that sense, and to that purpose, I do not doubt but it may be lawful to make a picture of the dove that was seen, if, I say, it was at all; and of the fiery tongues sitting upon the apostles; for these were not representative of the nature or person of the Holy Ghost, but descriptive of the impression, that from the Holy Ghost was made upon them; and of this nature is the expression of the Baptist: “He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire;” that is, from his baptism, or by his immission, you shall receive graces and gifts, whose effect is properly expressed by fire, which also shall be its symbol.

18. And after all this, if it should please God, any person of the blessed and most holy Trinity should appear in any visible shape, that shape might be depicted, of that shape an image might be made; I mean, it might naturally, it might if it were done for lawful ends, and unless a commandment were to the contrary; and, therefore, so long as God keeps himself within the secret recesses of his sanctuary, and the majesty of his invisibility, so long it is plain he intends the very first sense and words of his commandment: but, if he should cancel the great reason of his commandment, and make that, by an act of his own, to become possible, which, in the nature of things, is impossible,—that is, that an image can be made of God; I should believe that God did intend to dispense in that part of the commandment, and declare that he intended it only for a temporary band. For if the reason of the commandment were taken away, either the commandment also ceases to oblige, or must be bound upon us by another reason, or a new sanction, or, at least, a new declaration; or else it would follow, that then his visible appearance would become a snare to mankind. But because he hath not yet appeared visibly, and hath by no figure or idea represented the Godhead; and that it is a truth, which must last as long as christian religion lasts, that “No man can see God,”—therefore it follows, that it is at no hand lawful to make an image of God, or relating to the Divinity. If a dove be made, it must not be intended to represent the Holy Ghost; for besides that no dove did appear,^z nor shape of a dove,—yet, if it did, it related not to the person of the Holy Ghost, but to the impression made upon the person on whom the light descended. And if the figure of the crucifix be made, or of Jesus in the flesh, it is wholly relative to the creature, not to him as God; for that is impious, and unreasonable, and impossible to be done in any natural proportion.

And the like also is to be said of those expressions in Scripture of the "hand" of God, his "eye," his "arm;" which words, although they are written, yet they cannot, ought not, to be painted. I do not doubt but it is lawful to paint or engrave an eye, or a hand, but not an eye or hand of God, that is, we may not intend to represent God by such sculpture or picture, because the Scripture does not speak them to that end,—that by them we may conceive any thing of God: for, as Hesselius^a well notes, these and other like expressions are intended to represent some action of God; such as is that of David,^b who brings in God, "excitatum tanquam dormientem, tanquam potentem crapulatum à circo:" "awakened out of sleep, and as a giant refreshed,—filled, gorged,—with wine;" by which if any man shall represent God in picture,—his saying, "it may as well be painted as written," will not acquit him from insufferable impiety.

19. Now this which I have discoursed, is evidently according to the doctrine and practice both of the Jews and primitive christians. Concerning the Jews Tacitus says of them, "Mente solâ, unumque numen intelligunt: profanos qui Deum imagines mortalibus materiis in species hominum effingunt." "They acknowledge but one Deity, whom they understand in their mind only; esteeming all them to be profane, who efform the images of their gods of corruptible matter into the shapes of men." And the testimony of St. Clemens^d of Alexandria, is very full to this purpose: "Deum, ex Mosis disciplinâ, nec hominis effigie, nec ullâ aliâ representari;" "God, by the law of Moses, was not to be represented in the shape of a man, or any other figure;" and for the christians, that they also understood themselves to be bound by the same law, to the same religious abstaining from making of images of God, is openly and generally taught by the doctors of the christian church for the four first ages together; as without scruple appears in the express words of Origen,^e Tertullian,^f Eusebius,^g Athanasius,^h St. Jerome,ⁱ St. Austin,^k Theodoret,^l Damascen,^m and the synod of Constantinople, as is reported in the sixth action of the second Nicene council; the sense of all which, together with his own, Polydore Virgilⁿ thus represents: "Cum Deus ubique præsens sit, nihil à principio post homines natos stultius visum est, quam ejus simulacrum pingere;" "Since the world began, never was any thing more foolish than to picture God, who is present every where:" for this is (according to the sharp reproof of the apostle) "to change the glory of the incorruptible God into the similitude, ἐν ὁμοιώματι εἰκόνας, (so it is in the Greek,^o) of an image of a corruptible man, and of birds and beasts," &c., than which words nothing can be plainer to condemn the picturing God: a thing which the very heathens did abominate.

Sed nulla effigies, simulacraque nota deorum said Silius Italicus of the temple of Cadiz; "they had no images, no pictures of the gods; but the house was filled with majesty and a holy fear." And this they did not of ignorance, nor of custom, but out of reason and wise discourse. When Seneca entreated his friend Lucilius to make himself worthy of God, he tells him how: "Finget autem non auro, non argento: non potest ex hac materiâ imago Dei fingi similis;" "Not with gold and silver; for of these an image like to God can never be made."—And therefore Tacitus says of the Germans, that they "nec cohibere parietibus deos, neque in ullam humani oris speciem assimilare, ex agnitione cœlestium arbitrantur;" "they think they do not know the nature of the gods, if they should thrust them into walls, or depict them in the resemblance of a man or woman."—"Nullum simulacrum finxisse antiquitatem," said Macrobius.^p "The old world never made an image," (meaning of God,) "Quia summus Deus nataque ex eo mens, sicut ultra animam, ita supra naturam sunt, quo nihil fas est de fabulis pervenire;" "because the supreme God, and the mind that is born of him, as it is beyond our soul, so it is beyond all nature, and it is not fit that fables and fictions should be addressed to him."

Nulla auri effigies, nulli commissa metallo,

20. The next question is of greater effect; and though the answer of it must needs be concluded from the former, yet because it hath some considerations of its own, and proper arguments, it is worth a short inquiry.

Ques. Whether it be lawful for christians to worship God by an image?

21. Concerning which the best ground of resolution is the commandment; which, it is certain, the church of the Jews did understand so, that they accounted it idolatry to worship God in any image whatsoever; thus the Israelites were idolaters when they made the golden calf, for so they proclaimed, These are thy gods, O Israel, who brought thee out of the land of Egypt; and to-morrow is a solemnity to Jehovah," said Aaron. The calf they intended as an image of their God, and by it they intended to worship him; which is not improbable, says Bellarmine; which is certainly true, said Ferus;^q and which is affirmed by the Spirit of God; "they changed their glory into the similitude of a calf that eateth hay;" that is, they represented God, who was their glory, by a golden calf. And concerning Mical,^r though his mother made an image, yet that it was for the worshipping of the God of Israel, appears in all the story; for upon this account he hoped that the Lord would bless him, he took a Levite for his priest, he asked council of the Lord; yet these also he called his gods, which were but the images of God,—by which it appears that he was an idolater, because he worshipped the true God by an image, which he had forbidden. The same was the case of Gideon, who made a covenant with them, that God should be their King; yet he made an ephod; that is, instituted a forbidden service to him; which thing became a snare to his house; and being a prevarication of this commandment, was, in its nature, an idolatrous worship; and yet it was but a superstitious or false worship of the true God: and this is affirmed by the christian doctors. "Non vult Deus in lapidibus coli," said St. Ambrose;^a "God will not be worshipped in stones or graven images:"—and St. Austin^t affirms, that God in his commandment did prohibit, "ne quis colat ullam imaginem Dei nisi unam eandem quæ cum ipso est Christus;" "that we should worship no image of God but him that is the lively image of his person, that is, Jesus Christ:"—and this is so affirmed by all the fathers, so confirmed by the doctrine and practice of the church, so adhered to by all the doctors of the Jews, that Vasquez finds himself constrained to confess, "clare deducitur, non licuisse tum verum Deum in aliquâ imagine venerari;" "it is clearly consequent, that then it was not lawful to worship the true God in any image or representation."

22. But it is said, that though it was not then, yet now it is: for that was only a temporary precept, relative to the Jews, because of their proneness to idolatry. So Catharinus^u affirms, "totum hoc præceptum esse positivum, non morale;" "This whole commandment is positive, not moral:" for, however something related to the Jews, yet, by this commandment, is only forbidden to worship the images of false gods, or the image of the true God with Divine worship.

23. Against this I have many things to say: 1. That idolatry is a sin against the law of nature, or of prime religion; therefore whatsoever was idolatry in the Jews, is the same sin in the christians. Indeed, in the intercourses between man and man, though the relative duty be bound upon us by the commandment of God, yet the instances can be altered by human authority and consent; as new kinds of incest, several instances of murder, of treason, and the like; but where not only the law, but the instances also, are of God's appointment, what is once is always, unless God change the particular, which he never did in the present question. One case there is, in which the particulars even of the present article can vanish; viz. when a particular is commanded apparently for a transient reason, and hath in it no essential reason, no natural rectitude; but the worshipping of God by an image is against natural reason, as I have proved by the unlawfulness and unreasonableness of making an image of God, and shall further prove in the sequel; therefore, although, by reason of the Jews' proneness to direct and prime idolatry, the commandment put new and accidental necessities, (I mean the not having or making any pictures,) yet the prohibition of worshipping God by an image having a natural and essential rectitude and conformity to the simplicity of a natural, and to the spirituality of the christian religion, it cannot be changed as the fancies or the interests of men shall require; and of this, besides the apparent reasonableness of the thing, we have an express testimony from Origen.^x "Cæterum christiani homines et Judæi sibi temperant ab his propter illud legis, 'Dominum Deum timebis;' Item propter illud, 'Non erunt tibi Dii alieni præter me, et non facies tibi ipsi simulacrum,' &c. aliaque multa his similia, quæ adeo nos prohibent ab aris et simulacris, ut etiam emori jubeant citius quam contaminemus nostram de Deo fidem talibus impietatibus:" "Both christians and Jews abstain from these worshippings, because the law says, 'Thou shalt have no other gods but me:' and 'Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image,' and for many other things like these, which so severely restrain us from altars and images, that they command us to die rather than to pollute our faith of God with such impieties." The sum of which is, that christians, as well as Jews, understood themselves bound equally by this commandment; and they were to suffer death rather than image-worship.

24. (2.) To worship false gods, or to give Divine honour to an image which is not God, is all one kind of formal idolatry: they may differ materially, as the worshipping of silver does from bowing the head to gold, but they are formally the same thing; for it is a making that to be our God which is no God; and this is sufficiently forbidden in the first commandment. Now since there are more sins against that commandment than one, let us suppose that the two first (as we reckon them) are but one; yet the next must be that which is forbidden in the explication; that is, to worship the true God with a false image; it is making God to be like an idol by representing him in the same cheap impossible way; by using him like the false gods, by making his image to become an idol, by giving him a forbidden, hated worship, by honouring him with a lie; all which, if they be not great violations of the commandment to which they do belong,—then there is but one kind of sin there forbidden, and this is an act of so great simplicity and incommunicability, that it hath neither brother nor sister, mother nor daughter, kiff nor kin, analogy nor correspondencies, addresses nor degrees: if it have not, why are so many particulars reduced to this commandment by all casuists, friends or foes, in this article? If it have, this superstitious and forbidden worship being here named in the commandment, and standing next to the prime idolatry, must, at least, have a degree of the same obliquity.

25. (3.) He that makes an image of God and worships it,—gives it the worship of God, whom it represents, or a different. If he gives a different, and, consequently, a less worship, he does not worship God in the image; but his worship is such as it is terminated on the image, and then comes not into this inquiry: it is no more than loving a bird for Lesbia's sake, or valuing a pendant for her sake that gave it me; and this may be a civil valuation, and is to be estimated according to its excess or temper. But if by the image I mean to worship God, then I join them together in the act of adoration, and make them the same integral object; but then I give to both the same worship; and, therefore, unless they can both be united into an identity, I must needs give Divine worship to that which is no God, which is direct idolatry. If an image of God pass the worship, which I give unto God, then it gives first to the image, then to God, therefore it must needs be the same; for that which passes from the image to God, must not be less than what is fit to be given to God; but if it be the same, then it ought not at all to pass upon that: if it be less than Divine, it must not be given to God; if it be not less, it must not pass upon that which is not God. If it be less, it is impiety when it is offered to the prototype; if it be the same, and not less, it is idolatry when it is offered to the image.

26. But I need not make use of both parts of the dilemma; for it is certain, that every relative worship must be the same in the middle and the end; and it is confessed by most of those, who worship God and his Christ, and his saints, by images, that the same honour is given to both. "Eundem honorem deberi imagini et exemplari," says Almain; "ac proinde imagines Sanctæ Trinitatis, Christi, et crucis cultu latriæ adorandas esse;" "The images of the Trinity, of Christ, and of the cross, are to be adored with Divine worship."—The same is the opinion of Alensis, Aquinas, Bonaventure, Albertus, Richardus, Capreolus, Cajetan, Coster, Valentia, the Jesuits of Cologne, Triers, and Mentz, who approved Coster's opinion, and indeed, generally, of all the Roman schools, if we may believe a great man amongst them; "Constans est theologorum sententia, imaginem eodem honore et cultu honorari et coli quo colitur id cuius est imago," said Azorius; and he supposes this to be the mind of the council of Trent, and insinuated by the second Nicene; and certainly he was in the right. For, though the council of Trent used much caution in their expression of this invidious article, and expressed no particular honour, but that due honour and worship be given to them, yet, when at the latter end of the decree, it approves the second Nicene council, and refers to that in the article; it is plain that the council of Trent intended such honour and worship to be due, as the council of Frankfort said was not due, neither is it to be imagined they durst contradict so constant an opinion, or openly recede from their great Aquinas. They have amongst them many fine devices, to make this seem what it is not; but that which is sufficient, is this, that no distinction, no artifice, will file the harshness off from this: for whereas the great thing that they say is this, that this worship being not for the image, but for God's sake passed through the image, does not give Divine honours to the image. But I reply: is it a Divine honour that is given to the image or no? is it the same that is given to God, or is it another? If it be the same, then, though it be not for the image, but for God, yet it is for God that the Divine worship is given to the image, —that is, it is for God's sake that what is due to God alone, is given to that which is not God, that is, for God's sake they commit idolatry. But if it be not the same, then how do they worship God by the image? "Idem est motus ad imaginem et exemplar," says Aristotle; and upon this account they suppose what is done to the image, accrues to God; but then, as they must take care that nothing be given to God that is less than himself, I mean that he be not worshipped with less than a Divine worship; so they may also remember, that by one motion and act of worship, they cannot give less to the image than they do to God; whatsoever is less than another, is not the same with another; if, therefore, the worship given to the image be in any sense less than that which is given to God, then it is not the same; if it be not the same, then by the same motion, by the same act of worship, there are two kinds of worship given, which is a contradiction, that one should be two; and also evacuates their great pretence of the reasonableness or possibility of doing worship to God by an image, because upon this account the same does not pass at once to both.

27. (4.) A good man is more an image of God than any painter or engraver can make; but if we give Divine honours to a good man, it were idolatry; therefore, much more, if we give it to an image. I use this instance to take off the trifle of worship "relativè," and worship "terminativè;" for if we should offer sacrifice to a man, build temples and altars to him over against his doors, burn lamps, make vows, appoint holidays, processions, litanies, institute fraternities, give him the appellatives of honour which we usually ascribe to God,—it would not serve our turns to say, "we do it to God whose image this man is, and we intend the honour to God finally; there it rests, it only passes through the good man, to be united to the glories of God;" it were idolatry without all contradiction. I find that acts of humility have been done to the poor, for Christ's sake, and the actions were referred to Christ, just as all other acts of charity and alms use to be; but if Divine honour be done to them, it is so far from being entertained by God as the corrective of that worship, that it is a dishonour to him; he being curious of his own peculiar, and having given no warrant, no instance that can amount to any thing of that nature, and he will be worshipped, as Plato's expression is, τῷ μᾶλλον ἀρέσκοντι πρόπῳ, "in that way" (not that we choose, but) "that he best likes." He that will pass worship to God by the mediation and interposition of a creature, must do it by using that creature in all the endearments and regards for God's sake, of which it is capable. Thus, "by reverencing the grey head, and rising up to him," we do honour to the great Father of men and angels; by relieving the poor, we do honour to Christ; but neither is Christ honoured by us, if we have made a rich present to a king for Christ's sake, or call a poor beggar, "My lord;" but when, for God's sake, we pass those regards to several estates of men, which are the best usages which prudently they can require,—then the good we do to them, whether it be honour or relief, relates to God; but for God's sake to give Divine honours to a man, is as if to honour the master, we made his servant equal; or, out of reverence to the body, we should wear the shoe upon our head. And this argument must needs conclude against the worshippers of images; for although Vasquez, and I think he alone, of all the world, owns the worst that this argument can infer, and thinks it lawful to give Divine worship relatively or transitively to a man; yet when that whole church excuses their worshipping of saints, by saying they give only such veneration to them as is proportioned to them, not "latria," but "dulia," that is, not Divine worship in any sense, for so they would be understood to speak and do; it must needs be certain, that this argument is not to be answered, nor yet to be outfaced. However, this is certain, that when the Arians, who believed Christ to be a mere creature, though they could not deny but that (according to the express words of Scripture) he was the express and bright image of his Father's glory, yet because they gave to Christ Divine honours for his relation sake to his Father the eternal God, they were by the fathers of the church expressly called idolaters, as is to be seen in the first, third, and fourth orations of St. Athanasius against the Arians, and in St. Cyril in Joh. l. 9. c. 41. and divers other places; and whatever Vasquez, or any man else, is pleased to think of it,—yet St. John was twice rejected by an angel, when he would have given Divine honour to him, when he would have worshipped him; and yet that angel represented God, and was the servant of Jesus. And upon this account we may worship every creature; every fly, every tulip, even the onions of Egypt; for every plant is more an image of God than a dead piece of metal or marble can be:—

And it is in images, as it is in the matter of oaths, of which our blessed Saviour said, that "he that swears by heaven, or by the earth, by the temple, or by the gold, it is all a case:" it all alike refers to God, and does him dishonour, if the matter be vain or false; so it is in images:—every creature of God represents him, and is capable of transmitting honour to him, as a wooden image; and yet because the best images of God are not susceptible of Divine honours so much as by relation, much less shall the worse images; and if it be idolatry to give such to a man, though with an intuition upon God,—to do so to a dead image, which hath less likeness to God, cannot be put off by a distinction and a vain imagination. I will not aggravate the evil practices or doctrines which are in the church of Rome concerning this question, but it is obvious to observe, that although this distinction of "relativè" and "terminativè" is invented by superstitious persons to make the question hard, and to give themselves greater opportunity of quieting the scruples of tender persons; yet they do give, and openly profess to give, Divine honours to that which is no god, which I thus demonstrate. The cross on which Christ suffered is but a creature; but to the image of this they give a relative Divine honour; therefore to the exemplar, which is that cross whereof the other are but images, they terminate the Divine honour. So Jacobus Almain, in the words a little before quoted: "The same honour is owing to the image and the exemplar; and therefore the images of the Trinity, and of Christ, and of the Cross, are to be adored with the worship of Latria; that is, divine." To this purpose is that clause in the pontifical,^z published by the authority of Clement the Eighth; "Crux legati quia debetur ei latria, erit à dextris:"—"The legate's cross must be on the right hand; because 'latria,' or Divine honour, is due to it."—Now this, being the image, can challenge but this Divine honour relatively; but the cross that Helena found at Jerusalem, was the exemplar; therefore to that the Divine worship is due "ultimatè et terminativè:" it rests there; which is as downright idolatry as can be defined. But Aquinas proves it ought to be so by this argument, "that in which we place the hope of our salvation, to that we exhibit the worship of 'latria,' or Divine worship:" but in the cross we place the hope of our salvation, for so the church sings.

*O Crux ave, spes unica,
Hoc passionis tempore:
Auge piis justitiam, Reisque dona veniam.*

"All hail, O Cross, who art our only hope in this time of our suffering; increase the righteousness of the righteous, and give pardon to the guilty."—I could add many more^a things to the same purpose; but because I intend not an accusation of any one, but institution to every one that needs it, I shall only observe, that this distinction is used with them as miracles and gift of tongues were; not for them that believe, but for them that believe not; so is this, for strangers, and them that make objections,—not for the obedient that worship images and break the commandment; for they must or may do more than give a relative worship: but yet, because it concerns us and them, I add this observation.

28. (5.) That if Divine worship, or "latria," be in any sense given to an image, no distinction can save it harmless: for if it be given at all, it is not changed in kind by being altered in circumstance. It is that kind of worship which all the world understands to be proper to God. Now, whether it be for itself or for any other thing, is nothing but an inquiry, for what cause this incommunicable worship is communicated to them; that is, a looking after the cause of a thing which no cause can legitimate; and whether this be proper or improper, yet still it is idolatry in one of the senses; whether it be direct or indirect, it still gives but an appellative, and specificates the idolatry: for that which, in its whole nature, is unlawful and unnatural, cannot be lawful in a certain respect. "Idololatræ dicuntur, qui simulacris eam servitutem exhibent quæ debetur Deo," said St. Austin:^b "He who gives that to an image which is due to God, is an idolater." But he who answers that he does that thing but in this or this manner, confesses the thing done and tells you how: but if the manner destroys the thing, then it is not the same worship; and then what need the distinction of the manner, which must suppose the same matter? but if the manner does not destroy the thing, then for all the distinctions it is idolatry.

29. (6.) I consider that in the first commandment, where atheism, and polytheism, and allotheism, are forbidden directly and principally, and whatever is like it, or even with, or under it; the preface or the reason of it is expressed by God: "I am the Lord thy God;" plainly declaring, that whatsoever is introduced against that commandment, is also against that reason: God is not our God, if we acknowledge none, or if we accept of many, or any other; so that, by this precept and upon this account, idolatry in the object is forbidden. But in the next precept, or (if it be the same with this) in the next periods of this commandment, there is another thing forbidden upon another reason: "Thou shalt not worship any graven image, for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God,"—meaning, that as his being our God infers that none else must be made our God, or have Divine honours done to it,—so the superaddition of this attribute and appellative of God, that as he is our God, so also he is a jealous God, in this very matter of intercourse with us, infers that we must not only do what he bids, but also in his own way; and the thing and the manner too are taken care of. And if he had, in the second precept, only forbidden Divine worship to be given to any artifice or to any creature; the proper reason for it had been, "for I am the Lord thy God;" but when to other words he puts another reason, it is certain it must mean something new, and not signified in the first periods. But then, because the worshipping of any image of God with Divine worship for the sake of the exemplar is that which is nearest and likest the manner of the gentiles, and does insensibly steal the heart of man away, and depresses our great thoughts of the eternal immense God into the circumscription of any image, and draws the mind from spiritual to material intercourses, and therefore does, by immediate consequence, lessen the honour of God and the propriety of the Divine worship, that all this should be forbidden is justly inferred from the reason; for of these things no better reason in the world can be given, than that God is a jealous God, and will not have his honour, directly or indirectly, given to any thing to whom himself is not pleased expressly to impart it; and therefore, there is a natural proportion in the reason to the prohibition: for since it is usual in Scripture to call idolatry by the name of fornication or adultery, God is pleased here also to forbid that manner of worship, which he accounts adulterous, and declares he will not endure it, because he is jealous: and let it be imagined, what can be the effect of that reason? something special must be apportioned to it, lest it be to no purpose: but that images be not taken for very God, that they may not finally and for themselves receive Divine honour, is the effect of the first reason, and of the first precept: whatsoever is next to this, must be what is also next expressed, that is, not that images be not worshipped for God; but that, in the worshipping the true God, which is commanded in the first period, we do not bow the head and knee before images, which is forbidden in the second periods. And if men were, in their proportion, as jealous of their duty and of avoiding God's anger and escaping the Divine judgments, and of preserving their eternal interest, as God is of his honour; they would never so much intricate their duty, and brangle the commandment, and do that which is so much against the letter of it, and against the doctrine of that church to whom the law was given, and against so much reason; and for the doing of which they are forced to use so much violence of answer, such convulsions of distinction. A jealous man will not endure such comportments in his wife; for the justification of which she is so hardly put to it, that she must have half a dozen answers before she can please herself, or think that she does well; and which, after all, will look but like pitiful excuses. But, above all excuses, it would seem the worst, if she should say, "I do admit another man, but not as my husband, but with a less regard and another sort of complication than I use to him; and that which I do, I do it for his sake, he is so like him that he is his very picture; and he is his very great friend, and what I do is for that very regard." A jealous man would hardly take this for satisfaction. And if it be considered, that there is nothing so clear but something may be said against it, and παντὶ λόγῳ λόγος ἀντίκειται, "every word can be contradicted by a word;" and then how many presumptions, how many reasons, how many express words, how many ages, and how many religions, do join in the condemnation of worshipping God by an image; it may very well be concluded, that our jealous God will not endure half so much disobedience, wilful ignorance, and obstinacy in such persons as, against so much reason and religion, and for so few and trifling pretences, will worship God and his Christ by images, against the words of his own commandment.

30. (7.) If it be inquired, "how an image can be an idol?" the answer must be: "by giving to it Divine worship, or something that is due or proper to God."—Now, whoever knows it to be an image of a thing, if he have any use of reason, if he be not a changeling, believes better of the exemplar than of the image; and knows that the worship sticks not in the image: he cannot worship it for itself, but for something to which it relates, or for something that adheres to it, or is derived upon it; still the honour goes beyond the natural or artificial image. The image hath no worth of its own beyond the art or nature; and can be estimated, but as silver, or marble, or carved, and therefore, no religion passes upon it for its own sake. Since, therefore, whatsoever passes on it, is for the sake of that which it represents, an image that is understood to be an image, can never be made an idol; or if it can, it must be by having the worship of God passed through it to God; it must be by being the analogical, the improper, the transitive, the relative (or what shall I call it?) object of Divine worship.—Now that this consideration may have its effect, I shall not need to say that an idol and an image is all one, though that be true in grammar; and Erasmus^c said that St. Ambrose knew no difference between them, but that every image (made for religion) is an idol; and that he himself saw no difference: but because the church, in some ages, hath supposed a difference, I shall also allow it; but find all the danger of any such allowance taken away by the instance of the brazen serpent, which did pass under both notions; for it was a mere image or representment of a serpent, and the commemoration of God's delivering his people from them: but when it came to be used in a religious worship, then it was an idol; permitted when it was a bare image, but broken when it passed into an idol. An image or an idol do not differ in themselves but by use and custom of speaking,—the church calling it an image so long as it is used lawfully: but it is an idol when it is used unlawfully, that is, in plain speaking, “an image is lawful to be made or kept for some purposes, but not for other.” It is lawful for story,—for memory of an absent friend or valued person that is away,—for the moving an affection,—for ornament and the beauty of a place: but it is not lawful to have them, not lawful to make them, with designs of ministering to religion or the service and worship of God: which I choose to express in the words of the author of the famous books under the name of Charles the Great,^d “Nos imagines in basilicis positas, idola non nuncupamus; sed ne idola nuncupentur, adorare et colere eas recusamus.”—“We do not call images by the name of idols, but, lest they become idols, we refuse to worship them.”—But yet this I add, that although, in the use of the two Greek words, εἰκών and εἰδωλον, and of the Latin, “idolum” and “imago,” men have troubled themselves with finding material differences,—yet although it might be of some use in inquiring the meaning of the ancient doctors of the church in the question of images, yet it will be wholly impertinent as to the commandment. For God, forbidding images, used the word פסל, which signifies properly a graven image; and because there were more sorts besides this, God was pleased to forbid תמונה, which the LXX render by παντός ὁμοίωμα, “the likeness of any thing:” and it contains “sculptile, fusile, ductile, conflatile,” that is, all sorts of representations, flat or extant, painted or carved; and the force of this word can be eluded by no distinction. But then as to the meaning of these words in the use of the ancient doctors, this is certain: that although, about the time of the second

Nicene council, this distinction of “idolum” and “imago” was brought into the christian church, yet it was then new, and forced, made to serve the ends of new opinions, not of truth: for in Tertullian's time there was nothing of it, as appears by his words in his book “de idololatriâ,” c. 3. “Ad hoc necessaria est vocabuli interpretatio: εἶδος Græce formam sonat; ab eo per diminutivum εἰδωλον deductum æque apud nos formulam fecit. Igitur omnis forma, vel formula idolum se dici exposcit, estque idololatria, omnis circa omne idolum famulatus et servitus:”—“Every image (meaning, of God) is an idol, and all worship and service about them is idolatry.”—This is plain, and short. And that, once for all, I may make it clear, that an idol and an image was all one in the sense of the word, and of the ancient church, it is undeniably so used in Cicero;^e “Imagines, quæ idola nominant, quorum incursione non solum videamus sed etiam cogitemus,” &c.: and for the church St. Chrysostom is an authentic witness; for he calls the pictures, by which they then adorned their houses, by the name of idols, οἰκίας κατασκευῶμεν, εἰδῶλα πανταχοῦ καὶ ξόανα ἱστῶντες, “we trim our houses, placing every where idols and pictures.”

31. Upon this account we may understand the meaning of the primitive fathers, who would not endure that a picture should be made or kept;—who condemned the art itself, as deceiving and adulterous, who said that God forbade the very trade itself. So Tertullian;^f “Jam vero ipsum opus personarum, quæro, an Deo placeat, qui omnem similitudinem vetat fieri, quanto magis imaginis suæ?”—“Can the making visors please God, who hath forbidden all similitudes or images and pictures to be made, and how much more any image of himself?”—“Nobis enim est aperte vetitum fallacem exercere,” said St. Clement,^g speaking of pictures and images, the very art is forbidden to christians. The same is affirmed by Origen;^h and long after by St. Chrysostom;ⁱ but Tertullian said that the devil brought painting and carving into the world; and adds, “Toto mundo ejusmodi artibus interdixit servis Dei,”—“that God hath forbidden to all his servants in all the world to use such arts.”—But they are to be understood by their own words, spoken when they had the same reason and less heat; for that the very making of images was forbidden by God by way of caution only and provision, not for any turpitude or unreasonableness in the thing, but for the danger which then was pregnant, themselves affirm: “Similitudinem vetans fieri omnium—ostendit et causas idololatriæ, sc. substantiam cohibentes: subicit enim ‘non adorabitis ea,’” &c. So Tertullian.^k—To the same purpose is that of Origen; speaking of the Jews, “There was no painter or statuary admitted into their cities, their laws driving away all this kind of people,” “Ne qua occasio præberetur hominibus crassis, neve animi eorum à Dei cultu avocarentur ad res terrenas per hujusmodi illecebras:” “lest any occasion should be given to rude people of drawing their minds from the pure worship of God to earthly things." Now if this sense was also in the commandment, it is certain that this was but temporary, and therefore could change: and that it was changeable appears in this, that God, by a Divine spirit, assisted Bezaleel and Aholiab in the like curious arts: and by other instances which I have already reckoned.¹ Now this sense and severity might perpetually oblige the Jews; because, during the whole abode of their synagogue, there was almost an equal danger by their perpetual conversation with idolatrous nations; and therefore it was very well said of Tertullian^m in the matter of the brazen serpent, "If thou regardest the law, thou hast God's law, 'make not the likeness of any thing:' but if thou considerest that afterwards Moses did command them to make the likeness of a serpent, do thou also imitate Moses, and against the law make no likeness, unless God also give thee a commandment, as he did Moses:"—meaning that the singular example was no prejudice to the law: "Exceptio firmat regulam in non exceptis." This part of the commandment was by God dispensed with in that instance, and in a few more; but these few confirm the rule in all things and instances, besides themselves, for they say, that without God's leave we may not break this commandment. In Tertullian's time this very necessity did still abide, and therefore they had the same zeal against images and "whatsoever gave substance to idolatry;" that is Tertullian's phrase for painters and statuaries. But then this also is to be added: that all those instances, in the Old Testament, of the brazen serpent, the bulls, the pomegranates, the cherubim, the curious works of Bezaleel, are not to be used as arguments against the morality of the second commandment: because these were single causes, and had their special warrant or approbation respectively from the same fountain whence the prohibition came; at least let them prevail no further than they ought; let them mean no more than they say, and let us go no further than the examples: by which we find images made for other uses, but not for worship: and therefore the commandment may be moral in all the periods of it, this only excepted which relates to the making of them.

But when we consider further, that Solomon caused golden lions to be made about his throne, and the Jews imprinted images on their money, and in Christ's time they used the images of Cæsar on their coin, and found no reproof for so doing, this shows that there was something in the commandment that was not moral; I mean the prohibition of making or having any images. For to these things we find no command of God, no dispensation, no allowance positive; but the immunity of reason, and the indemnity of not being reprov'd: and therefore, for so much as concerns the making or having pictures and images, we are at liberty, without the warranty of an express commandment from God. The reason of the difference is this: the first instances (excepting that of the brazen serpent, which, because it was to be instrumental in a miraculous blessing, must suppose a Divine commandment, like a sacrament or sacramental) were of images used in the tabernacle or temple, and so came within the verge of religion; and, for their likeness to the main superstition, might not be ventured upon without special leave or approbation: and therefore God gave command for the images of the tabernacle, and, by his majestic presence in the temple, approved all that was there. Upon what confidence Solomon ventured upon it, and whether he had a command or no, I find not recorded; but, "ex post facto," we find it approved. But for the other images, which related wholly to civil use; right reason, and the common notices of things, was their sufficient warrant; while they could have no end in disobedience, no temptation to it, no reward for it; when it did not contradict any natural or religious reason; there was no danger of idolatry, no semblance of superstition. So that the result is this: the Jews were forbidden to make or have any images; and this was because of their danger: but this was no moral law. But the very making and having them for worship is forbidden, as the thing itself is. Just as adultery and wanton looks are forbidden in the same commandment, and are acts of the same sin,—so is worshipping and having them for worship; it is that which St. Paul calls in the matter of uncleanness, "making provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof." Making images and pictures to this end, is providing for the flesh: for this also is fornication and spiritual whoredom. And as we may look upon a woman, and be innocent, so we do not look upon her for lust,—so may we have or make pictures and images; but for worship, we may not: and in this sense of the words, even this period of the commandment is also moral, and obliges us as much as the Jews: but if those words did, abstractedly and without their relation, bind the Jews, it did never bind us but by way of caution and prudence; that is, when we are in the same dangers as were the Israelites, in the rudeness and infancy of their church especially. And this we find in Tertullian; that when he had affirmed the very art of painting and engraving to be unlawful,—to them who inquire what then shall the poor men do, who have no other means to get their living? he answers, "let them paint tables and cupboards, and remove their art from danger of religion to necessary and fit provisions for life; let them do things as like as they were enabled by their art, so they were unlike the violations of religion;" and therefore the church celebrates, on the eighth of November, the memory of Claudius Nicostratus, and their fellows, who chose to die rather than make images for the heathen temples; they were excellent statuaries, but better christians. By which it is plain, that he means the very art, as it is ministered to idolatry; for abstracting from that ministry and that danger it was lawful enough:

Qui fingit sacros auro vel marmore vultus,
Non facit ille Deos; qui colit, ille facit.

He that worships the image, he makes it an idol; and he that designs any assistance to the idolatry, or knowingly ministers to it, he adopts himself into a partnership of the crime. To which purpose was that of Tertullian,^a "Facio (scil. imagines) sed non colo:—quasi ob aliam causam colere non audeat, nisi ob quam et facere non debeat, scilicet ob Dei essentiam utrobique: imo tu colis, qui facis ut coli possint." He answers the objection of them that say, "I make images, but I do not worship them;" "as if," says he, "there were any reason forbidding thee to worship them, but the same for which thou oughtest not to make them: I mean, the omnipresence of God. Nay, thou worshippest them, who makest them that they may be worshipped."—But in all other senses, the making a picture is not making an idol; and therefore that severe sense of the commandment, though, as it is most probable, it did oblige the Jews, and all persons in equal danger; yet because the reason may cease, and the danger be secured, when it is ceased the obligation also is null; and therefore, though that was in the commandment, yet it is no part of its morality: but that excepted, every other clause is moral and eternal.

32. (8.) And all this is perfectly consenting to the analogy of the gospel, which is a spiritual worship, unclothed of bodily ceremonies, stripped naked of beggarly rudiments, even those which God had commanded in the old law; Christ placed but two mysterious ceremonies in the place of all the shadows of Moses; and since christianity hath shook off that body and outside of religion, that law of a carnal commandment, that we might "serve God with spirit and truth," that is proportionable to his perfections, it cannot be imagined that this spiritual religion, which worships God in praises and love, in charity and alms, in faith and hope, in contemplation and humility, in self-denial and separations from all corporeal adherences that are not necessary and that are not natural,—I say, it cannot be imagined that this spiritual religion should put on a fantastic body, which, as much as it can, separates from a real: that christianity should make a vizard for God, who hath no body, and give that to him which the heathens gave to their devils: "Dæmoniis corpora contulerunt:" "they gave a body to their dæmons," says Tertullian,^o when they made images to them; that he who, under the law of carnal ordinances, could not endure an image, should yet be pleased with it under the pure and spiritual institution of the gospel. A christian must πνευματικῆς θεραπείας ἀσπάζεσθαι, "worship God with genuine and proper worshippings," that is, ψυχῆς μόνῃ καὶ λόγῳ, "with the pure and only worship of the soul." Now if the ceremonials of Moses were contrary to this spirituality, and therefore was taken away by the gospel; it cannot be imagined that images, which are more contrary to a spiritual worship, should be let in by Christ, when they were shut out by Moses. To this purpose they are excellent words, which were spoken by Clemens Alexandrinus:^p "Moses, many ages before, made a law, that there should be no graven, no molten, no painted image or likeness of a thing made amongst them, that we should not attend sensible things, but pass to those which are perceived by the understanding only. For the daily custom of seeing him (in effigy) makes that the majesty of God becomes vile and contemptible, and by material substances (gross images) to worship that essence, which is only discerned by the mind, is, by the sense, to undervalue the eternal mind."

33. (9.) And, upon these accounts, we find that the christians were great haters of image-worship, and even of images themselves; and did deride the heathen follies, who, in the midst of their witty disputations and wise discourses of God, did so unman themselves, and baffle their own reason, as to worship this invisible God by looking upon a contemptible image. To this purpose Origen discourses wisely;^q "God hath chosen the folly of the world, those amongst the christians whose lives were most simple, modest, and more pure than that of the philosophers, that he might put to shame those wise men, who blush not to speak to lifeless trunks, as if they were gods, or images of the gods. For what sober man does not easily discern him, who, after his excellent and philosophical discourses of God, or of the gods, does presently look upon images, and offers prayers to them, or by the beholding them as some conspicuous sign, strives to lift up his mind to the imagination of an intelligible deity? But the christian, though but unlearned, yet he believes verily that the whole world is the temple of God, and he prays in every place, shutting his bodily eyes, but lifting up the eyes of his mind—and being rapt, as it were, beyond this world, he makes his prayers to God for great things." This is the advantage, the spirituality, and devotion of the christian. Concerning which it were easy to bring many ancient testimonies: which whoever is desirous to see, may find them frequently in the fathers of the four first ages; but especially in Irenæus, lib. i. cont. Hær. c. 24.—Origen, lib. vii. contr. Cels.—Tertul. de Idol. c. 5,—and de Coron. Mil.—and de Spectac. c. 23.—Clemens Rom. Recogn. lib. v.—and Clem. Alex. Strom. 1, et 5.—S. Chrysost. in Synod. 7. act. 6.—and in 1 Cor. viii.—Epiph. Hær. 29.—Amphiloch. apud Syn. 7, action. ead.—Optatus, lib. iii, contr. Donat.—S. Ambrose, ep. 31. ad Valent.—S. Austin, in Psal. 113: all which speak of this article so as needs no commentary, and admits of no evasion, decretorily, and dogmatically, and zealously.

34. Now against this heap of plain testimonies, there is not any one clear sentence and dogmatical proposition to be brought; and if there could be brought forty particular instances of a contrary practice, though there are not three to be had in pure antiquity and in authentic testimony, yet it could not, in any degree, abate the certainty of this doctrine: because the doctors of those ages say, that wherever there is any such thing, it is unlawful. Epiphanius did rend in pieces the veil at Anablatha, near Bethlehem, because it had in it the picture of a man; and this is so notorious, that Apollonius à Castro calls him an iconoclast: but

^a De Idol. c. 6.^o De Idol. c. 7.^p Stromat. 5.^q Con. Cels. lib. 7.

Epiphanius gives this account of it to the bishop of Jerusalem, "Contra auctoritatem scripturarum esse ut in Christi ecclesiâ hominis pendeat imago;" and, "istiusmodi vela contra religionem nostram veniunt:" "It is against the authority of the scriptures, it is against our religion, that the image of a man, that such veils should be in the church:"—and Lactantius^r as plainly, "Dubium non est quin religio nulla sit, ubicunque simulacrum est:" "where an image is, it is certain there is no religion:" and St. Austin answers all pretensions to the contrary, which can readily be drawn from antiquity. "I know," says he, "many that are worshippers of pictures, but such as neither know nor exhibit the force of their profession, but they are such who are superstitious in their very religion, such which the church would condemn, and daily seek to correct like little children."—This being the doctrine of the primitive church, if a contrary practice comes in, it is certain it is by corruption of faith and manners. The temples of gods and the images of gods they had in equal detestation; not that they hated public places of worship, but "templa, non ecclesias," or "dominicas;" for we must know, that in the language of the fathers, by "temples" they did mean such as the gentiles had; such as the Holy Scriptures^s call the place of Micah's images, "a house of gods;" according to that famous saying of Isidore, "Templi nulla ratio quod non coronat simulacrum:" "It is no temple that is without an image:" and it is no church that hath one, according to the primitive christian doctrine: and it was remarkable what is told by Ælius Lampridius, in the life of Alexander Severus, that when Adrian, the emperor, had commanded churches to be built without images, it was supposed he intended them for the service of Christ; than which there needs no greater or clearer instance of the doctrine and practice of the holy primitives.

35. But the best and most perfect account that can be given of the christian religion in this article, is by the ecclesiastical laws. The council of Eliberis,^t in Spain, made a canon: "Placuit picturas in ecclesiâ esse non debere, ne quod colitur aut adoratur, in parietibus depingatur:" "Pictures must not be in churches, lest that which is worshipped, or adored, be painted upon the walls." From which plain place Bellarmine, Perron, Binus, and divers others,^u take great pains to escape: it matters not how, as to the question of conscience; it is sufficient what Agobardus, bishop of Lyons, above eight hundred years ago, says in this very particular. "Now error is so grown, and is perspicuous, that they approach near the heresy of the Anthropomorphites, and worship images, and put their hope in them; the cause of which error is, that faith is departed from men's hearts, and they put their confidence in what they see. But as when we see soldiers armed, or husbandmen ploughing, or mowing, or gathering grapes, in picture, or the pictures of huntsmen pursuing their game, or of fishermen throwing their nets, we do not hope to receive from them a mullet, or a month's pay, handful of barley or clusters of grapes: so if we see winged angels painted, apostles preaching, martyrs dying, we are not to expect any aid or good from the images we see, because they can neither do good nor hurt. Therefore, for the abolishing of this superstition, 'rectè ab orthodoxis patribus definitum est,' 'it was rightly defined by the orthodox fathers,' that pictures ought not to be in churches, lest that which is worshipped (viz. God or his Christ) be painted upon their walls." To the same purpose the fathers of the fourth council, at Constantinople, did quote the words of Epiphanius, as we learn from the acts of the second Nicene council,^x in these words: "Take heed to yourselves and hold the traditions which ye have received: decline not to the right hand or to the left: and remember, my beloved sons, that ye bring not images into the churches, nor into the cemeteries of the saints; but by remembrance place God in your hearts." To the same purpose was it decreed by another synod,^y at Constantinople, of three hundred and thirty-eight bishops, under Constantius Copronymus; forbidding all use of images in churches or out of them: and so much of their decree as forbade the worship of images was followed by Charles the Great and the learned men of that age, and confirmed by the synod at Frankfort, where the bishops of Italy, France, and Germany, were called by the emperor to that purpose. To these, if we add the council of Mentz, and the second council of Sens,^z who commanded "populum moneri ne imagines adoret," "that the people should be warned, that they do not worship images,"—we have testimony enough of the christian doctrine and usages of the best men and the best times.

36. Concerning the christian doctrine, I suppose myself to have said enough in this article. But, besides the premises, there is something peculiar to be superadded, which concerns both Jews and gentiles, and the uninstructed laity of the christians.

37. (1.) Concerning the Jews I have already made it appear, that their religion was perfectly against images; but I have two things to add which relate to them: first, that, in the disputations between the Jews and christian doctors, in the primitive church, they never objected against the christians, that they either had images or did worship them: as is evident to them that read the conference between Justin Martyr and Tryphon; and in the book which Tertullian wrote against the Jews, and in divers other rencounters; in which the Jew was forward to object all that he could asperse the christian withal, and he, on the other side, as ready to defend his cause. But not one word, in any of them, of objection against the christians in the matter of images; which is an evident argument, that the use of images was not as yet known to the church of the first ages.

2. For when the doctrine and manners of the christians began to be sullied and degenerate; and she who was a pure virgin and dear to Christ, began to fornicate with strange imaginations; the Jew instantly became clamorous and troublesome in the article; professed himself to be scandalized at the whole religion, and in all disputations, was sure to lay it in the christian's dish. There was a famous dialogue,^a written a little before the time of the seventh synod, in which a Jew is brought in, thus speaking to the christian: "Scandalizor in vos christiani, quia imagines adoratis; Scriptura quippe ubique præcipit non facere quenquam sibi sculptile, vel omnem similitudinem:" "I am offended at you christians, because ye worship images; whereas the Scripture every where commands, that no man should make to himself any graven image, or the likeness of any thing." Of the same accusation, Leontius, bishop of Cyprus, takes notice in his apology against the Jews: and that the Jews make great noises with this accusation of the christians, and put very much upon it, we may see in the epistle of Ludovicus Carretus, and the catechetical dialogues of Fabianus Flogus. But this observation is very remarkable out of the Jewish Talmud; for in the first part of it, which they call the Misna, there is not one word of declamation or reproof against christians in the matter of images (as has been long since observed by learned men): for this was made about two hundred years after Christ, in all which time the christians did hate images as much as the Jews did. But in the Gemara Babylonicum, which is the second part of the Talmud, that is of authority amongst them, which was finished about five hundred years after Christ, at which time also images began to be received in churches; there and in all the commentaries of the Rabbins, published in the tenth or eleventh age, the Jews call the christian churches בית עבודה זרה beth havoda zara, "The house of idolatry;" and it will be impossible that ever they can become christians, so long as they see images worshipped in our churches; and the second commandment left out of the catechisms of those with whom especially they do converse.

38. That which I am to say concerning heathens, is this:—That it is impossible that those christians who worship images of God, should distinguish their manner of worshipping the true God, from the manner by which the heathens worshipped their gods. For they did not suppose their images to be gods; and therefore they would laugh at the christians, if they had nothing else to say against them, but that God is not a stone, or metal polished by the engraver's tool. Thus Arnobius brings in the gentiles speaking, "Neque nos æra, neque auri argentique materias quibus signa confunt, deos esse et religiosa, decernimus esse numina, sed eos ipsos in his colimus, quos dedicatio infert sacra," &c. "We do not think the gold, or the brass or the silver, of which we make our images, to be gods; but in these images we worship them."

Hoc Deus est quod imago docet, sed non Deus ipse, Hoc videas, sed mente colas quod cernis in ipsâ.

"The image is not God, but represents him; your eye upon the image, and your mind upon God."—"Quis enim alius est nisi sit plane fatuus, qui hæc deos esse putet, non autem deorum donaria et simulacra?" "None but fools (said Celsus^b) will call them gods, which are but images of the gods." And it is very pertinent, which Lucian^c told the matron who took it ill that she was complimented too high, and compared in beauty to the goddesses; "I never did, (says he,) fair lady, compare you to the goddesses, but with their images made by the best workman of stone, or brass, or ivory. And I do not think it impious to compare things with men, if those things are made by men; unless you will suppose that Phidias made Minerva—or that to be the heavenly Venus, which, a great many years ago, Praxiteles made at Cnidus. But take heed, for it is an undecent thing to think such things of the gods, whose true representations (as I suppose) no human industry can make." The same is to be seen in Athenagoras,^d in Arnobius,^e in Lactantius,^f St. Austin,^g and divers others. "Signa ad Junonis Sospitæ cruore manavere," said Livy;^h "the signs (meaning the images in Juno's temple) did drop blood:" and Clemens Romanusⁱ brings in the heathens saying, "We worship visible images to the honour of the invisible God." And they could sometimes laugh at their gods whom their priests exposed to worship, and yet themselves knew them to have been a plum-tree.

Olim truncus eram ficulnus, inutile lignum;
Cum faber, incertus scammum faceret ne Priapum, Maluit esse Deum. Deus inde ego, furum aviumque Maxima formido. HORACE.

"It was a great question amongst the carpenters, whether this wood should be a god or a stool:"—now they that talked thus, knew what that was which their mystic persons called a god; they were sure they could be but images of them. So that these christians, who worship God by an image, although they otherwise sin against the first commandment than heathens do, who worship false gods, yet they sin equally against the second commandment, and, by images, transmit worship to their God respectively. I do not doubt but the ruder among the heathens did suppose the very image to be their god, or that their god did dwell in their temple, and in their image, or that a divine power was communicated to it:—

Ut pueri infantes credunt signa omnia athena
Vivere, et esse homines, et sic isti omnia ficta
Vera putant: credunt signis cor esse in athenis. LUCIL.

For some are such very children as to think the wooden puppet to be a wood man; and therefore when the prophets discoursed against them in the matter of images, they called them wood and stone, gold and silver, and represented the folly of putting trust in things that had no life, which themselves placed there, which cats did sit upon, and birds built their nests in: but either by these arguments they did reprove those fools amongst them, who did suppose them to be gods indeed, (who also sinned directly against the first commandment, and committed idolatry in the object of their worship,)—or those better spirits and wiser heads among them, who, though they derided that folly, yet they put their trust in the images, as supposing them invested with power from their God, and that by them he would do them benefit.

39. (3.) Now how far differing this is from the practice of christians, in some times and places, we may guess by the complaints made by learned men, particularly by Cassander, and Polydore Virgil, and Hesselius^k the regius professor at Louvain; but without the aid of their testimony, it is plain by their public and authorized treatment of their images, they consecrate their images, they hope in them, they expect gifts and graces from them, they clothe them and crown them, they erect altars and temples to them, they kiss them, and bow their head and knee before them, they light up tapers and lamps to them, which is a direct consumptive sacrifice, “et reliquam observationem circa eas, similiter ut gentes, faciunt;” “they do to their images as the heathens do to theirs;” they are the words of Irenæus, by which he reproves the folly of some that had got the pictures of Christ and Pythagoras, and other eminent persons. But that which is most to be reprovèd, and can be less excused, is their prayers^l and forms of dedicating their golden or wooden images; “Sanctify, O God, this form of the blessed Virgin, that it may bring saving help to thy faithful people, that thunders and lightnings may be driven away the sooner, that immoderate rains or floods, and civil wars, or the invasion of heathens, may at the presence of this, be suppressed.” As bad or worse are in the pontifical, in the dedication of an image of the cross, and of St. John, and at the hallowing the “Agnus Dei.” Now these things are as bad as can be, and yet done to images (I do not doubt) for their sakes whom they represent; but yet with some regard to the image itself, for so they value our lady of Hales, our lady of Walsingham, of Loretto, of Sichem, Aspicollis, Prunetana, Ardilleriana, more than our lady of Nostredame, or Florence, or St. Denis. Now when the relatives of one term do differ, it is for themselves that the difference is, not for the correlative, which is still the same: and here for the common people to discern the niceties, and the intricate nothings that their learned men have devised, to put a vizer upon this folly is so impossible, that it will not be easy to make them understand the terms, though a learned man were by them at every cringe they make. They cannot tell whether the worship be to the image or the exemplar; which is prime and which is secondary; they cannot distinguish of “latria,” and “dulia,” and “hyperdulia;” nor can they skill in proper or improper worship, mediate and immediate, univocal, equivocal, and analogical, nor say how much is for this, and how much for that, or which is simple and which is allayed, which is absolute and which is reductive. And although men in the schools, and when they have nothing to do but to make distinctions which nobody can understand, can separate word from word, form from matter, real from notional, the shadow from the body, a dream from a vision, the skin from the flesh and the flesh from the bone,—yet when they come to action, and clothe their theorems with a body of circumstances, he that attends the present business of devotion and desire, will not find himself able or at leisure then to distinguish curiously; and therefore it was well said of Hesselius of Louvain:—“Images were brought into use for the sake of the laity, and now for their sakes they are to be removed again, lest they give Divine worship to the image, or fall into the heresy of the Anthropomorphites:” (he might have added,) “or lest by worshipping God by an image, they commit the sin of superstition and idolatry, breaking the second commandment.” For the same folly, which in the heathens was reprovèd by the primitive christians, the same is done now-a-days by christians to their images. I shall conclude this with a story out of an Italian,^m who wrote commentaries of the affairs of India:—When the poor barbarians of Nova Hispania, in the kingdom of Mexico, had, one day, of a sudden found their idols taken down and broken, they sent four principal persons of their country to Alfonsus Zuasus the licentiate, who had commanded it; they complaining of the injury supposed also, and told him, they did believe it to be done without his consent or knowledge, as knowing that the christians had idols and images of their own, whom they valued, and adored, and worshipped: and looking up, and espying the image of St. Sebastian, whom Alfonsus had in great veneration hanging by his bed-side, they pointed at him with their finger, saying, the same regard which he had to the image of St. Sebastian, the same they had to theirs. The governor being troubled with this quick and not barbarous discourse, turned him about a little, and at last told them, that the christians did not worship images for their own sakes, but as they represented holy persons dwelling in heavenly places: and to demonstrate that, took down the image of St. Sebastian, and broke it in pieces. They replied that it was just so with them; and that they were not so stupid to worship the images for their own regards, but as they represented the sun and moon, and all the lights of heaven. Alfonsus being yet more troubled, was forced to change the state of the question, by saying that the object was differing, though the manner was not; that the christians did by their images pass honour to the great Creator of the world; but they did it to creatures, to evil spirits, and false gods: which was indeed very true, but it was a removing the question from the second commandment to the first. For although, in relation to the first, the heathens have the worst of it; yet as to the second, these christians and the poor Indians were equal: and the wit of man cannot tell how they differ.

40. But I shall add this, that though it be impossible to know how the worship of God by an image should come into the world: unless it be, as Tertullian said of the very art of making images, that "it came from the devil;"—yet it is observable, that it never prevailed any where but in a degenerating people. The Jews at first were pure worshippers of the God of their fathers, but at any time when Satan stood at their right hand and made Israel to sin, then they would play the fool with images. In the purest times of christianity they kept themselves clean from images; but as they grew worse, so they brought in superstition, and worship of images, and so it was amongst the heathens too. While they kept themselves to the principles of their institution and tradition, which they had from the patriarchs of nations, who had been taught by God, and lived according to nature; they worshipped God simply and purely.

Si Deus est animus—

Hic tibi præcipue purâ sit mente colendus.

"A pure and immaterial substance is dishonoured by any worship but that of a pure and a holy mind;"—and the ancientest Romans, for one hundred and seventy years together, worshipped without an image, said Varro; who adds this judgment of his own, "quod si adhuc mansisset, castius Dii observarentur:" "if the same had been still observed, the gods had been more purely, more chastely worshipped." The word which Varro uses, is very proper, and according to the style of Scripture, which calls idolatrous worshippings by the name of fornication. But Varro adds this reason, "Qui primi simulacra Deorum populis posuerunt, eos civitatibus suis et metum dempsisse, et errorem addidisse." The introduction of images brought in error, and cast out fear:

Stulte verebor ipse cum faciam Deos:

"if I worship what I make, I will not fear what I worship."—"Well and wisely did he suppose (said St. Austin) that the greatness of their gods might soon become despicable by the foolishness of images:" and it might reasonably prevail against the old superstition to suppose, that he who governed all the world, ought to be worshipped without an image. The same testimony we have in Plutarch in the life of Numa: "The gods had houses and cells, but no images, as supposing it to be impious to express the greatest things by the basest; and knowing that there is no other way of coming to God but by the mind."

41. From hence I infer, that neither God nor nature, neither reason nor religion, brought images into the worship of God; but it was the invention of superstitious men, or rather of the enemy of mankind, that he might draw the heart of man from contemplation of the invisible, and depress it to low phan-tasms, and sensible adherences, to diminish the fear of God, and to produce confidences in dead substances clothed with accidents of art; to amuse the foolish, and to entertain the weakest part of him that is wiser, and that religion might be capable of tricks and illusions, which could not happen to immaterial and spiritual worshippings. But that all the reason of the world is against it, may be the rather presumed, because, although the patrons of images offer at some reasons for the use of images in story and ornament and instruction,—yet no man pretends to any reasonableness of worshipping God by an image, or giving God's due to an image. Some of them say, that "the same worship passes from the image unto God, and therefore it is lawful, and God is not dishonoured:" but upon no reasonable account can it be said, that therefore it is good, that it pleases God, that it promotes his honour, that it is without danger; and however any man may intend to pass the relative honour that way, yet no man hath any warrant that God will accept it, or that he will endure it, that way; that he will receive his sacrifices most readily, when they are first washed (shall I call it? or fouled) in the Borborus, by the pollutions and abominations of images: for that they are called so in Scripture, is evident; but they are never commended there, not one good word of them is there recorded: but of the worship of them nothing but prohibition and execration and foul appellatives. There is no necessity of it, no advantage by it, no man is helped by it, no command, no license, no promise, no Scripture for it; all the religions that ever God did institute, are expressly against it; and to sum up all, it is against the law of nature: of which I need no other witnesses but the testimony of all those wise personages, who affirm the two tables of Moses to be moral in every precept, excepting that of the sabbath, and to be of the law of nature. So Irenæusⁿ expressly: so Tertullian,^o St. Cyprian,^p Origen,^q St. Austin,^r and generally all antiquity. The sum of all I express in the words of St. Paul, ὁ Θεὸς ὁ ποιῶντας κόσμον οὐκ ὑπὸ χειρῶν ἀνθρώπων θεραπεύεται "God is not worshipped with men's hands," that is, with the productions of art and imagination.

42. I conclude, that the second commandment is a moral and natural precept in the whole body and constitution of it, if the first words of it be relative to the last; that is, if the prohibition of making images be understood so as to include an order to their worship: but if these words be made to be a distinct period,—then that period was only obligatory to the Jews, and to christians in equal danger, and under the same reason; and therefore can also pass away with the reason, which was but temporary, transient, and accidental: all the rest retaining their prime, natural, and essential obligation.

Of the Jewish Sabbath, and the Lord's Day.

43. There is one instance more, in which the rule is more apparently verified; which I mentioned a little above: and that is, the precept of the sabbath: which God instituted for many reasons. 1. To be a perpetual memorial of the creation, and that God might be glorified in the works of his hands by the religion of that day. 2. To preserve the memory of their deliverance from the captivity of Egypt;^s and upon the same account, to do ease and remission τοῖς δούλοις λογικοῖς καὶ ἀλόγοις, “to servants reasonable and unreasonable.” R. Moses Ben Maimon, in his Morch Nevochim,^t affirms, that the end of the sabbath is, “Septimam vitæ partem homini præstare liberam, et vacuum à labore et defatigatione, tum conservare et confirmare memoriam et fidem creationis mundi;” “that we should spend the seventh part of our life in ease and rest; and preserve the faith and memory of the article of the world’s creation;”

“Ἐδόμον ἡμᾶρ ἐὼν καὶ τῷ τετέλεστο ἅπαντα. НОМ.

because upon the seventh day all things were finished: and therefore according to that of Linus cited by Eusebius, “Ἐδόμη εἰν ἀγαθοῖς, καὶ ἐδόμη ἐστὶ γενέθλη.

Ἐδόμη ἐν πρώτοις, καὶ ἐδόμη ἐστὶ τελείη.

“The seventh day is the day of the world’s nativity, or the feast of its birth, it is the chiefest and most perfect of days.” 3. St. Austin^u hath another fancy; and he intends to offer at no higher rate: “Dici probabiliter potest, observandum sabbatum Judæis fuisse præceptum in umbrâ futuri, quæ spirituales requiem figuraret, quam Deus, exemplo hujus quietis suæ, fidelibus, bona opera facientibus, arcanâ significatione pollicebatur:” “It may be said, probably, that the precept of the sabbath to the Jews was a type and shadow of that spiritual rest, which God by his example did, by a secret signification, promise to the faithful that did good works.” I acknowledge that there is a fair proportion in the sign and in the thing signified; but whether this was so intended by God, or so understood by the Jews, is but “probabiliter dictum,” a probable conjecture taken only from the natural similitude of the things.

44. But allowing this: the consequent of all will be; that what was for temporary reasons established cannot pass an eternal obligation. Concerning which it is to be observed, that those are to be called temporary or transient reasons, not only when the thing ceases to have a being; such as those laws which were to separate the Jews from the gentiles, and those which related to the tabernacle, or the land of their dwelling, or the manner of their sacrifice, or their addresses to their chief city; for these cease by subtraction of the matter and the natural abolition of the material cause; because the wall of partition is taken down; and the law of ceremonies is abolished, and the people are exterminated from their country, and their sacrifices are ceased, and their city is destroyed, and their temple burnt: but that reason also is transient and temporary, which in a like instance, passes into a greater of the same kind. Thus the deliverance of Israel from the Egyptian bondage, though being a matter of fact, it is eternally true that it was once done, yet it is a temporary transient reason: because all God’s people now rejoice in a greater deliverance, and from a bondage that was infinitely worse,—from the slavery of sin, and the powers of hell. And thus also the great reason of the sabbath, I mean God’s rest from the works of the creation, is a temporary, transient reason; because there is now a new creation. “vetera transierunt,” “old things are passed away and all things are become new;” and the gospel is νέα κτίσις, “a new creation,” and our natures are regenerate, and reformed, and made with new principles of a new life to higher ends than before; and therefore, though the work of God’s creation is to be remembered and God to be glorified by us in his works, yet when there is a greater reason, the solemnity must relate to that, and the lesser duty can be well served by that day, which can also minister to the greater.

45. And therefore we find that something of this very reason is drawn into the observation of the Lord’s day, or the first day of the week, by Justin Martyr,^x τὴν τοῦ ἡλίου ἡμέραν κοινῇ πάντες τὴν συνέλευσιν ποιούμεθα, ἐπεὶ δὲ πρώτη ἐστὶν ἡμέρα, ἐν ᾗ ὁ Θεὸς τὸ σκότος καὶ τὴν ὕλην τρέψας κόσμον ἐποίησε, καὶ Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς ὁ ἡμέτερος σωτὴρ τῇ αὐτῇ ἡμέρᾳ ἐκ νεκρῶν ἀνέστη. “We celebrate conventions or assemblies commonly upon the Sunday, because it is the first day in which God separated the light from the darkness, and made the world, and on the same day Jesus Christ our Saviour arose from the dead.”—The first of these looks more like an excuse than a just reason; for if any thing of the creation were made the cause of a sabbath, it ought to be the end, not the beginning; it ought to be the rest, not the first part of the work; it ought to be that which God assigned, not which man should take by way of after-justification.

46. But in the precept of the sabbath, there are two great things. One was the rest, the other the religion of the day. The rest was in remembrance of their deliverance from Egypt; and therefore they kept their first sabbatic rest upon the very day in which their redemption was completed, that is, as soon as ever Pharaoh and his host were overthrown in the Red sea; and this because it was external, ritual, national, relative, and temporary, abused by superstition, and typical of something to come, without all contradiction is so perfectly ceremonial and consequently abrogated, that there can be no greater wonder than to see some christians such superstitious observers of the rest of that day, that they equal even the greatest follies of the Jews: who, as Munster out of the Rabbins observes, thought it unlawful to put an apple to the fire to be roasted upon that day, and would not pour out wine upon mustard-seed, nor take a clove of garlic from its skin and eat it, nor thought it lawful to pursue a skipping flea, nor to kill any creeping thing that had variety of sexes, nor to climb a tree lest they break a bough, nor by singing to still the cry of a child, nor to play upon the harp, nor by walking on the grass pluck up a leaf with the shoe. These, trifles as they were, such which even the Jew was no ways obliged to, so they are infinitely against christian liberty and the analogy and wisdom of the religion.

47. But the Jews say that Enoch and Noah, Abraham and Jacob, kept a festival to God, a memorial of the creation. If so, yet we find no rest observed by them, nor any intermission of their journeys; but it is reasonable to believe, that by some portions of their time, they did specially serve God, as well as by some actions of their life, and some portions of their estate: and to this it is not improbable that Moses did relate, when, to the words in Deuteronomy, "Remember to keep the day of the sabbaths to sanctify it," he adds ὅν τρόπον ἐνετείλατό σοι Κύριος ὁ Θεός σου, "according as the Lord thy God had commanded thee," meaning, at the beginning of the world: but in this part of the precept there was nothing of rest, but much of holiness and proper sanctification.

48. Now concerning this, the resolutions will be easy; that God should be served and glorified by us is a part of natural and essential religion; this cannot be done with nothing; there must be bodies, and gifts, and places, and time to do it in: the patriarchs did bind themselves, or were bound by God, to certain circumstances; for that which is indefinite and unlimited, shall neither be done constantly nor regularly: but since the day of the creation's ending was afterwards made the rule of fixing a day, it is also probable, that that also was the limit and rule for the patriarchs' religious solemnity; this indeed is denied by St. Irenæus, and Tertullian, and some others, affirming that the patriarchs who kept no sabbath, were yet pleasing to God: but because certainly it was so to the Jews, upon a reason which though it can be involved in a greater, yet it cannot totally be forgotten; it is more than probable that the religion of the day must never be forgotten; but God must have a portion of our time for his service, and the blessing which they were, both in and before the law, to commemorate, must also, by implication or else expressly, be remembered.

49. Upon this or some equal account, the primitive christians did keep the sabbath of the Jews; not only for their compliance with the Jews till the distinction were confessed and notorious; but because the moral religion, which was served by that day, was not brought into the religion of the Lord's day as yet; therefore the christians, for a long time together, did keep their conventions upon the sabbath, in which some portions of the law were read: and this continued till the time of the Laodicean council;² which also took care that the reading of the Gospels should be mingled with their reading of the law: which was, in a manner, the first public reasonable essay of uniting the religion of both days into one.

50. At first, they kept both days with this only difference,—that though they kept the sabbath, yet it was after the christian, that is, after the spiritual manner: in these exuberances and floods of religion, which overflowed their channels, one day of solemnity was not enough: but besides that they, by their sabbath meetings, had intercourse with the Jews in order to their conversion, and the Jewish christians, in order to the establishment of their religion, they were glad of all occasions to glorify God: but they did it without any opinion of essential obligation; and without the Jewish rest; and upon the account of christian reasons. Of this custom of theirs we find testimony in Ignatius,^a ἀλλ' ἕκαστος ἡμῶν σαββατιζέτω πνευματικῶς μελέτη νόμων χαίρων, οὐ σώματος ἀνέσει, δημιουργίαν Θεοῦ θαυμάζων, οὐχ ἔωλα καὶ χλιαρὰ πίνων, καὶ μεμετρημένα βαδίζων, καὶ ὀρχήσει καὶ χοροῖς, νοῦν οὐκ ἔχουσι, χαίρων. That was their way of observation of the sabbath. "Let every one of us keep the sabbath spiritually; delighting in the meditation of the law, not in the ease of the body; wondering at the works of God, not indulging to delicious banquets, and softer drinkings or dancings that do not better the understanding."—So that they kept the sabbath, not as did the Jews; who, as Munster affirmed, supposed it to be a keeping of the sabbath, if they wore better clothes, or ate more meat, or drank the richest wines: idleness, and luxury, and pride, are the worst ceremonies of the religion of the sabbath; the proper employment of that day is religion, which the Jews, and from them some of the most ancient christians, signified by "meditation of the law." But then he adds; Καὶ μετὰ τὸ σαββατίσαι ἑορταζέτω πᾶς ὁ φιλόχριστος τὴν κυριακὴν τὴν ἀναστάσιμον, τὴν βασιλίδαν, τὴν ὕψατον πασῶν ἡμερῶν. "After they have kept the sabbath, let every one that loves Christ, keep the day of the Lord; the day of the memorial of his resurrection; which is the queen and the supreme of all other days." And without further testimony we find it affirmed, in general, by Balsamo, παρὰ τῶν ἁγίων πατέρων ἐξισώθησαν διόλου σχεδὸν ταῖς Κυριακαῖς τὰ σάββατα. "The sabbath day and the Lord's day were, almost in all things, made equal by the holy fathers;" and some of them called them "brethren:" so Gregory Nysen;—some, καλὴν τὴν συνωρίδα τοῦ σαββάτου καὶ τῆς Κυριακῆς, so Asterius; "an excellent combination or yoke of the sabbath and the Lord's day:"—and ἡμέρας ἑορτῶν, so the canon of the apostles, "the feast-days," which Zonaras^b well explicates to the present sense, but the constitutions of St. Clement^c (which is indeed an ancient book) gives the fullest account of it; τὸ σάββατον μέντοι καὶ τὴν κυριακὴν ἑορταζέτω, ὅτι τὸ μὲν δημιουργίας ἐστὶν ὑπόμνημα, ἡ δὲ ἀναστάσεως: "Let the sabbath and the Lord's day be kept festival; that, because it is the memorial of the creation,—this, of the resurrection:"—and, therefore, whereas it is in the commandment, "six days shalt thou labour," &c. he says, that servants are to labour but five days: and upon this account it was, in the Greek church especially, and is to this day, forbidden to fast upon the sabbath and the Lord's day.

51. The effect of which consideration is this; that the Lord's day did not succeed in the place of the sabbath; but the sabbath was wholly abrogated, and the Lord's day was merely of ecclesiastical institution. It was not introduced by virtue of the fourth commandment; because they, for almost three hundred years together, kept that day which was in that commandment; but they did it also without any opinion of prime obligation, and therefore they did not suppose it moral. But there was together with the observation of the day a piece of natural religion, which was consequently moral; that is, a separation of some time for the glorification of God and the commemoration of his benefits. —Not that it can be reasonably thought, that the assignation of a definite time can be a moral duty, or that an indefinite time can be the matter of a commandment; and therefore I suppose it to be unreasonable to say, that although the seventh day is not moral, yet that one day is, or at least that some time be separate, is moral; for that one day in seven should be separate, can have no natural, essential, and congenite reason, any more than one in ten, or one in six: for as it does not naturally follow, that, because God ceased from the creation on the seventh day, therefore we must keep that holy-day, so neither could we have known it without revelation; and therefore what follows from hence, must be by positive constitution: now if it be said, “that it is moral, that some time be set apart for God’s service;”—I say it is true, that it is necessary, naturally necessary that it be so, but this cannot be the matter of a special commandment; because it being naturally necessary that God should be solemnly worshipped, this must suppose a time to do it in, as a natural circumstance, and needs not a commandment; which is sufficiently and unavoidably included in the first commandment, in which we are bound to serve God with religion. The fourth commandment enjoined a definite time, but that was ceremonial and abrogated: but an indefinite time is not a duty of this commandment, but supposed in that, which commands us to worship God. For we may as well worship God, and do no action, as worship him in no time. The definite time here named is taken away, and the indefinite time cannot be a distinct duty, but yet in imitation of the reasonableness and piety of that law, and in commemoration of a greater benefit than was there remembered, a day of more solemn religion was used by the christian church: for as on the Jewish sabbath, they remembered the creation and their redemption from Egypt: so on the Lord’s day, they commemorated the works of God, and their redemption from sin, hell, and the grave: but the first reason was to yield to the second; as the light of a lesser star falls into the glories of the sun, and though it be there, yet it makes no show, because a bigger beauty fills up all the corners of the eyes and admiration: and now the Lord’s day hath taken into itself all the religion, but not the rest of the sabbath; that is, it is a day of solemn worshipping God, and of remembering his blessings, but not of rest, save only as a vacancy from other things is necessary for our observation of this: because, as the Italians say, “Io non puo cantare e portare la croce,” “I cannot sing and carry the cross too;” a man cannot at once attend to two things of contrary observation.

52. That we are free from the observation of the sabbath, St. Paul expressly affirms;^d adding this reason, “Feasts, new moons, and sabbath-days, and meats and drinks, are but the shadow of things to come, but the body is of Christ:” where, by the way, let it be observed, that, upon the occasion of this and some other like expressions, the christian have supposed, that all the rites of Moses were types and figures of something in christianity, and that some mystery of ours must correspond to some rite of theirs. This fancy makes some impertinences in the discourses of wise men, and amuses and entertains the understanding of many with little images of things, which were never intended, and hath too often a very great influence into doctrines: whereas here the word σκιά τῶν μελλόντων, “the shadow of things to come,” means a shadow in respect of the things to come; that is, if these rituals be compared to the τὰ μέλλοντα, “those things which were to come,” they are but very shadows, and nothings: σκιά, or “shadow,” signifies not in relation, but in opposition, to “corpus.” “The shadow,” that is, a religion consisting but in rituals and exterior solemnities;—but christianity is “the body,” that is, that durable, permanent, true, and substantial religion, which is fit for all men, and to abide for all ages: and therefore, Hesychius, by “corpus Christi,” in this place, understands the word of “doctrine;” that is, a religion which consists in wise notions, ἐν ἀληθείᾳ, “in truth,” not in external rituals that signified nothing of themselves, but something by institution. Others by “the body of Christ” here, understand “the christian church;” in which sense the word is used by St. Paul^e to the Corinthians: and in this very place it means so, if the words be read, as some Greek copies do, that is, with conjunction and reference to the next verse: τὸ ἐκ σώματος τοῦ Χριστοῦ μηδεὶς ὑμᾶς καταβραβεύετω, &c. “Let no man make a gain of you, who are the body of Christ.” However, that St. Paul affirms the customs of the Pythagoreans in abstinence from flesh and wine, and of the Jews in their feasts and sabbaths, to be no fit matters, in which men are to be judged,—that is, for the not observing of which they are to be condemned,—but to be shadows and umbrages, not substantial parts of religion, is evident by the antithesis, however it be understood; but in order to other purposes, I observed here, that he does not mean they are types and figures; for the Pythagorean vanities did never pretend to this, but they and the other two are but shadows, empty and unprofitable in respect of the religion, which Christ brought into the world. They were ineffectual and insignificant; but only present entertainments of their obedience, and diversions and fixings of their thoughts apt to wander to the gentile customs; but nothing of natural religion.

53. Now although the primitive christians did also meet publicly upon the Jewish sabbaths, yet that they did it not by virtue of the fourth commandment, appears because they affirmed it to be ceremonial, and no part of the moral law, as is to be seen n Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, St. Cyprian, and others before quoted.^f And in the council of Laodicea,^g the observation of the Jewish sabbath, which, till that time, had continued amongst christians, was expressly forbidden: "Non oportet christianos iudaizare et in sabbato vacare, sed operari eos in eadem die, Dominicam præponendo eidem diei. Si hoc eis placet, vacant tanquam christiani, quod si conventi fuerint iudaizare, anathema sint:" "Christians must not keep the rest of the sabbath, but work upon that day, preferring the Lord's day before it. If they will rest on that day, let them rest as christians; but if they rest as Jews, let them be accursed:" that is, if they will keep the day holy, let them sanctify it as christians should sanctify their day,—that is, only with such a rest as ministers to the opportunities of religion, not so as to make the rest to be the religion of the day.

54. The Jewish sabbath being abrogated, the christian liberty, like the sun after the dispersion of the clouds, appeared in its full splendour: and then the division of days ceased, and one day was not more holy than another, as St. Paul^h disputes in his epistle to the Galatians, and from him St. Jerome;ⁱ and when St. Paul reproved the Corinthians for going to law before the unbelievers, who kept their court-days upon the first day of the week, he would not have omitted to reprove them by so great and weighty a circumstance as the profaning the Lord's day, in case it had been then a holy day, either of Divine or apostolical institution: for when, afterwards, it grew into an ecclesiastical law, and either by law or custom, was observed together with the Jewish sabbath, Constantine^k made a favourable edict, that the christians should not be impeached on those two festivals. Of which I only make use to this purpose, that among the gentiles these were law-days; and therefore the Corinthians must needs have been profaners of that day by their law-suits,—and therefore have been, upon that account, obnoxious to the apostolical rod, if the day had then, in any sense of authority, been esteemed holy.

55. But although there was no holiness in any day, yet they thought it fit to remember the great blessings of God, which were done upon certain days. An action cannot be separated from time; it must be done some day or other, and most properly upon the anniversary, or the monthly, or weekly mind; but yet this they did with so great indifference of observation, that it cannot look less than that there was a providence in it. For although all the christian church, that kept the Sunday festival, did it, and professed to do it, in remembrance of the resurrection of our Lord,—yet that the day of its memory was not more holy than any day, and was not of necessary observation, it appears by the eastern churches, and all the disciples of St. John, who kept the feast of the resurrection of our Lord, I mean the anniversary, the great, the prime feast, and that which was the measure of all the rest, not upon that day of the week on which Christ did rise, but on the day of the full moon, whenever it should happen. Now this must needs be a demonstration, that the day of the resurrection was not holy by Divine or apostolical institution: the memory of the blessing was to be eternal; and though the returning day was the fittest circumstance, yet that was without obligation; for if the principal was mutable, then the less principal could not be fixed; and this was well observed by St. Austin:^l "Hoc in iis culpat apostolus, et in omnibus qui serviunt creaturæ potius quam Creatori. Nam nos quoque et Dominicam diem et Pascha solenniter celebramus; sed quia intelligimus quo pertineant, non tempora observamus, sed quæ illis significantur temporibus:" "He first esteemed it to be a serving the creature more than the Creator, to observe any day as of Divine institution; but then if it be objected that we also observe the Lord's day and the feast of Easter; he answers, it is not the day we keep, but we remember the things done upon that day."—For the day is indifferent, and hath no obligation. God himself^m declared his dislike of the religion or difference of days, by an evangelical prophet: and what God the Father did then sufficiently declare, his holy Son finished upon the cross; and his apostles published in their sermons: only such days are better circumstanced, but not better days. The same is affirmed by St. Jerome upon the fourth chapter to the Galatians.

56. But now that we are under no Divine law or apostolical canon, concerning the Lord's day, we may, with the more safety, inquire concerning the religion with which it was accidentally invested. St. Cyprianⁿ and St. Austin^o suppose, that because circumcision was commanded to be on the eighth day, it did typically represent the Lord's day, which is the eighth from the creation: the council^p of Foro-Julium saith, that Isaiah prophesied of this day; and that the Jewish sabbath was the type of this day, was the doctrine of the fathers in the council of Matiscon.^q "This is the day which the Lord hath made," said the Psalmist, as he is expounded by Arnobius^r and divers others: "Exultemus et lætemur in eo, quia lumine vero nostras tenebras fugaturus illuxit; nos ergo constituamus diem Dominicam in frequentationibus usque ad cornua altaris:" "Let us rejoice and be glad in it, because the Sun of righteousness, dispersing the clouds of darkness, hath on this day shined upon us: let us, therefore, keep the Lord's day in solemn assemblies, even unto the horns of the altar."—Upon this day Christ finished the work of our redemption, which was greater than the cessation from creating the world; on this day he rose again for our justification, and, therefore, this is called by St. Ignatius, "the queen of days;" upon this day Christ twice appeared to his apostles after the resurrection; upon this day St. Paul^s appointed the collection for the poor, and, consequently, enjoined or supposed the assemblies to be upon this day; upon this day the Holy Ghost descended upon the apostles; and on this day St. Peter preached that operative sermon, which won three thousand souls to the religion; on this day St. John^t was in ecstasy, and saw strange revelations: so that it is true what Justin Martyr said, "Our blessed Lord himself changed this day;" that is, by annulling the sabbath, and by his resurrection and excellent appearances and illustrations upon that day; not by precept, but by indignation, and remarking that day by signal actions and a heap of blessings; so that it is no wonder that St. Cyprian and St. Leo, St. Ignatius and St. Austin, the councils of Laodicea, Matiscon, and Foro-Julium, of Palestine and Paris, speak so much of the advantages and prerogatives of this day, the celebration of which was so early in the christian church, that it was, though without necessary obligation, or a law, observed in all ages and in all churches. It is true that Socrates said, σκοπὸς μὲν οὖν γέγονε τοῖς ἀποστόλοις οὐ περὶ ἡμερῶν ἑορταστικῶν νομοθετεῖν, "It was the purpose of the apostles to make no laws concerning festival days:" but it is also very probable what one said; that "it descends from apostolical institution,"—"Servatâ tamen libertate christianâ," that is, the apostles did, upon the Lord's day, often meet, break bread, and celebrate the memory of Christ; and by their practice recommended the day as the most fitted for their synaxes or conventions; but they made no law, imposed no necessity, but "left the church to her christian liberty," and yet (that I may use the words of the fathers in the council of Matiscon) "justum est ut hanc diem celebremus, per quam facti sumus quod non fuimus:" "It is fit we celebrate this day, because of the blessing of the resurrection happening on this day, by which we became that which before we were not."

Quest. And now if it be inquired how we are to celebrate this day,—

57. I answer, that we are sufficiently instructed by those words of the Laodicean council, "vacent tanquam christiani:" there is a certain rule and measure by which christians keep their festivals. The Jewish manner was a perfect rest: the christian manner is an excellent religion and devotion; but no rest excepting such a rest as ministers to religion: abstinence from such works, which if we attend to, we cannot attend to the religion that is commanded, is essentially necessary, when the keeping of the day religiously and solemnly becomes necessary. There are also some corporeal works, which are properly celebrations of the day, or permitted in all religions upon their festivals: such as are acts of public or private benefit: works of necessity, little things, and unavoidable: which are sometimes expressed in this verse, Parva, necessarium, res publica, res pia fratri.

Among the old Romans, in their most solemn festivals, some things were specially permitted,

*Quippe etiam festis quædam exercere diebus
Fas et jura sinunt: rivos deducere nulla
Religio vetuit, segeti prætereunda sepem,*

^t Act. i. 10.

^u Acts xv. 21. Vide Acts xiii. &c. xiv. 27, 41. Luke iv. 16, 31. and xiii. 10.

"It was lawful to turn the water lest it might do mischief, or that it might do good; to stop a gap, a hedge, to prevent a trespass, to lay snares for birds, to water the cattle, to burn weeds:"—and religion forbids things of this nature.

58. But besides the laws and practices of heathen in the natural religion and observation of festivals we may be instructed by the same religion among the Jews and christians: reading and meditating the law was the religion of the Jews^u upon their feasts and sabbaths: "Moses of old hath them that preach him in every city, being read in the synagogues every sabbath day," said St. James. "Ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις τοῖς ἡγεῖταις, as Philo calls their synagogues, and they heard Moses and the prophets read and expounded: there they did all the actions of natural religion; there they taught piety and holiness, justice and government, economical and political affairs; and the measures of things good, and bad, and indifferent;"—and though, in their synagogues the exposition and meditation of the law was the principal employment: yet in their tabernacle and in their temple, which were their places of worship they offered sacrifice, and sang hymns, and praise and glorifications of God. This was the duty and the religion of their sabbath; not as it was a special separate feast, but because this was the employment fitted for all spiritual and religious feasts whatsoever.

Sancta dies oritur, linguisque animisque favete, Hoc dicenda bono sunt bona verba die.

All holidays are days designed for holy offices, for the celebration of the Divine name and the Divine attributes; for charitable and holy discourses. That rest which God superadded, being only commemorative of their deliverance from the Egyptian servitude, was not moral, nor perpetual; it could be dispensed with at the command of a prophet; it was dispensed with at the command of Joshua,—it was broken at the siege of Jericho,—it always yielded when it clashed with the duty of any other commandment; it was not observed by the priests in the temple, nor in the stalls by the herdsmen, nor in the house by the "major-domo;" but they did lead the ox to water, and circumcised a son; that is, it yielded to charity, and to religion, not only to a moral duty, but to a ceremonial: and therefore could not oblige us. But that which remained was imitable the natural religion which was used upon the Jewish festivals, was fit also for the holidays of christians.

59. And this also plainly was the practice of the christians, and bound upon them by the command of their superiors. 1. It was not σώματος ἀρέσκει, as St. Ignatius^x expressly affirms; the rest of the body is no essential duty of the christian festivals: that was a Judaical rite; but the christian is bound to labour even upon that day, says that holy martyr: for then there had been no positive inhibition. And the primitive christians did all manner of works upon the Lord's day, even in the times of persecution, when they are the strictest observers of all the Divine commandments: but in this they knew there was none; and therefore when Constantine^y the emperor had made an edict against working upon the Lord's day, yet he excepts, and still permitted, all agriculture, or labours of the husbandmen whatsoever; for "God regardeth not outward cessation from works, more upon one day than another," as St. Epiphanius disputes well against the Ebionites and Manichees.

60. Thus far was well enough, when the question was concerning the sense and extent of a Divine commandment; labour is a natural duty, but to sit still, or not to labour upon a whole day, is no where by God bound upon christians.

61. (2.) It was not ἀνέσει σώματος, but it is μελέτη νόμου, and δημιουργίαν Θεοῦ θαυμάζων, so the same father:^z "The meditation and exercise of the word of God, and admiring the works of God," that was the work of christian festivals:—and that they might attend this, they were commanded to abstain from servile works more or less, these or others respectively, in several times and places. "This we find in Justin Martyr,^a speaking of the christian sabbath and synaxes; the citizens and countrymen are assembled together, and first are read the Scriptures of the prophets and apostles; then the priest or president makes a sermon or exhortation to them to practise what they heard read; then all go to prayers; after this they receive the holy eucharist; then they give alms to the poor." This is the manner of the christian festivity. Now what cessation from the secular works is necessary, in order to the actions of religion; all that we may suppose to be accidentally the duty also of the day. To this purpose is that saying of St. Gregory,^b "Dominico die à labore terreno cessandum est, atque omni modo orationibus insistendum, ut si quid negligentiae per sex dies agitur, per diem resurrectionis Dominicæ precibus expiatur;" "On the Lord's day we must cease from worldly labour, and by all means persevere in prayer; that whatsoever in the six days was done amiss, may be expiated by the prayers of the seventh, the day of the Lord's resurrection." In the synod at Tours, in France, the religion of this day was also strictly enjoined: "Oportet christianos in laude Dei et gratiarum actione usque ad vespem perseverare;" "Christians must persevere in praising God, and giving thanks to his holy name until the evening:" that is, until the evening-song be finished, for then the ecclesiastical solemnity is over. They who were tied to this long office, could less be permitted to do any secular business; and according as the piety of the church increased, so the prohibitions of labour were the more strict; for that which was wholly relative, must increase and diminish according to the diminution or enlargement of the correspondent. Constantine forbade all labour but the labours of husbandry; but affirms the Lord's day to be the fittest for dressing or setting of vines, and sowing corn. Leo and Anthemius, emperors,^c forbade all public pleasures, vexatious suits or actions, arrests, and law days, appearances in courts, advocations, and legal solemnities on the Lord's day. The third council of Orleans permitted waggons, and horses, and oxen to travel upon Sundays, but forbade all husbandry, that the men might come to church. In an old synod held at Oxford, I find that on the Lord's day, "Conceduntur opera carrucarum et agricultura:" and I find the like in an old injunction of Queen Elizabeth, "Corn may be carried on Sundays, when the harvest is unseasonable and hazardous." In these things there was variety; sometimes more, sometimes less, was permitted. Sometimes fairs and markets, sometimes none; in which that which we are to rely upon, is this:

1. That because it was a day of religion, only such things were to be attended to, which did not hinder that solemnity which was the public religion of the day.

2. Nothing at all to be admitted, which was directly an enemy to religion, or no friend.

Of the first I have already produced sufficient witness. Of the second there is the less doubt, not only because natural reason does abhor all irregular actions, especially upon a day of religion, but because all the pious men and lawgivers of the christian church, have made complaints and restraints respectively of all criminal or scandalous actions upon that day. Witness St. Ignatius,^d Tertullian,^e St. Gregory,^f and St. Austin,^g bishop of Hippo; the twenty-third canon of the council of Toledo, the edict of Leo and Anthemius; all which complain of, and forbid, the evil usages of the profaner men who spend the Lord's day, which by the church of God, and in imitation of God himself, and in celebration of the greatest mystery of our redemption, was appointed for the solemn service of God,—in riotous eating and immoderate drinkings, vain feasts, and wanton dancings, interludes and songs, as if they intended to verify the scoff of Rutilius,^h

Septima quæque dies turpi damnata veterno,
Ut delassati turpis imago Dei.

And that the rest of the day did represent God to have been weary, but therefore was designed for wine, and the licentiousness of his servants.

3. The rest of the day was so wholly for the ends of religion, so merely relative to the public services of the church, so nothing of the proper and absolute duty of the day, that the fathers of the church affirm it to be better to work, than upon that day to be idle, and do nothing. So St. Austinⁱ expressly: "Melius faceret . . . in agro suo aliquid utile, quam si in agro otiosus existeret: et melius fœminæ eorum die Sabbati lanam facerent, quam quæ totâ die in neomeniis suis publice saltarent:" "To do something that is profitable in the field, is better than to sit there idle, and to spin is better than to dance."

4. In those places, where the offices of the church are not expensive of the whole day, it is lawful to do (upon just cause) any work that is not forbidden by our superiors, or scandalous to our brethren, in those portions of the day which are unemployed; and to deny this is called perverseness,^k and contrary to faith: "Quidam perversi spiritus homines prava inter vos aliqua, et sanctæ fidei adversa seminârunt, ita ut die sabbati aliquid operari prohiberent." They that forbid all manner of work as unlawful, by Divine law, upon the sabbath, are "prædicatores antichristi," "preachers of antichrist;" for he when he comes, says St. Gregory, "diem sabbati atque Dominicum ab omni faciet opere custodiri;" "shall forbid all working upon the sabbath, and the Lord's day."

5. The Lord's day, being set apart by the church for religion, ought to be so employed as the laws of the church enjoin, and no otherwise; and although it were an act of piety, not only to attend to public offices, but even to attend to especial and more frequent private devotions on that day than others, yet this is without all obligation from the church; concerning whose intention to oblige, we can no ways presume, but by her words and laws when she hath declared herself.

6. The question concerning particular works, or permitted recreations, is wholly useless and trifling; for "quod lege prohibitoriâ vetitum non est, permittitur intelligitur," says the law; "all that is permitted, which in the negative precept is not forbidden:"—but as for some persons to give themselves great liberties of sport on that day, is neither pious nor prudent; so to deny some to others, is neither just nor charitable.^l The ploughman sits still in the church, and the priest labours; and the wearied man is permitted to his refreshment, and others not permitted, because they need it not; and there is no violation of any commandment of God, even when there is a profanation of the day indulged upon pious and worthy considerations.

62. I end this with the words of Gerson:^m "Quilibet eo die absteineat ab omni labore aut mercatione aut alio quovis laborioso opere secundum ritum et consuetudinem patriæ, quam consuetudinem prælatus spiritualis illius loci cognoscens non prohibet; quod si aliquâ super tali consuetudine dubietas occurrat, consulat superiores;" "Upon the Lord's day we are to abstain from all merchandises, or other laborious work, according to the custom and law of the country; provided that the bishop, knowing of any such custom, do not condemn it: and if there be any doubt concerning it, let him inquire of his superiors." In all these cases, custom and the laws, the analogy of the commandment, and the designs of piety, christian liberty, and christian charity, are the best measures of determination.

63. I have now done with the two great exceptions, which are in the decalogue, and are not parts of the moral law. All the rest are natural precepts of eternal obligation; and are now also made christian by being repeated and renewed by Christ, and not only left in their prime, natural necessity; but as they are expounded into new instances of duty, so they put on new degrees of obligation.

64. As a supplement to this rule, and in explication of many emergent questions concerning the matter of the Divine laws, and their respective obligations, it will be useful to enumerate the signs and characteristics, by which we can, without error, discern which precepts are moral, and which are not: for this is a good and a general instrument and rule of conscience, and useful in many particulars.

The Measures of Difference, to discern between Moral Precepts and Precepts not Moral, in all the Laws of God.

65. (1.) All moral laws are such, whose prime and immediate measures are natural reason: but of precepts not moral, the reasons may be economical or political, some emergency of state or accident; a reason that passes away, or that is introduced by a special blessing or a special caution; a personal danger, or the accidents of conversation.—That we should obey our parents is a moral law. This we know, because for this we naturally, and by our very creation, and without a tutor, have many reasons, and see great necessities, and find abundant usefulness. For whoever is in need, cannot be relieved but upon such conditions as they, who are to relieve them, will impose upon them. Love and obedience are but gratitude and necessity; because all children are imperfect and helpless persons, living upon the love and care of parents and nurses: they derive their natures and their birth, their education and maintenance, from them; that is, they owe to them all that, for which any man can be obeyed and loved; they have on them all the marks and endearments of love and fear; they are, in respect of their children, useful and powerful, better in themselves, and beneficial to their descendants; and, therefore, the regal power is founded upon the paternal.

Αὐτὰρ ἰγὼν οἰκοῦ ἀναξ ἔσομ' ἡμετέροιο. HOMER.

And unless where God did speak by express voice, he never did speak more plainly, or give power to one man over another so plainly, as to parents over their children: their power is the fountain of all other, and the measure of all other: it hath in it the end and usefulness of all government, it hath love and it hath caution, it is for the good of the subjects; and though it keeps the honour in itself, yet the advantage ever passeth on to others. And then if we consider that children are a part of their parents, that the parents are blessed and cursed in them,—that there is in them towards their children a natural affection,—that the little image of immortality in which men desired to last for ever, is supplied to them by succession, which preserves their name and memory;—that parents are more wise, and more powerful, and before in time, and useful in all regards; that children cannot at first understand, nor do, nor speak; that therefore naturally they must be in the possession of them that can;—

that no man will quit his interest without just reason;—and these reasons of subjection being prime and natural, and some of them lasting, and all of them leaving an obligation and endearment behind them, they cannot pass away without leaving indelible impressions: it must necessarily and naturally follow, that children must pay to their parents the duties of love and obedience;

‘Ο δ’ ἐστὶ καὶ ζῶν καὶ θανὼν θεοῦ φίλος. EURIP.

It is the voice of nature: “He that honours his parents, is dear to God.”—Now when there is so much prime and natural reason,—or if there be but one that is so, which by nature we are taught, it is God’s mark upon an eternal precept: and whatsoever God hath commanded, that is naturally reasonable, that is, if it be naturally known, or if it be a reason that is not relative to times and persons, a reason that will not pass away with the changes of the world; a reason that enjoins a thing that is perfective of our nature, and which cannot be supplied by something else; all that is to be confessed to be a part of the moral law. But on the other side, if we take the instances of circumcision, and inquire whether this can be an eternal law; besides the ways of discovering this by the lines and measures of revelation, we can also tell by the causes of its injunction: it was appointed as a mark of a family, a separation of a people from other nations, the seal of a temporary covenant, a violence to nature, not naturally apt to signify or to effect any thing beyond the wound made by the sharp stone, a rite for which no natural reason can be given; and, therefore, it was never written in our hearts, but given in tables that could perish.

66. (2.) That, of which no reason can be given, is not a moral precept. Because all moral laws, being also natural, are perfective of human nature, and are compliances with our natural needs and with our natural and measured appetites; they are such in which all mankind feels a benefit; and where he sees his way: they are and have been found out by the heathen, drawn into their digests of laws; and there was never any law pretended to be moral, but they that did pretend it offered at a reason for it, derived from the fountains of nature. For every moral law being natural, either it must be naturally consonant to the understanding, or only to the natural desires: if to the understanding, then there is a discernible reason; if only to the desires, then the measure might be this, that whatsoever we naturally desire, shall become a natural duty;—which, if it could be admitted, would infer all the mischiefs and disorders of the world. Upon this account all sacraments and sacramentals are excluded from being moral laws, because they depending wholly upon Divine institution, whose reasons are very often secret and unrevealed, we can neither naturally know, nor naturally consent to them, and therefore can stand bound to them no longer than to the expiration of that period, for which they were invented.

67. (3.) The consequents of natural reason are no indications of a moral commandment. For moral laws are few, and founded upon prime reason, such as appears so to all discerning persons; but when once men begin to argue, and that their art or observation is also to be relied upon, it is so often deceived and always so fallible, that God’s wisdom and goodness would never put our eternal interest upon the disputations of men. It is said by some men to be of the law of nature, that spiritual persons should be exempt from secular jurisdiction; but because they infer this from some proportions of nature, the natural distinction of spiritual and temporal, by two or three remote and uncertain consequences, it is to be despised; though we had not, 1. so many precedents in the Old Testament to the contrary; and, 2. the example of our blessed Lord, who, being the head of all spiritual power, was yet subject to the civil magistrate; and 3. the express words of St. Paul speaking of the secular magistrate, and commanding “every soul to be subject to them;” that is, priests and monks, apostles, and evangelists, and prophets, as St. Chrysostomⁿ thence argues: and all this, 4. besides the notoriety of the thing itself; spirituality being a capacity super-added to persons, who by a former, that is a natural duty are subordinate to secular superiors. But besides all this; if the deduction of consequents shall be the measure of moral duties, then the wittiest disputant shall be the lawgiver, and logic will be the legislative; and there will be no term or end of multiplication of laws: for since all truth depends upon the prime and eternal truth, and can be derived from thence and return thither again, all actions whatsoever that can be, in any sense, good or useful, will be, in all senses, necessary and matter of duty. There is a chain of truths, and every thing follows from every thing, if we could find it out: but that cannot be the measure of laws; for besides that a thing is reasonable, there must be a Divine commandment; and if a good reason alone is not sufficient to make a moral law, a bad one is not sufficient to declare it. That all who are obliged by a law, should, at least by interpretation, consent to it, is said by many to be of the law of nature; yet this is so far from being a moral commandment, that, in some very great communities of men, the clergy, who are not the ignoblest part of the people, have no vote in making laws, nor power to choose their representatives. Indeed it is very reasonable and full of equity, that all states of men who are fit to choose for others, should at least be admitted to choose for themselves; yet because this relies not upon any prime natural reason, that necessarily infers it, but is to be trusted to two or three consequences and deductions,—men have leave to use their power, and may choose whether they will, in this thing, use the absolute power of a prince, or the more compliant posture of a father. This is better; but that is not, evidently, against a moral commandment.

68. (4.) A law that invades the right of nature, is not always the breach of a moral commandment. By the law of nature, no man is bound to accuse himself; but because it is not against the law of nature, if he does, and only against a privilege or right of nature, 1. the complicated necessities of men,—2. the imperfection of human notices,—3. and the violence of suspicion,—4. and the dangers of a third person,—5. or the interest of the republic,—6. or the concerns of a prince, may make it reasonable that a man be asked concerning himself, and tied to give right answers. A natural right is no indication of a moral law. But of this I have already spoken, upon another occasion.

69. (5.) Every consonancy to natural reason is not the sufficient proof of a moral law. For, as we say in natural philosophy, that τὰ φυσικά and τὰ κατὰ τὴν φύσιν, “things natural and things according to nature,” are not all one: it is according to nature, that they, who have the yellow jaundice, should look of a yellow colour; but this is not a natural affection, but preternatural, all the way. So it is in moral instances; it is consonant to nature, that we should not boil a kid in her mother’s milk, but this makes no moral law, for it is not against a natural law^o if we do. There are some little rationalities and proportions and correspondencies of nature, which are well and decent and pretty, but are not great enough to establish a commandment, or to become the measure of eternal life and death. Nothing less than the value of a man, or the concernment of a man, is the subject of moral laws; and God having given to a man reason to live justly and usefully, soberly and religiously, having made these reasonable and matters of conscience by a prime inscription, hath, by such prime reasons relating to God or man, bound upon us all moral laws. Man only is capable of laws; and therefore to man only, under God, can moral laws be relative.

70. (6.) When God gives a law, and adds a reason for it, it is not always the signification of a moral law, though the reason be in itself eternal,—unless the reason itself be proper, relating to the nature of the thing, and not matter of empire. For example; when God commanded the people of Israel to give the first-born to him or to redeem it, he adds this reason, “I am the Lord.”^p Now, although this reason be eternal, yet it is not a proper reason for this; but a reason by which he does or might enjoin all commandments: and it is also matter of empire and dominion, by which he can remonstrate his absolute supreme legislative power, which is reason sufficient for our obedience, but yet it is extrinsic to the nature of the precept; and therefore, upon this account, it cannot be called moral, whose reason is always natural, proper, and immediate. But yet even this very reason, although it is a matter of empire, yet when it is put to a commandment as a proper reason, and refers to the matter of the law, it is a certain token of morality: for thus this is the preface or the reason affixed to the first commandment; and something like it is in the second. For here, when God says, “I am the Lord,” it is a proper, natural, essential reason, inferring that therefore we must have no other gods, nor to any other thing that is not God give Divine honour.

^o Vid. Aquinat. 12. q. 95. art. 2.

^p Numb. iii. 12.

71. (7.) When God, in the Old Testament, did threaten the heathens, or punish them for any fact, it was not a sufficient argument to conclude that the fact to be done against a moral commandment; unless other things also concurred to the demonstration. This I made to appear in the instance of some marriages: and it relies upon this reason, because the nations were obliged by the precepts of Noah, all the instances or particulars of which were not eternal in their obligation.

72. (8.) All the instances or pursuances of moral law, are not as moral or necessary as the fountain; but that moral law is only to be instance in those great lines of duty, which are named, or apparently designed, in the letter or analogy of the law. That those who minister at the altar should be partakers of the altar, is a moral law, and a part of natural and essential justice and religion: in pursuance of this, the priests did eat of the sacrifices and were maintained by tithes and offerings; and thus this moral law amongst them was instance and obeyed. But though these were the ways in which the Jews did obey a moral law, yet these instances are not moral and eternal; because the commandment can be performed without them: and though the ox be muzzled when he treads out the corn, yet if he eats his fill before and after his work, there is no breach of the commandment. Thus also it is commanded, that “we should rise up to the grey head,” which is a pursuance of the fifth commandment; but yet this expression of reverence to old men is neither necessary at all time, nor yet to be done by all persons: another expression may do all the duty that is intended; and lastly, that, with civil circumstances, gives an alms to an old beggar, hath done more regard to him than he that gives him a compliment. For although moral commandments are sometimes signified with the investiture of circumstances or particular instances, yet because great reason is their measure, prime, natural, essential, and concreated reason, it is easy to make the separation.

73. (9.) The strong, violent, and firm persuasion of conscience in single persons, or in some communities of men, is not a sufficient indication of moral law. The weak brother, of whom St. Paul speaks, durst not eat flesh, but thought it an impie next to unpardonable, but he was abused: and there are at this day some persons, some thousands of persons, against whose conscience it is to dress me upon the Lord’s day, or to use an innocent permitted recreation. Now, when such an opinion makes a sect, and this sect gets firm confidants and zealous defenders, in a little time it will dwell upon the conscience, as if it were a native there; whereas it is but a pitiful inmate, and ought to be turned out of doors.

74. (10.) The consonant practices of heathens, a matter not expressly commanded by God to them, is no argument that what they did in that instance was by the light of nature, or a duty of a moral commandment. The heathens paid tithes to Hercules: they kept the seventh day sacred; they forbade their holy persons to make second marriages; but it will be too great an easiness upon this account to suppose these to be matter of essential duty: not only because (as Tertullian observes) the devil was willing to imitate the severity or customs and rites of God's church, to make his own assemblies the more venerable, symbolical, alluring, and persuasive;—but because the nations, to whom God commanded tithes, sabbaths, and the like, had intercourse with many others, and were famous in the world by blessing and miracles, by the laws and oracles of God, by excellent government, and the best learnings. The Phœnicians conveyed many Hebrew customs into Greece, and some learned persons went to school in Palestine, and taught their own nation some mysteriousnesses, which themselves learned under the Jewish doctors: and when the judaizing christians did pertinaciously retain circumcision, they might, upon this ground, have pretended it to be consonant to the law of nature; because even the gentiles, the Egyptians, the Arabians, all the nations that descended from Ishmael and Esau, and divers other nations, their neighbours, did use it. But, consent is no argument, when it is nothing but imitation.

75. (11.) The appendant penalty of temporal death, imposed by God Almighty upon the breakers of a law, does not prove that law to be of eternal obligation. I instance in the gathering sticks upon the sabbath,—the omitting circumcision,—the approaching a wife “in diebus pollutionis;” all which were made sacred by the greatest penalty, but yet had not the greatest obligation; they were not moral.

76. (12.) When two laws are in conflict and contest, and call for an impossible obedience, one must yield to the other; but that which must yield is not moral and eternal. The observation of the sabbath, and doing acts of charity, did often interfere in the actions and occurrences of our blessed Saviour's life; but the sabbath was always made to yield to charity. Thus sacrifice and mercy, the outward work and the inward, the letter and the spirit, do often make contrary pretensions; but sacrifice, and the outward work, and the letter, are to yield and to comply, and therefore are but the expressions, or instances, or significations of a moral duty; but of themselves have no morality. This holds in all instances, and hath no exception.

77. (13.) By the not considering of these measures, a great part of mankind have been deceived; but they could only be secured by the first, which, because it is also possible to be mistaken in the application, by reason of the miscarriages and confidence of some men, therefore the last resort of all moral laws is to the scriptures of the New Testament; in which, whatsoever is commanded to all mankind, is either moral in its nature, or is so by adoption; which last clause I put in by reason of the sacraments, and some glorious appendages of morality, and heroical acts of charity, commanded by Christ: the observation of which, although it be not moral or of prime natural necessity, yet because they are commanded by Christ, whose law is to oblige us as long as the sun and moon endure; to us christians, and to all, to whom the notice of them does arrive, it is all one in respect of our duty, and hath no real difference in the event of things. But if, from the Old Testament, men will (as it is very often attempted in several instances) endeavour to describe the measures of moral laws, the former cautions are of necessary observation.

RULE VII.

There is no State of Men or Things, but is to be guided by the Proportion of some Rule or Precept in the Christian Law.

1. THAT is, where there is no law to restrain us, we may do what we please; but where we are tied up to rules and measures, we have no lawgiver, or fountain of religion, but God, who in these last days hath spoken to us only by his Son, who, as he is supreme in all things, so he is every way all-sufficient; and as by him only we can be saved, so by him only and by his Spirit we must be governed. To this purpose we believe that he hath taught us all his Father's will: he is “the Author and Finisher of our faith;” and therefore to him, and to an obedience to him, we must bring our understanding: we pray that his “will may be done here, as it is in heaven;” and therefore he is perfectly to rule our wills here, for we are sure he does rule all above: we have no lawgiver but him,—no rule but his will,—no revelation of his will but in his word:—and besides this, we have no certain place where we can set our foot. The laws of the Jews were either for them and their proselytes alone, or were adopted into the christian code: right reason gives measures of things, but of itself makes no laws, unless it be conducted by a competent authority. The prophets were either expounders of Moses's law, or preachers evangelical; that is, either they called to obedience in things not moral; or, if they did, they only spake the sermons of the gospel, and whatsoever was excellent in all the world, was but a derivation from the wisdom of the eternal Father; and all this was united into a system of holy precepts, at the appearing of the eternal Son: and since “there is no name under heaven, by which we can be saved, but only the name of Jesus,” and he saves us not only by procuring pardon for them, but by turning us from our iniquities,—by efforming us anew,—by reforming whatsoever was amiss in manners and persuasion,—by conforming us to the similitude of the holiness and perfections of God, and brings us to glory by the ways and methods of grace, that is, never leaves us till our graces are perfect, and even with eternal felicities; it follows that we must go to him,—that he must teach us and guide us,—that he must govern us and persuade us,—that his laws must be our measures, his wisdom must be our star, his promises our aims; and we may as well say there can be two principles, as that, besides him, there can be any eternal and supreme lawgiver. One is more than all the numbers of the world.

2. And if we look into the nature of his laws, we shall handle this truth as the people on mount Sinai did see thunder: all excellencies have as perfect unity as any one hath; and there can be but one justice, and it is the same grace of mercy which dwells in the bowels of all the good men and women in the world; and of temperance there can be but one general measure; and unchastity is a certain prevarication of one excellency that is known to all the world. And as for religion, since there is but one God, and he is to be worshipped as himself pleased, and to convey his blessings to us by what mediator and by what instruments himself shall elect;—there can be in these things no variety, unless there be a plain deficiency in the means of the Divine appointment. All the duty of mankind is in religion, justice, and sobriety; and, in all these things, God, by Jesus Christ, hath given us many laws, and besides them he hath given us no other; we have but one Lord, and therefore but one lawgiver and measure of justice; we have but one faith, and therefore but one religion; we have but one baptism, or solemnity of renunciation of the flesh, the world, and the devil, and therefore but one rule for our comportment; one measure of sobriety according to the unity of our nature, which, being made after the image of God, is one as God is one. If, therefore, our blessed Lord be a perfect lawgiver, his law alone must be the measure of our duty and obedience; but if he be not a perfect lawgiver, whither shall we go to understand the will of God? “Master, whither shall we go? for thou hast the words of eternal life,” said St. Peter:^a there is the question, and the answer too; and they, together, make the argument a demonstration. For if we can obtain eternal life by the words of Christ, then they contain in them the whole will of God; for he that fails in one, is imperfect, and loses all; and therefore, in the words of Christ, there is a perfect provision for an entire obedience, because they are a sufficient way to life eternal.

3. The effect of this consideration is,—that all the measures of good and evil must be taken by the evangelical lines. Nothing is to be condemned, which Christ permits; and nothing is to be permitted, which he condemns. For this is the great prerogative and perfection of Christ’s law, above that of Moses; some things by Moses were permitted for necessity, and “because of the hardness of their hearts:” thus divorces and polygamy became legally innocent, because a perfect law was too hard for that people, and, like a yoke upon a young ox, would have galled them, not subdued them; and if he had strained too hard, the silver cords of discipline would have been first broken, and then despised. But when Christ came, he gave perfect laws, and more perfect graces; he made the capacities of his obedience larger, and fitted the law and the subject by even, and natural, and gracious proportions, and permitted nothing which his Father loved not: and now every plant that God hath not planted, must be rooted up: and therefore this law must needs be absolute, and alone, and unalterable, and perfect, and for ever; and this appears infinitely upon this account, that although our nature is such, that it will always be growing in this world towards perfection and therefore that it is imperfect, and our obedience will be imperfect; yet even this Christ does not allow, or positively permit: but commands us to be perfect, that is, to go on towards it, to allow nothing to ourselves either of crime or of suspicion, to be perfect in our desires, to be restless in our endeavours, to be assiduous in our prayers, never to think we have comprehended, never to say it is enough; and if our blessed Master does not allow of any imperfection of degrees, but thrusts the most imperfect forwards to perfection, it must be certain, that, in his provisions and his laws, there can be no imperfection, but he hath taken care for all things on which eternity depends, and in which God is to be glorified and obeyed. And therefore, in no case can it be allowed to any man, or to any company of men, to do any thing which is not there permitted.

4. Quest. Upon the account of this rule it is to be inquired, whether it can be lawful for a prince or a republic to permit any thing for the public necessities of the people, which is forbidden by the laws of Jesus Christ.

5. To this I answer with a distinction:—that if the question be, whether in any cases there may be actual impunity,—there is no peradventure but there may; for sometimes it is necessary, as when a multitude sins: for then the remedy is much worse than the disease, and to cut off all would effect, “ut nemo sit, quem peccasse pœniteat,” there would be justice without discipline, and government without subjects, and a cure without remedy. And therefore it is, that princes, in the mutinies of armies, or in the rebellion of their people, use to cut off the heads of offenders, or decimate the legions, as Cæsar and Germanicus did: but if it be part of the people, though a considerable part, and the action highly criminal, we find great examples, that executions have been done by subjects, by the innocent part, and then all the offenders suffered. Thus it happened in the mutiny of Cæcina’s legions, and their defection to the Ubii, the innocent part cut off the rebels: and thus it was commanded by Moses, who punished all them who worshipped the golden calf, by the sword of the Levites; he set every man’s hand against his brother, and none of the criminals did escape. But sometimes it is impossible to punish all; and, very often, the evil would be more than the good. For, in all penal laws and inflictions, although there be much of vindictive justice, yet this justice is but a handmaid to government and correction. When revenge is not allowed, discipline, then it is no government, unless tyranny be the name of it. So that, in such cases, it may be lawful to spare some who need it indeed, but deserve it not.

6. But if, by impunity, be meant a legal immunity, it must either mean, that a law shall warrant the action, or that it shall, before-hand, promise indemnity: if it warrant the action, which the evangelical law hath forbidden, it is like the laws of Omri, it is “statutum non bonum,” and erects a government against the law of Christ: if it condemn the action, but promises indemnity, it diparages itself, and confesses its own weakness: but as the first can never be lawful, so neither can the second ever be made so, but with these cautions.

Cautions to be observed in civil permissions of an unlawful act or state.

7. (1.) That the thing so permitted, be, in the present constitution of affairs, necessary; and yet will not be without the evil appendage. Thus it is necessary, that in all communities of men, there be borrowing and lending; but if it cannot be without usury, the commonwealth might promise not to punish it; though of itself, it were uncharitable, and consequently unlawful. For it is either lawful, or else it is unlawful, for being against justice or against charity. If it be against justice, the commonwealth, by permitting it, makes it just; for as it is in the economy of the world, the decree of God doth establish the vicissitudes of day and night for ever: but the sun, by looking on a point, not only signifies, but also makes the little portions of time, and divides them into hours; but men, coming with their little arts and instruments, make them to be understood, and so become the sun's interpreters; so it is in the matter of justice, whose great return and firm establishments are made by God, and some rules given for the great measures of it; and we, from his laws, know just and unjust, as we understand day and night: but the laws of princes, and the contracts of men, like the sun, make the little measures, and divide the great proportions into minutes of justice and fair intercourse; and the divines and lawyers go yet lower, and they become expounders of those measures, and set up dials and instruments of notice, by which we understand the proportion and obligations of the law, and the lines of justice: just and unjust we love or hate respectively by our warrant from God; and from him also we are taught to make the general lines of it; as, Do what you would be done to,—restore the pledge,—hurt no man,—rob not your neighbour of his rights,—make no fraudulent contracts,—no unjust bargains:—but then what are his rights, and what are not; what is fraudulent, and what is fair; in what he hath power, in what he hath none, is to be determined by the laws of men. So that if a commonwealth permits an usurious exchange or contract, it is not unjust, because the laws are the particular measures of justice and contracts, and therefore may well promise impunity, where she makes innocence, as to matter of justice. But if usury be unlawful because it is uncharitable, then when it becomes necessary it is also charitable comparatively; and as to charity no man, by the laws of God, is to be compelled (because it is not charity if it be compelled; for God accepts not an unwilling giver, and it is not charity, but an act of obedience and political duty, when, by laws, men are constrained to make levies for the poor); so much less can they be compelled to measures and degrees of charity; and if to lend upon usury be better than not to lend at all, it is, in some sense, a charity to do so: and if it be when it will not be otherwise, there is no question but the prince, that allows indemnity, is not to be damnified himself. I instanced in this; but in all things else, where there is the same reason, there is the same conclusion.

8. (2.) Impunity may be promised to any thing forbidden by the law of Christ, if it be in such cases, in which the subject matter is disputable and uncertain, whether it be so or no; then it may. Thus it happens in questions of religion, in which it is certain there are many resolutions against the truth of God; but yet they may be permitted; because, when they are probably disputed, no man is fit to punish the error, but he who is certain, and can make it appear so to others, that himself is not deceived.

9. (3.) Whatsoever is against the law of Christ, in any instance, may not be directly permitted for the obtaining a greater good, but may for the avoiding of a greater evil, which is otherwise indeclinable. If a prince be perfectly persuaded, that the suffering the doctrine of transubstantiation is against the laws and words of Christ, it may not be suffered, though the parties interested promise to pay all the gabels of the nation, and raise an army to defend it: but if a rebellion cannot otherwise be appeased, it is lawful; not only upon many other accounts, which are appendant to the subject matter, but because when two evils are before me, neither of which is of my procuring, I am innocent if I suffer either, and I am prudent if I choose the least, and I am guilty of no crime, because I am but a suffering person: but if I do it to obtain a greater good, I choose the evil directly, because I am not forced to pursue the greater good; I can be without it: and although I may choose the least evil, because I cannot avoid that or a greater; yet when the question is, whether I shall permit an evil or lose an advantage, I may escape all evil, at no greater price than by losing that advantage: so that here is no excuse, because there is no necessity; and in matters of duty no good can make recompence for doing any evil: but the suffering of a lesser evil is highly paid for by the avoiding of a greater.

10. (4.) When any such evil against the laws of Christ is permitted, the evil itself must be so re-proved, that the forced impunity may not give so much encouragement to the crime as the censure must abate. The reason is, because no evil must be done at any price; and we must rather lose our life than cause our brother to offend; and if each man is bound to this, then every man is bound to it. But because impunity is the greatest encouragement to sin, and next to the pleasure or interest of it, is the greatest temptation; care must be taken that what serves the interest of the republic, may not deceive the interest of souls; and this being the greatest, ought infinitely to be preferred; and therefore unless something be directly done, that may be sufficient security against the probable danger, no interest of the commonwealth is to be served against it; because none is sufficient to be put in balance against one soul.

11. (5.) This impunity (especially if it be in the matter of sobriety) must not be perpetual, but for a time only, and must be rescinded at the first opportunity. Thus St. Austin, when he complained of the infinite number of ceremonies which loaded the church, and made her condition more intolerable than that of the Jews under the Levitical yoke, adds this withal, that this was no longer to be tolerated than till there was a possibility to reform. And when St. Gregory had sent Augustin the monk to convert the Saxons, he gave him advice not to press them at first too passionately to quit their undecent marriages, which by their long customs and the interest of their families they would be too apt to hold too pertinaciously, and with inconvenience, but afterwards it would be done.

12. (6.) Till the impunity can be taken away, it were an act of prudence and piety, and in many cases, of duty, to discountenance the sin by collateral and indirect punishments: thus the old Romans confined their lupanaria to the outer part of the city; it was a summœnium, and their impure women had a name of disgrace, and a yellow veil was their cognizance: and so the Jews are used in some places: but thus we find that St. Paul and the apostles tolerated those christians, which, from among their own nation, gave up their names to Christ; who yet were polygamists, or, which was equivalent,—had married a second wife, their first being living and divorced: but although this could not well be avoided, lest they should be vexed into apostasy, and their Judaical hardness of heart was not yet intenerated sufficiently by the softer and sweeter sermons of the gospel; but yet to represent their dislike of such marriages, which they were forced to tolerate, they forbade such persons to be taken into their clergy, so punishing such persons by a privation of honour, whom they could not punish by a direct infliction of censures, or separation from their wives.

13. (7.) In all such tolerations of evil, the secular interest must be apparently separate and declared to stand far off from any thing of the religion; and the consciences permitted to stand or fall under them, who are to take care of them and answer for them; the permission by the civil power is not to rescue them from the ecclesiastical rod: for it being a matter of civil interest, is not to derive any countenance from religion, so much as accidentally: for no powers of man can forbid the servants of Christ to preach his law, to declare his will, and to get subjects to his kingdom, and to turn sinners from the error of their way: if they do, they must not be obeyed, but God must; and if they die for it, they are well enough.

14. But now against the doctrine of the rule many things may be objected; for there seem to be many things and great cases, for which the laws of the holy Jesus have made no provision. I instance in a very great one, that is, the whole state of war, and all the great cases and incidents of it. For since it is disputable whether christianity allows of war, and it is not disputable, but very certain, that it speaks nothing of it expressly, neither gives any cautions concerning it in particular, it will seem to be a "casus omissus" in the law. To this there may be many considerations offered.

Of the Measures of War by Christ's Laws.

15. (1.) If it be said that all war is unlawful, against the analogy and against many express lines of our religion; it is indeed a short way of answering this difficulty, but will involve the whole christian world in many more; but of this in the following numbers I shall give accounts.

16. (2.) If it be said, that christianity leaves that matter of war wholly to be conducted by the laws of nature and nations; we shall find, that this will entangle the whole inquiry, but we shall never come to any certainty. For if the christian law be, as I have proved, a perfect digest of the natural law; to say the affairs of war are to be conducted by the laws of nature, is not to put them from being determined by the christian law, because they are the same; and if, in the law of Christ, there be no rules of war, neither can there be any in nature. But besides this, if the laws of nature which concern war, be not set down in the gospel and writings of the New Testament, but that we be sent to look for them in the tables of our own hearts, in which some things are disordered by passion, and many more are written there by interest, and some by custom, and others by education, and amongst men these are the authors of contrary inscriptions, we shall find the law of nature a strange thing by that time we have drawn it from thence only, and looked over it to find some rules of war, whose whole being is very much against the excellent and perfective laws of nature.

17. (3.) If it be said, that war is to be conducted by the measures of peace, we speak what is impossible to be true; for "inter arma silent leges," not only because the sword is licentious and impudent, but because the cases of peace and war are wholly different.

18. (4.) If it be said that right reason must be the measures; I answer, that if right reason could be heard, possibly there would be no war at all; and since one part begins the war against reason, it is not likely that he, for any reason that can be urged, shall lose his advantage. But besides this, who shall be judge? whose reason shall rule? whose arguments shall prevail? and will he who is "minor in causa" be "minor in prælio," he who hath the worst at the dispute, yield also in the fight? and are not the "pugnacissimi," the fighting men, such as will hear and understand the least reason?

19. (5.) Some will have the law of nations to be the measure of war; and possibly it might, if there were a digest of them, and a compulsory to enforce them; but there being neither, they are uncertain what they are, and are admitted with variety and by accident, and they shall oblige strangers when the men are conquered; and subjects, by the will of the prince; that is, the measures of war shall be the edicts of any single general, and nothing else.

20. In the midst of these oppositions it will be hard to find something certain; but that which can most be relied upon, is this. That christian religion hath made no particular provisions for the conduct of war under a proper title, because it hath so commanded all the actions of men, hath so ordered the religion, so taken care that men shall be just, and do no wrong, hath given laws so perfect, rules so excellent, threatenings so severe, promises so glorious, that there can be nothing wanting towards the peace and felicity of mankind, but the wills of men. If men be subjects of Christ's law, they can never go to war with each other; but when they are out of the state of laws and peace, they fall into the state of war; which being contrary to peace, is also without all laws. So that the injurious person is not to inquire how to conduct his war, for he is gone beyond all law into a state of things, where laws are of no value: but for the injured person, he is just so to comport himself as he can; having one measure of action, and another of defence.

21. "For his defence:"—it is not to be measured by laws, but by privileges: that is, things being gone beyond the laws of nature, he is left to his natural powers and defences; and is to do this without any other limit, but that he defend himself and his relatives, and drive away the injury. That is, there being no law of God to forbid him to defend himself, he is at his liberty, which naturally every man hath: "Hoc et ratio doctis, et necessitas barbaris, et mos gentibus, et feris natura ipsa præscripsit, ut omnem semper vim, quâcunque ope possent, à corpore, à capite, à vitâ suâ propulsarent."^r "The learned are taught by reason, the barbarous nations by necessity, the civil by custom, the very beasts also by nature, to defend their head, their body, their life from all injury by all means." For God hath no where forbidden that a man shall be defended:

we may put on armour to defend us against an armed malice: he hath indeed forbidden private revenges, because those are intrusted to the laws and public persons; but when a single person is injured, he can defend himself or crave the patronage of princes and the laws; but when public interests are violated, when kingdoms and communities of men and princes are injured, there is no law to defend them; and therefore it must be force: for force is the defensive of all laws; and when all laws are injured, there can be no way to reduce men to reason, but by making them feel the evils of unreasonableness. If this were not so, then all commonwealths were in a worse state of affairs than single persons: for princes are to defend each single person; and the laws are to secure them; but if the laws themselves be not defended, no single person can be; and if they could, much rather should all. Whatsoever is absolutely necessary, is certainly lawful; and since Christ hath no where forbidden kings to defend themselves and their people against violence, in this case, there is no law at all to be considered: since there is a right of nature, which no law of God hath restrained; and by that right all men are equal; and therefore, if they be not safe from injury, it is their own fault or their own unhappiness; they may, if they will, and if they can:

and they have no measures in this, but that they take care they be defended, and quit from the danger and no more. The "jus naturæ," the rights and liberties, the equalities and privileges of nature, are the warrant of the defence, or rather there needs no warrant, where there is no law at all: but this right of nature is the measure of the defence, we may be defended as much as we need.

22. But then if it be inquired, what is the measure of actions which must be done in the conduct of the defence by the injured prince or republic, and how shall they be measured, if Christ in his laws hath made no provisions and described no rules? I answer, "that the measures of action in public are no other than the measures of the private;" the same rule of justice is to be between princes and between private persons: they also must do as they would be done to; they must keep covenants, perform their words, hurt no innocent person whom they can preserve, and yet preserve themselves; they must keep themselves within the limits of a just defence: and as in private contentions and repetitions of our right we must look after justice, but do nothing against charity, we must defend our rights, but do the adversary no wrong, and by no vexatious measures, secure our own interest, and destroy his just right, in an unnecessary conduct of our own; so it is with princes: he that is injured may drive away the injury, he may fight against invaders, he may divert the war, if it be necessary; but he may not destroy the innocent with the guilty, the peaceable countrymen with the fighting soldiers. And nothing can legitimate that but an absolute necessity, that is, it must not be done at all, when it can be understood, and when it can be avoided; and there is no direct action of war, but it is to be ruled by necessity, and justice, and charity; and in these there is no variety of the rule, and no change except what is made by the subject matter, which must be made to combine with the measures of justice and charity, by the instruments of reason, and customs, and public fame, and all the measures of wise and good men.

23. Wars are so to be managed, as private contentions are, and there are the same rules for both, that is, when they are equals; but if it be a war betwixt subject and superior, it is on the prince's part to be conducted as other acts of public justice. When a single executioner can punish offenders, that is enough; if one cannot, more must: for it is every man's interest, that the injurious should be punished; and he that can raise the country troops by law, to assist the executions of justice, may raise all the troops of his kingdom to do the same duty, when there is a greater necessity: but for the subjects who take up arms against their superior, there is no answer to be given by what measures they must conduct their arms, there is no measure at all for them but one, to lay them down, and never to take them up again. For it cannot be expected, that a wise and a holy lawgiver should give rules for the banditti to manage their violences, or the Circassians how to conduct their plunder and their robberies. Christ never gave any laws concerning rebels, but obedience and repentance: and for just wars, that is, the defensive wars of princes, (for there is no other just, but what is defensive directly, or by a just equivalent,) Christ hath given no other laws, but the same by which single persons, in their contentions or differences, are to be conducted. And thus also St. John the Baptist gave the same measures to the soldiers, which contain every man's duty, "Do violence to no man, and be content with your wages." For war is but the contention of many: and as it is in social contracts, which are to be governed by the same justice as private merchandise, so it is in social contentions: for in this case, two and two thousand make no difference in the rule, but much in the circumstances of the matter.

24. Quest. But upon this instance it is seasonable to inquire, whether the precedents of the Old Testament be so imitable by them that go to war, that they can pass into a law, or if not, yet whether they are safe or no?

25. The question, though instanced in the matter of war, yet is of use in all affairs whatsoever, because there are divers portions of mankind, 1. who think every thing is imitable, which they find done in the Scriptures; and, 2. nothing safe or warrantable, that is not: these being their measures of right and wrong, have great influence into the questions of conscience, and therefore are to be established upon certain rules.

Of the Negative Measures of Examples in the Old Testament.

26. (1.) Therefore it is evident, that not every thing done in the Old Testament is a warrant for us. I instance in all the injustices and violences, rapines and open prevarications of natural rights, concerning which there needs no further disquisition; but we are to keep ourselves to the rule, that is, to God's measures, not to man's, "non quâ itur, sed quâ eundum;" and "we must not follow a multitude to do evil." "Argumentum pessimi, turba est. Quæramus, quid optime factum sit, non quid usitatissimum: et quid nos in possessione felicitatis æternæ constituat, non quid vulgo, veritatis pessimo interpreti, probatum sit:"^s "The crowd is the worst argument in the world: let us inquire not what is the most usual, but what is most excellent:" let us look after those things, which may place us in the bosom of beatitude, not those which can tune with the common voices, which are the worst interpreters of truth in the whole world: and therefore that some persons were recorded in the Scriptures, is no hallowing of the fact, but serves other ends of the Spirit of God. But in this there is no question.

27. (2.) The actions of good men in Scriptures are not a competent warrant for our imitation, not only when they are reprov'd, but even when they are set down without censure. The reasons are plain: 1. Because all the stories of the Bible are not intended to be sermons; and "the word of God is useful for doctrine, for reproof, for exhortation, and for information;" not every comma, and period for every one of these purposes,—for they are contrary; but in the whole there is enough to make "the man of God perfect and readily instructed to every good work," to every holy purpose. Therefore as we must not imitate the adultery and murder of David, which are expressly condemned, so neither may we dissemble madness, as he did at Gath; nor persuade another to tell a lie for us, as he did to Jonathan, that he should say he was gone to Beth-lehem when he went but into the fields, and to pretend sacrifice when it was a very flight. 2. Because every man is a liar, and therefore unless himself walks regularly, he can be no rule to us. 3. Every servant of God was bound up by several measures, and by his rule he was to take account of his own actions, and therefore so are we of his. 4. There were in the Old Testament greater latitude of permission than there are to us: polygamy was permitted "for the hardness of their hearts," but it is severely forbidden to us; and though, without a censure, we find Jacob to be husband to two sisters at once, yet this cannot warrant us, who are conducted by a more excellent Spirit, taught by a more perfect institution, governed by a severer law under the last and supreme lawgiver of mankind. μείζονα ἐπιδείκνυσθαι δεῖ τὴν ἀρετὴν, ὅτι πολλὰ ἡ τοῦ πνεύματος χάρις ἐκκέχυται νῦν, καὶ μεγάλη τῆς τοῦ Χριστοῦ παρουσίας ἡ ὥρα, said St. Chrysostom. "we christians ought to show a greater virtue, and more eminent sanctity, because we have received abundance of the Spirit of God, and Christ's coming is a mighty gift;" and if we should derive our warranties from the examples of the Old Testament, it were all one as if, from the licenses of war, we should take pattern for our comportment in the days of peace and laws, or from children learn what were the measures of a man. 5. Because sometimes the actions of good men were in them innocent, because done before a law was given to them; but the syn-bolical actions by a supervening law afterwards became criminal. Thus, although the drunkenness of Noah is remarked without a black character, and plainly told without a censure, it cannot legitimate drunkenness in us, because he was not by any positive law bound from a free use of wine, directly by proper provision, but we are. 6. Because the actions of holy men in Scripture are complicated, and when they are propounded as examples, and the whole action described, there is something good and something bad, or something naturally good and something peculiar and personally good, which cannot pass into example. Thus, when St. Paul speaks of Gideon and Jephthah, Samson and David, Deborah and Baruch, who "through faith subdued kingdoms;" here their subduing kingdoms by invasion and hostility, is not propounded as imitable, but their faith only; and therefore let us follow their faith, but not their fighting, and carry the faith to heathen countries, but not arms. So, when the fact of Razis is propounded as glorious and great, which he killed himself to avoid Nicanor,^u the whole action is not imitable, but only so much of it as was pious and prudent; and the other is to be praised as being the choice of a lesser evil, or is to be left to its excuse, as being necessary and unavoidable.

^u 2 Mac. 15.

28. (3.) The actions of men in the Old Testament, though attested and brought to effect by the providence of God, is no warrant for our practice, nor can they make an authentic precedent. I instance in the fact of Jeroboam, who rebelled against the house of Solomon; although God was the author of that change, and by his providence disposed of the event, yet Jeroboam had rules to have gone by, which if he had observed, God would, by other means, have brought his purposes to pass; and Jeroboam should not have become a prodigy, and a proverb of impiety. For a man is circumscribed in all his ways by the providence of God, just as he is in a ship: for although the man may walk freely upon the decks, or pass up and down in the little continent, yet he must be carried whither the ship bears him. A man hath nothing free but his will, and that indeed is guided by laws and reasons; but although by this he walks freely, yet the Divine providence is the ship, and God is the pilot, and the contingencies of the world are sometimes like the fierce winds, which carry the whole event of things whither God pleases. So that this event is no part of the measure of the will; that hath a motion of its own, which depends not upon events and rare contingencies, or the order of secret providence; and therefore this which could not commend his action, cannot warrant our imitation.

29. (4.) Actions done in the Old Testament, though by a command of God, do not warrant us, or become justifiable precedents, without such an express command as they had; if the command was special and personal, the obedience was just so limited, and could not pass beyond the person. Thus Jehu took up arms against the house of Ahab, by the command of God, who intended to punish him severely. But we may not lift up our hand against our prince, though he be wicked, unless God give us such an express commandment: for nothing is imitable, but what is good. But in this there was nothing good but the obedience; and therefore nothing can legitimate it but a commandment.

30. (5.) Actions of good men, if done upon a violent cause, or a great necessity, are not imitable, unless it be in an equal case, and a like necessity. "David, when he was hungry, went into the priests' house, and took the bread, which was only lawful for the priests to eat," and to this example Christ appeals; but it was in a like case, in a case of necessity and charity. He that does the same thing, must have the same reason, or he will not have the same innocence.

31. (6.) Examples, in matters of war, are ever the most dangerous precedents, not only because men are then most violent and unreasonable, but because the rules of war are least described; and the necessities are contingent and many, and the reason of the action depending upon heaps of circumstances (of which, peradventure, no notice is recorded) can less be understood; and after all this, because, most commonly, they are unreasonable and unmerciful.

That David made the people of the Ammonites to pass under saws and harrows of iron, is not safely imitable by christian soldiers; because it had so much cruelty, which either must be criminal, or have an extraordinary legitimation, which, it is certain, christian princes cannot have, unless it be by a rare contingency, and a new revelation, to which they can never reasonably pretend. But that they may drive out an invading army, that they may kill them that resist, that they may by war defend the public rights, in which all the private are involved,—they may safely take for their warrant the example of Abraham fighting in behalf of the king of Sodom; the act of Melchisedec, in blessing God for the success of that battle; the wars of the judges, and of David: because these were just and necessary by special command, or necessary defence; faith was the great instrument, and God's blessing gave them prosperity; they were against no law, and the like cases God hath not since restrained, and therefore we, of ourselves, being left to the rights of our nature, and unconfined by the laws of God, proceed prudently, when we have the confidence of such great examples; against which the interest of no law is publicly, the interest of no virtue is secretly engaged.

32. (7.) When a law is changed, the examples which acted in proportion to that law, lose all manner of influence and causality, and cannot produce a just imitation. Among the Jews, it was lawful for a private person to transfix his brother or his father, if either of them tempted him to idolatry; and in a cause of God they might do public justice by a private hand. All the actions of their zealots, done in such instances, are no examples to christians; because when that priesthood was changed, the law was changed, and then the nature of the action passed from lawful to unlawful; and therefore could not be imitated. He that is to write Greek, must not transcribe it by the Hebrew alphabet; and when the copy is altered, the transcript must also receive variety and specific difference. Thus the disciples of our Lord would fain have done as Elias did; but Christ told them that he was not imitable in that, by telling them that the Spirit, which is the principal or great instrument of action, was wholly changed. It was not safe for them to do as Elias did, because they were to do as Christ commanded. Thus we find, in the Old Testament, King Solomon dedicating and consecrating of a temple; it was a new case, and he was an extraordinary person: and the christian church hath transcribed that copy so far as to dedicate and consecrate churches or temples to the service of God; but she does it by the ministry of bishops, who are amongst us the presidents of prayer, and have those special assistances and emanations of the Holy Spirit upon their order, which Solomon had in his own person, and much more; and therefore though the act is exemplar, yet it is not imitable as to the person officiating: because to do so is not properly the effect either of power or of office; but being to be done in the way of prayer, is by the reason of the thing itself; and the constitution of the church appropriate to the presidents of religion.

Of the Example of Christ.

33. (8.) In the New Testament, we have so many, so clear, so perfect rules, that we have no need of examples to instruct us, or to warrant our practices; but examples to encourage and to lead us on in the obedience of those rules. We have but one great example,—Jesus Christ;—who, living in perfect obedience to his Father, did also give us perfect instruction, how we should do so too in our proportion. But then how far Christ is imitable, and ought to be imitated by us, is best declared in this short rule.

34. In whatsoever he gave us a commandment, in that only we are bound to imitate him: but in whatsoever he propounded to us as excellent, and in whatsoever he did symbolically to it, in all that also we may imitate him.

35. This rule establishes the whole case of conscience in this affair. Because our blessed Saviour, being an extraordinary person, was to do some extraordinary things, in which either we cannot, or we ought not to imitate him. He fasted forty days; we cannot: he whipped the buyers and sellers out of the temple; we may not, without the authority of a public person:—he overthrew the tables of the merchants; but the young man in Portugal,^x who, being transported with zeal and ignorance, beat the chalice and the sacrament out of the priest's hand, out of passion against his idolatrous service, (as he understood it,) had a sad event of his folly amongst men; and what reward of his zeal he found with God, is very uncertain. But whatsoever he taught to mankind, of that also he became a glorious example: but “by the sermons only we are instructed, by the example encouraged:”^y for “admonetur omnis ætas fieri posse, quod aliquando factum est :” we see it possible to be done what Christ commanded us to do, and then did, that “we might follow his steps.”—But his example, in these things, makes up no part of our rule, because it is perfect without them: here our rule is perfect, and so is our example; but because Christ did some things beyond our rule, and past our measures, and things of personal virtue and obligation, therefore we are to look upon Christ as imitable, just as his life was measured by the laws he gave us; where they are, even there we also must endeavour to be so. There is this only to be added: that in the prosecution of his obedience to his heavenly Father, he sometimes did actions “in gradu heroico,” of great excellency; which although they are highly imitable, yet they pass no obligation upon us, but that we endeavour to tread in his steps, and to climb up to his degrees, and to desire his perfections. That these pass upon us no other obligation, appears, because they are sometimes impossible to be attained to; and they are the highest and the best, and therefore are not a direct matter of duty, which belongs to all, to the highest and to the lowest. But that these do pass upon us an obligation to endeavour to attain them, and of labour towards them in our circumstances, appears in the greatest instance of all, the highest obedience, even that which was unto death; for

“therefore Christ hath suffered for us, leaving an example to us, that we might follow his steps:” that is, when he had given his church precepts, and propounded to them rewards of suffering, he also was pleased to give us the greatest example as a commentary upon his own text; declaring that the commandment did extend to the greatest instance and that we should do as he did, “obediens factus usque ad mortem,” “he was obedient even unto death;” and so must we, when God requires it in particular. And that this is our duty, and that the obligation reaches thus far, is certain upon the interest of love; for we must love him, who is our Lord and our God; we must love him with all our heart and with all our powers; and therefore endeavour to be like him: ἡ δὲ σύμφωνος τῷ νόμῳ τιμῇ, ἡ τῇ οὐσίας τῶν τιμωμένων γνώσει, καὶ ἡ πρὸς αὐτὴν κατὰ δύναμιν ἐξομοίωσις. “Ο γὰρ ἀγαπα τις, καὶ μιμεῖται, ὅσον οἶόν τε” ὡς γὰρ φάσιν οἱ Πυθαγόρειοι τιμήσεις τὸν θεὸν ἄριστα, ἐὰν τῷ θεῷ τὴν διάνοιαν ὁμοιώσης.^a The greatest honour we can do to God and God's law, is to understand God, and to become like to him. For every one imitates that which he loves. “Religiosissimus cultus est imitari,” said Lactantius; “that is an excellent instance of the Divine worship, to endeavour to become like to the holy Jesus.”

36. (9.) But this is to be reduced to practice, so as that, 1. The duty be certainly imitated; and, 2. The degree of duty aimed at; 3. And the instance be chosen with prudence and liberty. Thus when we find, that Christ did spend whole nights in prayer, the duty here recommended is earnestness and diligence in prayer. In this we must imitate our blessed Lord; because his rule and his example make τὴν καλὴν συνωρίδα, “an excellent confederation and society. But then to do it with that vehemence and earnestness, that degree of diligence, is a rare perfection, which we can only tend to in this life; but we must do what moral diligence we can: and as for the instance and particularities of duty and devotion, we are yet at greater liberty; for we are not obliged to pernoctation in prayer, so we pray earnestly and assiduously, which is the duty,—an endeavour to do it like Christ, which is the passion of the duty, and the degree of love, and the way to perfection; but that it be in the night, or in the day, is but the circumstance of the duty; nothing of the nature, nothing directly of the advantage of it; and is to be wholly conducted by prudence and consideration of accidents.

37. (10.) After all this, as Christ must be imitated in all matter of duty, and is imitable in degrees of duty, and that for the circumstances of it we are wholly at liberty,—so also it is in matters of his own ordinance and institution, in which the religion is to be obeyed; the design is to be observed and promoted, the essentials of the observation to be infallibly retained; but in the incidences and collateral adherences which are nothing to the nature of the rite, nor at all appertain to the religion, there is no obligation, no advantage, no love, no duty, in imitating the practice of our blessed

Saviour. Thus to celebrate the blessed sacrament of the Lord's supper with bread and wine, to do it in remembrance of his death, to do it as he commanded, in obedience to him, to receive it "à præsidium manu," "from the hands of the presidents of religion,"—is matter of duty, and matter of love, and matter of obedience; but to suppose we are bound so to imitate the actions and circumstances of the actions of Christ, as that it is duty or necessity that we take it in unleavened bread, to mingle water with wine, to receive it in wines of Judea, to receive it lying or leaning on a bed, to take it after supper, is so far from being matter of love or duty, and a commendable imitation of Christ, that it is mimical and theatrical, trifling and superstitious, a snare to consciences, and a contempt of religion; it is a worshipping of God with circumstances instead of forms, and forms instead of substances; it is like burning mushrooms upon the altar, and a converting dreams into a mystery; it is flattery, not love, when we follow our Lord in those things, in which he neither gave command, nor did any thing of religion or excellence, that is, in which he neither propounded himself imitable, nor to be obeyed. For what worthiness was there in it, that Christ did eat this supper at supper time; or that when he did institute this, he was at his other supper, and did as the fashion of the country was at his supper? What religion was there in it, that he drank the wine of his own country? and what ceremony or mystery was it, if, according to the usages of sober persons, he put water into his wine for his ordinary beverage? and how could these become matters of religion or imitation, when they were only the incidences and investitures of the ordinary actions of life and conversation? and, in these things, the interest of religion is conducted competently by common reason. He that follows the vices of his prince, does like the man that worshipped Mercury by throwing stones at him; and he serves him with a mischief, and to please his vicious prince, thrusts him forward to eternal ruin. But he that, to humour him, carries his neck aside, or shrugs his shoulders in the same manner, or holds his knife at dinner by his pattern, is a flatterer; but he only loves his prince, and is a worthy servant, who fights bravely if his prince be valiant, and loves worthy things by his example, and obeys his laws, and celebrates his fame, and promotes his interest, and does those things in imitation, for which his lord is excellent and illustrious in all the world.

38. But because against a rule no example is a competent warrant; and if the example be according to the rule, it is not the example, but the rule, that is the measure of our action; therefore it is fit to inquire, of what use it can be to look after the examples either of the Old or New Testament; and, if it be at all, since the former measures are not safe, to inquire which are. In which inquiries we are not to consider concerning examples, whose practices are warranted by rules; for in them as there is no scruple, so neither is there any usefulness, save only that they put the rule into activity, and ferment the spirit of a man; and are to the lives of men, as exhortation is to doctrine; they thrust him forward to action, whose understanding and conscience was pre-engaged.

Of the Use of Examples in the Old and New Testament.

39. But then if it be inquired,—What use examples are of beyond the collateral encouragement to action, and which are safe to be followed?—I answer:

40. (1.) That in cases extraordinary, where there is no rule, or none that is direct or applicable with certain proportions to the present case, then we are to look for example, and they are, next to the rule, the best measures to walk by. But this is of no use in any matter, where God hath given a law; but may serve the ends of human inquiry in matters of decency and personal proportions, when men are permitted to themselves and their intercourse with others. For the measures of human actions are either the τὸ ἅγιον καὶ τὸ δίκαιον, "that which is holy and that which is just;" and of this our blessed Lord hath given full rules and measures; or else the measure is, τὸ καλὸν καὶ τὸ πρέπον, "that which is worthy and becoming such a person:" and because laws do not ever descend to such minutes, the practices and examples of imitable and exemplary persons is the auxiliary of laws. But this is coincident to that of fame and reputation; thus if it be inquired, in the days of persecution, whether it be fit to fly or to abide the worst,—although we are, by all general rules, unlimited and unconstrained, and so the question of lawful or unlawful will cease, yet because it may be a question of the τὸ πρέπον, we may look about and see, what such men as we are and ought to be, have done: "Shall such a man as I fly?" said the brave Eleazar: he did not, and so made up the rule by becoming a worthy precedent.

41. (2.) In complicated questions, when liberty and necessity are mingled together, rule and example together make the measures. Thus if it be inquired, how we are to comport ourselves towards our king, and what are the measures of our duty towards a tyrant or a violent injurious prince: the rule is plain, "we must not strike princes for justice;" and we must not hurt the Lord's anointed, nor revile the ruler of the people; but if we inquire further concerning the extension of a just defence, the example of David is of great use to us, who not only comported himself by the laws of God and natural essential reason, but his heart smote him for that he had cut off the lap of Saul's garment; and, by his example, kept us so far within the moderation of necessary defence, that he allowed not any exorbitancy beyond it, though it was harmless and without mischief.

42. (3.) In the use of privileges, favours, and dispensations, where it is evident that there is no rule, because the particular is untied from the ligatures of the law; it is of great concernment, that we take in the limits of the best examples. And in this we have the precedent of our blessed Saviour to be our guide: for when, in the question of gabels or tribute-money, he had made it appear, that himself was, by peculiar privilege and personal right, free; yet that he might not do any thing, which men would give an ill name to, he would not make use of his right, but of his reason, and rather do himself an injury, than an offence to others. This is of great use in all the like inquiries; because it gave probation, that it is better to depart from our right, than from our charity; and that privileges are then best made use of, when they are used to edification.

43. (4.) In all matters of doubt, when the case seems equal to the conscience on either hand, so that the conscience cannot determine,—there the examples of wise and good men are of great use to cast the balance, and to determine the actions: for to an equal scale every grain, that is added, will be sufficient to make the determination. If it be disputed, whether it be lawful to rely upon the memory of our good works, and make them as an argument of confidence in God; and the rules of conduct seem antinomies, and when we think God's goodness and justice is warrant for the affirmative, and yet the rules and precepts of humility bear us to the negative; between these two, if they stand on equal terms, the example of Hezekiah is sufficient to make the determination.

44. (5.) The greatest use of examples is in the interpretation of laws: when the letter is equivocal, and the sense secret, or the degrees of action not determined; then the practice of good men is the best external measure we can take; for they are like “sententiæ judicatæ” in the law: the sentences of judges and the precedents in the like cases, by which the wisest men do often make their determinations. Thus the example of David in dividing the spoil between them that fought and them that guarded the stuff, as being a sentence in a question of equity, became a precedent in the armies of Israel for ever after.

45. These are the uses we may make of examples in Holy Scriptures, and ecclesiastic writers; which uses are helps to our weakness, but no arguments of the imperfection of Christ's law; for all these uses are such, which suppose us unable to make use of our rule, as in the case of a doubting conscience,—or not to understand it, as in case of interpretation;—or else are concerning such things, which are not direct matter of duty, but come in by way of collateral obligation; as in matter of decency and personal proportions: for which, although examples may apply them, yet the laws of Christ have given us the general measures.

46. But then, since there is this use to be made of them, and the actions of men in Scripture are, upon so many accounts, as I before reckoned, imitable and unfit precedents: the next inquiry is, What are the positive measures, by which we may know what examples are imitable and fit to be proceeded in?

The positive Measures of Example, and which may be safely followed?

47. (1.) In this, the answer hath but little difficulty, not only because of the cautions already given in the negative measures, but because the inquiry is after examples in cases where the rule is not clear and evident, not understood, or not relied upon: and they being in some sense used only to show the destitution of a rule, may, with the less scruple be followed, because if there be no rule clear enough to guide the action, neither will there be any to reprehend the example: therefore that which remains is this:—

48. (2.) That example is safe, whose action is warranted by God's blessing. Thus the piety of the Egyptian midwives was imitable, in that they refused to kill the Lord's people at the command of Pharaoh; for it is said, “Therefore God did build them houses;” it was mingled with an officious liberty, but that was but accidental to their action, and not part of its constitution, and therefore not relative to the reward: but whatsoever God says he rewards with a blessing, that, in equal circumstances, may be safely imitated. I do not say whatsoever that is blessed or is prosperous, is imitable; for it may be prosperous, and yet unblessed in one regard, and accursed in another; or successful to-day, and blasted to-morrow; or splendid in this world, and damned in the next; or permitted for the trial of God's servants, or the extinction of their sins; or the very thriving of it may be the biggest curse, and nurse up the sin into its monstrous ugliness; and is no other but like the tumour of an ulcer; it swells indeed, and grows very great, but it is a sore all the way, and is a contradiction to prosperity, and sin never “thrives,” unless it be in the most catachrestical and improper way of speaking in the world: but I say, when it is said, or plainly enough signified in Scripture, that God did bless the man for so doing; that for which he was blessed, that may be said to be only imitable. And on the other side, though an action be described in story without its mark of good or bad, it is a great condemnation of the action, if the event was intolerable, and the production was a mischief: and thus was the drunkenness of Lot condemned,—because incest was the product;—and of Noah,—because shame and slavery were the two daughters of it.

49. (3.) Because in these examples, for which there is no perfect rule, the concernment is not direct, but a collateral duty, not matter of direct obedience, but fame and reputation, that “thing” which honest in the sight of all men be provided; therefore such examples only are to be followed which “are of good report.” A man shall not be called a just person, if he invades his neighbour's rights, and carries war to dispossess a people that live in peace, upon pretence because we find in Scripture that Nimrod did so, because he was an infamous person: but when Joshua kept the Gibeonites alive, because, though he was deceived by them, yet he swore to them, and yet did make them to be slaves to his people; he is very imitable both in one part and in the other; and we may not break our words upon pretence we were deceived, but yet we may do all that we can justly do for the interest of our relatives: and all this can well depend upon the example of Joshua, because his fame is entire.

50. (4.) We must be careful to distinguish the examples of things lawful, from the examples of things good and just: and always imitate these, but with caution follow those; not only because what was lawful in the Old Testament is not always so in the New;—but that what is lawful at all times, at some times is not fit to be done. But then, let every example be fitted to the question. If the inquiry be, whether this action be holy or no,—an example that declares it lawful, does not answer that question; but if it be asked, whether it be lawful,—the example, proving it to be holy, does conclude the other more strongly.

51. (5.) When evident signs of piety, like veins of silver in the grosser earth, are mingled with the example, it adds many degrees of warranty to the determination. Thus our blessed Saviour, in his apology made for his disciples, appealed to the example of David eating the bread of proposition; it was, indeed, an argument to them depending upon the fame of the patriarch; but yet our blessed Saviour knew there was in it great charity, and lines of piety to his hungry followers, when David neglected a ceremony, that he might do a charity and relieve a necessity, and therefore Christ did it, not because David did it, but because he might. David's action was not Christ's warrant, but the piety of the thing was warrant to them both. And, indeed, this is the right use of examples: by the advantage of the man's fame they may reprove an adversary, but by the great lines of piety mingled with the body of the action, they may become a precedent for our imitation.

I have now given accounts concerning that principle (mentioned Num. 25.) which affirms every thing to be imitable, if done and described in the Scripture, unless it be signally forbidden. Concerning the other—That nothing is safe or warrantable that is not,—I reserve it for its proper place.

CHAPTER III.

OF THE INTERPRETATION AND OBLIGATION OF THE LAWS OF JESUS CHRIST.

RULE I.

In negative Precepts the Affirmatives are commanded; and in the affirmative Commandments, the Negatives are included.

1. Nor he that gives the law only, but he who authoritatively expounds the law, becomes to us a lawgiver; and all who believe in God and in Jesus Christ, confess themselves subjects of the christian laws; but all do not obey alike, who confess themselves equally bound, and are equally desirous to obey: because men, by new or false or imperfect interpretation of laws, become a law unto themselves or others, giving them measures which our blessed Lord never intended; and yet an error in these things is far more dangerous than in a thousand others, in which men make great noises. I shall therefore endeavour to describe plain and rational measures of interpretation, that we may walk securely.

2. It is observable, that in the decalogue, and so in the whole law of Moses, there are more negative precepts than affirmative. The Jewish doctors say, that there are six hundred and thirteen precepts given by Moses, according to the number of letters in the decalogue, which are six hundred and thirteen. But of these, two hundred and forty-eight are affirmative, according to the number of the joints of a man's body: but three hundred and sixty-five are negative, according to the number of the days of the year: but to omit these impertinent and airy observations of the Jews, it ministers some useful and material considerations, that in the decalogue, all the moral precepts, one only excepted, are negative (for that of the sabbath is the “caput ceremoniarum”); but that of obedience to our superiors is only positive and affirmative. The reasons were these, by which also we can understand the usefulness of the observation.

3. (1.) Because this, being the first great reformation of the world, was to proceed by the measures of nature; from imperfection to growth; from the beginnings of religion to its greater excellencies: but in nature, the first step of our progression is to abstain from evil;—

Virtus est vitium fugere, et sapientia prima,

and therefore the face of the commandment was covered with the robe of discipline, and God would so secure their services, that they should not displease nor anger him; but the excellencies of holiness, by which he was to be endeared to mankind, were especially the glories of Christ, not the horns of Moses, the perfections of evangelical sanctity, not of the beginnings of the law.

4. (2.) The great sanction of the law was fear of punishment; and therefore God chose to represent his law to them in negatives, that according to the endearment, so might be the obedience. Now to abstain from evil is the proper effect of fear, but to do good for fear of punishment, is as improper as to threaten a man into love. Fear is the bridle of servants and boys; love is the spur of brave and good men.

"Non furtum feci, nec fugi," si mihi dicat Servus, "habes pretium, loris non ureris," aio:
"Non hominem occidi;"—"non pasces in cruce corvos."
HORACE.

That is the dialogue of masters and servants: If you be a thief, you shall be condemned to the mill; if you be a murderer, you shall be broken upon the wheel: but if you abstain from such crimes, your reward shall be, you shall escape the furea.—Since, therefore, the spirit of the law was the spirit of fear and of bondage, God did transact his covenant with them in negative measures.

5. (3.) The law of Moses was a pursuance of the covenant of works; and since it had in it very little beside the umbrages of the χρηστός ζύγος, "the sweet yoke" of the gospel, it did stipulate for exact measures: but therefore the precepts were negative, that the obedience might be the more possible, and the injunction the nearer to paternal: for it is much more possible to abstain from sins of commission than from sins of omission: so that, is the best measure of obedience to the Mosaic law: "he is the good man, who cannot be accused to have done what the law forbids; he who hath done the fewest evils, not he who does the most good:" and thus also the pharisees understood their duty: and they were not reproved by our blessed Lord, for understanding the negative precepts by the rules of abstinence and a negative duty; but because they understood their negative duty only by the measures of the letter, not of the intention and spirit of the law: and, 2. because when they had been, by the commentaries of the prophets and other holy men, instructed in some evangelical measures, and more perfect intendments secretly at first designed by God, and so expounded by the prophets by way of evangelical preparation, yet they would still adhere to the old and first understandings of the law: because they loved some sins which, as they had known, were forbidden by those negative precepts, if they would have opened their hearts to understand them as they should.

Optimus est qui minimis urgetur, HORACE.

6. (4.) That the fifth commandment is affirmative in the midst of all the commandments that are negative, hath a peculiar reason, but nothing against the former discourse: for it being a sanction of obedience to our superiors under God, is to be expressed in actions and external significations; not only because these only can do benefit, service, and advantages to our parents and princes, but because of nothing else can they be judges. Men take no cognizance of thoughts and secret purposes, but of outward significations; and therefore the precept was to be affirmative, that is, preceptive of outward actions. 2. There is in children toward their parents so much natural love, and so much fear, and they are so long under their power and the needs of minority, that it will very rarely happen, that children can despise their parents or curse them: their own interest, and their own passions, and their own affairs, will secure the negative measure of that commandment; and therefore the world was in this instance disposed to receive greater degree of injunction and a higher commandment: nature in this instance doing the same office for them as the whole law did in the other; that is, it was παιδαγωγός, "a schoolmaster," to bring them to Christ: and if they had been as much disposed for the entertainment of the rare and excellent affirmative commandments of Christ in the matter of chastity, and charity, and meekness, and humility, as in the matter of duty to their parents, there would have been less need of the interposition and interval of the law of Moses before the coming of Christ.

7. And these observations are verified by the ἀντιστροφή, or "corresponding part:" for the precepts of Christ are positive and affirmative, as appears in his sermon on the mount, which is the summary of his law;—in which when he expounded the negative commands of Moses, he still superadded an affirmative of his own: so that it will be nothing but matter of speculation to discourse, whether or no, in the law of Moses, the affirmatives were included in the negatives; it is certain the Pharisees did not understand them so; and they are not always involved in the nature of each other, and the promises of the law were not sufficient to encourage the ἀγαθοεργία, "the doing of good works," though the fear was enough to restrain the evil: but that which concerns the conscience, is that which now is evident and palpable. In the laws of Jesus Christ the negative and affirmative are but correlatives "opposita relativa," and do infer each other. Thus we find it expressed^a often, "Whoso looketh on a woman to lust, hath committed adultery:" that was our blessed Lord's commentary on the sixth commandment, which was negative; but he adds,^b "If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out."—So again, "Resist not evil;" that is the negative precept; but Christ adds, "If any man sues thee at the law and takes thy coat, let him have thy cloak also."—So in the matter of oaths, Christ said, "Swear not at all:" for he still added a more severe negative to the negative of the law; but then he adds his own affirmative: "Let your communication be yea, yea, nay, nay;" that is, let it be plain and simple, meek and positive, easy and ingenuous.

8. Thus our blessed Lord did in his recitation and exposition of the moral commandments delivered by Moses; in the interpretation and enlargement of which, although it was proper to declare a negative by a negative, yet he would follow his own method and design, and superadd his own affirmative; and when he was doing the office of a lawgiver rather than of a prophet and expounder of the old law, there his words were positive and affirmative. Witness the eight beatitudes; the precepts of charity and humility, of giving and forgiving, of fasting and prayer, and many others: but because in the doing all this, he made large discourses, and gave laws and exhortations, precepts and reasons, promises and threatenings, in complication and mutual consequences; therefore we are, without further inquiry, sufficiently instructed, that our duty is now intended to be complete; and as we must abstain from all evil, so we must do all the good we can.

^b Ver. 39, 40.

9. But this is to be understood with its proper caution. For we say in logic, "ad negationem non semper sequitur affirmatio oppositi:" "every negative does not presently infer every contrary affirmative," as a matter of duty. It follows well, "Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but thou shalt pay to the Lord thy vows," but it does not follow, that therefore thou shalt make vows. So in these also there is no consequence of obligation. Thou shalt not take from thy neighbour what is his; therefore thou shalt give to thy neighbour:—thou must take from none; therefore thou must give to all:—thou must not give false testimony; therefore thou must tell all the truth thou knowest:—thou mayest not give wrong judgment, therefore thou must give right;—for it may so happen that you need not give any at all. These instances point out to us the measures of affirmatives, which follow from the contrary negatives. Thus:

10. (1.) Affirmative duty follows from the negative; not in contraries, but in contradictories. To make a vow and break a vow are contraries; and therefore, it follows not, because I must not break a vow, therefore I must make one: but to break a vow and not to break it are contradictories, and therefore if one be forbidden, the other is commanded; and if the commandment be expressed in negatives, "Thou shalt not break thy vows," the affirmative is in the bosom of it, therefore thou shalt keep them: because, unless this part of the contradiction be done, the other is, and therefore it is not enough, that we do nothing expressly against the instance of the vow; but we must also understand ourselves obliged to the performance of it, according to the first intention. The reason of this is, because between two contraries there can be a third thing of a disparate nature; not at all included or concluded by either part, either by inference or by opposition.

11. (2.) From a negative an affirmative is not always inferred, in a particular instance. We must not be uncharitable in any instance; but it follows not, that by virtue of this commandment, therefore we must be charitable, or do our alms in every instance: for every man is not bound to redeem captives, or to visit prisoners: the reason is, because uncharitableness and visiting prisoners are not opposed in their whole matter and nature; but the commandment which is contrary to uncharitableness, can be obeyed according to all its intention, although it be not instanced in that particular. But this is to be added; that when, by accidents and circumstances, and the efficacy of some other commandment, we are called upon to this instance; then that this be done, is by virtue even of the negative, by the prohibition of uncharitableness,—because when we are determined to an instance, the sanction of the whole commandment is incumbent on it, and will not be satisfied without it; but in other cases it is indifferent, and is obeyed by any instance that is fitted to our circumstances and to our powers. It is like a man's stomach, which, of itself, is indifferent to any good meat, but when, by a particular κρᾶσις or accident, it requires this and nothing else, it must either have this or it will fast. So are affirmative laws; though they oblige to every instance, and are indifferent to any that we can and may, yet sometimes we are determined to this and no other, and then the whole force of the law is upon it. But else, ordinarily it is true, that the universal negative infers only the indefinite affirmative, not the particular: the universal is only inferred by the consequence, the particular by accidents and circumstances.

12. (3.) From a negative law the affirmative is inferred, but not in the same degree of duty and necessity. It is not so great a sin, if we neglect an act of charity, or an opportunity of doing glory to God, as if we do an act of uncharitableness, or positively dishonour God. The reason is, because sins of omission are less than sins of commission, because negligence is not so bad as malice,—and of omission, sometimes, there is no evil cause, but a mere negative or unavoidable inadvertency; but of a sin of commission, the cause is always positive, and therefore always intolerable.

13. (4.) The affirmative which is inferred by the negative law of Christ, is not absolute and unlimited like the negative, but modified and limited by its proper and extrinsic measures. We must, in no case and for no regard, hinder our innocent neighbour from doing his necessary work; but it does not follow, that therefore we must always set his work forward, and lend him oxen to plough his land: for it is in no case lawful to do evil, but in many cases it is lawful not to do good: that is, there is something more required to specificcate a positive act besides the consequence of a negative law. For although the body of an action is there commanded, yet because the body of the action must be invested with circumstances, they also must have their proper causes, or they cannot have a direct necessity. "Never turn thy face from any poor man," is a negative precept; to which the affirmative of Christ doth rightly correspond, "Give to every one that asks." Now, although the negative is universally to be observed in its own just sense, "Ut ne aversemur à paupere;"—that is, that we deny not to be charitable to him;—yet, when this comes to be specificated by positive actions, the commandment is not the only measure; but some conditions are required of him that is to receive; and some of him that is to give:—for to him that will not work, when he can, we are not to give; and he that needs it for himself, is not obliged to part with it to his brother; supposing their needs are equal or not extreme. To this purpose is that known rule, that "negative precepts oblige always, and to an actual obedience in all times:" but "affirmative, although they always oblige, yet they can be obeyed but in their own season." So that, although every negative precept is infinite and hath no limit, yet the affirmative have extrinsic measures and positions of their own, something to make them laws to me and you, though the consequence of the negative is sufficient to make them to be laws to all mankind. So that, although negative precepts may be the mother of affirmatives, yet the child is but a dwarf, and not like the mother; and besides that, it is exposed to be nursed by chance and by circumstances, by strangers and all the measures of contingency.

14. (5.) When affirmatives are included in, and inferred from, the negatives, the proportion of them is not positive but comparative. Thus when our blessed Lord had given commandment, "Resist not evil," that is, we should not do evil for evil,—the affirmative, which is properly consequent from this, is, "Do good for evil:" and this is obliging according to the former measures: but when you inquire further into the proportions, and ask after the instances, which our blessed Saviour made, we shall find that their obligation is not positive but comparative: "If a man strike thee on thy cheek, turn the other also;"—that is, rather than revenge thyself for one injury, receive another: and rather than vex him who forces thee to go a mile, go with him two miles: not that Christ intends thou shouldst offer to do thyself a shrewd turn, or invite another; nor that thou shouldst suffer it, if thou canst fairly avoid it; but that thou shouldst choose rather to suffer two evils, than do one. But this is especially to be reduced to practice in matters of counsel rather than precept; that is, when the affirmative inferred from the negative is matter of perfection rather than positive necessity, then the comparative proportion is a duty; but the absolute proportion and measure is but counsel. To oblige an enemy, and to do him acts of favour and benefit, is an excellency of charity, for which christians shall receive a glorious reward: but this is a counsel of perfection, which if, upon probable reasons and fairly inducing circumstances, it be omitted, a man shall give no answer for: but when the case is so, that it must be that I must either take revenge of him, or else rescue him from that revenge by an act of kindness, by a labour of love, or an expense of charity, then this becomes a duty; for in comparative measures every affirmative is at least obligatory: that is, we must rather be at any trouble, or expense, to do an affirmative, than prevaricate a negative commandment.

15. But then as to the other part of the rule, that "in the affirmative commandment the negative is included," there is no other difficulty but this,—that caution be had, that the negative be opposed to the affirmative in relation to the same subject: for because we are bound to love our friends, therefore we must not hate them; but it follows not (as the Pharisees did falsely comment on this text) because we must love our friends, therefore we must hate our enemies; for these two are not opposed as affirmative and negative in the same subject, but as two affirmatives relating to subjects that are divers.

16. But this is sometimes not to be understood of the precise commandment itself, but of the appendages; I mean the promises and threatenings: for though it follows, we must do good to our neighbour; therefore we must do no evil to him: yet it does not follow, "Do this and live; therefore if ye do not do it, ye shall die:" the reason of that is this, because there are some things encouraged with excellent rewards, the negatives of which are permitted to us with impunity: thus it is said by our blessed Saviour, "When thou makest a feast, invite the poor, and thou shalt have recompence in heaven;" but then if we do not invite the poor, it does not follow that we shall be punished in hell; but we shall not have that recompence which the hospitable man shall have: so that to invite the poor is an affirmative precept; but in this the negative is not included; "Thou shalt not invite the rich," or if thou doest, thou shalt be punished: but that "it is not so excellent a thing, it is not so encouraged by the proposition of an eternal reward;" but expires in a temporal interest: so that the negative included relates to the reward, not to the precept, and means this only: if thou dost not invite the poor, thou shalt not have any reward in heaven for feasting and making entertainments. But the sign of this is, 1. when the precept is only in the particular instance of a general commandment; as this of inviting the poor is of alms or charity: or else, 2. when it is matter of counsel and not of express precept: then the negative is not directly included in the preceptive words, but in the reward that is appendant.

17. Lastly, when it is said that in the affirmative precepts the negatives are included; the word "negative" is to be understood in the moral sense; that is, so as to include the privatives also: thus when we are commanded to love our brother, it is not only forbidden to us to hate him; but we are also commanded not to omit to express our love by symbolical actions: for not only contrarieties and repugnancies to the duty of the commandment, but even omissions also, are forbidden; and this is highly to be regarded in the matters of charity; which toward enemies we use to estimate by our not cursing him, our not hurting him, our not being revenged on him: these indeed are proper instances of the negative included; but the privatives also are to be considered; for not loving him is hating him; our refusing to do him kindness, our not praying for him, our unaptness to do him good offices, our remembering and reporting his injustice, our refusing to converse with him and denying him the comforts of our society, when, without danger or injury to ourselves, we may converse; is a prevaricating the negative or privative measures of the commandment.

RULE II.

When a Negative and an Affirmative seem opposite in any Sense, the Affirmative is to be expounded by the Negative, not the Negative by the Affirmative.

1. Thus are those various expressions of our blessed Saviour to be considered and understood, "Unless ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you:" and yet our blessed Lord says, "He that eateth the flesh of the Son of man, hath life abiding in him." Now to them who suppose these words to relate to the sacramental manducation, the question is, whether or no it be necessary to drink the blood in specie, as well as to eat the flesh? because of the exclusive negative requiring both under the forfeiture of eternal life; or shall it suffice to receive the flesh only, because life is promised to be in him who eats the flesh, in that place no mention being made of drinking the blood?

2. To this the answer is made by this rule; the negative cannot be lessened by the affirmative, because a negative can have no degrees, as an affirmative can; and if the affirmative were in this case sufficient, when the negative is express to require more, then the affirmative were directly contrary to the negative; but on the other side, though the affirmative requires less than the negative, there is no contradiction. 1. Because, in matters of duty, whatsoever is any where required, is every where supposed; and no interpretation can lessen it from what it is in its whole integrity. 2. Because all our duty is not every where repeated, but the not repeating it in any place cannot annul the obligation in that place where it is expressly required. 3. Because a threatening in all laws is of more force and efficacy than a promise; and therefore when under a threatening more is required, the promise that is affixed to a part of it, must be understood by the analogy and promise to that threatening, because one thing is enough to destroy us, but one thing is not enough to preserve us: "Bonum ex integrâ causâ, malum ex quâlibet particulari." 4. Because it is ordinary in Scripture to give the promise to every part of duty, which yet shall never be paid to that alone; thus to purity, to poverty of spirit, to mercy, to faith, to alms, to patience, to hope, the promises of blessedness are given; but although it is said, "the pure in heart shall see God;" and "the poor in spirit shall have the kingdom;" and "they that quit houses and lands for Christ's sake, shall receive the reward of the other world;" yet unless all that is required be put together in the duty, nothing of the reward shall be given to the person. Every part of an exclusive negative is an indispensable duty; but every affirmative that is encouraged by a promise, does not contain a whole duty, but a part of duty, which, by being symbolical to the whole, is encouraged as every other part is, but is not paid but in an entire payment, to an entire obedience.

3. This also is true, when in the affirmative more is put than in the negative; for even then the negative is the strict measure of the commandment, and the limit of its absolute necessity and exaction. "He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved, but he that believeth not, shall be damned." ^c Here the negative is the utmost limit; the "necesse esse" is described in that; the "bene esse," and the ordinary expectation in the other: by which we are thus to understand this and such other expressions, that the negative contains the indispensable duty, and supposes an obligation that nothing can excuse in persons capable; but the affirmative that supposes more, is yet for that which is over and above content with a less necessity, and admits of easier dispensation: for it containing all that is expected, is like a "summum jus," which though by the method of laws it is often expressed, that obedience may be invited as forward as it can, yet the ἐπιείκεια, or the abatement, is in the negative; that is the lowest, and therefore it is bound up with the penalty. For to the highest duty the reward is promised, and it is more than enough to pay it, but the punishment is threatened by lower measures: God abates much before he smites; and though he will reward every good we do, yet every good that is omitted is not punished with death. But this is to be understood, when the good is of that nature, that it may be omitted upon a probable cause, or without malice; or without the direct prevarication of an express commandment. For many good things are wholly put to us upon the account of hope and promises, and not of commandments and obedience: though in these also God makes what abatements he please: but we are to make none at all.

RULE III.

In the affirmative and negative Precepts of Christ, not only what is in the Words of the Commandment, but whatsoever is symbolical or alike, is equally forbidden or commanded.

1. WHEN St. Paul had enumerated the works of the flesh, and had put into the catalogue most of those crimes, which are commonly named in laws and fame, and the manners of men; he adds,^d καὶ τὰ ὅμοια τούτοις, "and those things which are like to these." For, 1. there are some things which are too bad to name, such were the impurities of the "Tribades," "Fellatrices," "Drauci," "Pathici," "Pædicatores," of which the apostle says, "it is a shame even to name such things as are done of them in secret:" πάθη ἀρμιίας, that is the general word which the apostle uses for them all, "dishonourable lusts." Now when all unnatural lusts are forbidden, all mixtures but what are hallowed by marriage, and the order of nature, it is no part of the perfection of the law, to name the species of impurity, and the circumstances of that vileness, which gets new names as men please to undo themselves by tricks and artifices of shame.

2. There are some sins which are like new diseases, vile and infectious in one year, or in one age, which were never heard of before, and die with reproach, and are never heard of again. That a woman should grow to that impudence as to marry her adulterer, in the same town where her husband was living, and a prince,—was so rare a contingency, that though it was once done in Rome, yet no law was needful to prevent it. And there needed no law to forbid a man to marry a boy; yet Nero did marry Sporus, and he married Doryphorus, whom Tacitus calls Pythagoras: but this was no less a sin, because it was not the express vocal contradiction of law; it was against a law that named it not.

3. There are some sins, which nature and the public manners of the world do so condemn, that they need no special mention in the laws. No law forbids us to eat man's flesh, and yet all the civil part of mankind hate and condemn them that do it; and those Egyptians who did "deperire defunctorum cadavera," "fall in love with the dead bodies" which they did anoint, were condemned by the voice of all the world, without the charges of an express law. And all that read the narratives of the Gnostic impurities, how they did, in the impurest sense, "litare in sanguine femineo," and make their eucharist of matter of abomination, have enough of prime reason and common notices of laws and things to condemn their vileness, though they never study the question, or inquire which commandment they prevaricate.

4. There are some sins like others that are named; which are not distinct kinds, but like the monsters of Africa, produced by heterogeneous mixtures, or equivocal generation: thus to geld a child to make him have a good voice, is so like cruelty, and the unmercifulness of homicide or mutilation, and is such a curiosity of voluptuousness and sensuality, that though it wants a name to signify its whole sinfulness, yet it must stand condemned, though there be no text against it described expressly in the tables of the law. To give money for ecclesiastical preferments is so "like the sin of Simon Magus," that it hath obtained his name and his reproach, and yet it is not the same crime; but upon the account of St. Paul's ὁμοίωμα, or "similitude," it hath the same condemnation. Thus polygamy is like adultery, and marrying after divorce (except only in the case of fornication) is like polygamy. Concerning which things, there is one measure in general, and some other more particular. 1. In general.

2. "The likeness of things to those which are expressly forbidden, is not to be estimated by forms and outsides, and material resemblances, but by the intrinsic irregularity and reason of the prohibition."—To kill a wife or daughter taken in adultery, even in those countries where by the laws it is permitted, looks as like murder, as killing can: but because the laws allow the interested man to be the executioner, it is the public hand, not the private, that takes the vengeance: and therefore they are not alike in a culpable similitude. But on the other side, to take my goods wherever I find them, looks like justice; but because of justice, a man is not to be judge and executioner in his own case, and this thing is, in many cases, forbidden by the laws, this is against justice; for it is not enough that it is his own; for although it is "justum," a just thing to take my own, yet to do it from a thief by private authority, where it is forbidden by the public, is "justum injustè factum," "a just thing done after an unjust manner." But if there be a likeness of injustice, a prevarication of the same reason, an equal injury, then not the letter of the law, but the reason and the spirit of it, is its condemnation. "Par pari referre," "to give back the good I have borrowed, is one of the great lines of justice; and, upon this account, we are bound to pay debts, to perform contracts, to make equal returns of valuable considerations,—and whatever is against this, is against justice. But then because acts of kindness are the transition of a good from one to another, and although it is without a bargain, yet it is not without an obligation, ingratitude comes under the τὰ ὅμοια, it is so like injustice, that it is the worse for it. It is expressly commanded that we should provide for our children according to our powers; and therefore they that expose them, are worse than infidels, and have denied the faith: but then to deny to nurse their own children (unless it be upon a just and a reasonable cause, upon charity or necessity) is so like exposing them, that it must stand as reprobate under the sentence of the same commandment.

3. (2.) But the particular measures of this rule are these: Whatsoever is of the same specification, is of the same obligation and necessity. But if men would be ingenuous, and worthy in giving sentences of their actions, and understanding the measures of their duty, there could be no difficulty in this. For men are easy enough to consent to a general rule, but they will not suffer their own case to be concerned in it: and they understand the particulars too fast, when it is the interest of their brother; but if it be their own, they know nothing of it. It is written, "Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God," and all the world consented to the law since the promulgation; but yet many nations, and many ages of christendom, did admit the trials of rights by duels, and of innocency by fire ordeal: which was as direct a tempting of God, as any thing next to desperation itself; and by this is sufficiently reprovèd. If the labourer be worthy of his hire, then so is the priest; if the priest of the old law, then also the minister of the gospel: which particular I choose to instance in, that, by occasion of it, I may give caution against that, which causes error in the application of this measure and sense of laws unto the conscience.

4. For because all actions are invested and varied with many circumstances, they who are concerned in a particular, with which they are willing to escape, think every new circumstance to be a warrant great enough to exempt him from the general rule. Thus, if a rule was given in the law of Moses, they who would not have it drawn into consequence in the gospel, observe that differing circumstance of the divers laws; and think it answer enough to say, "it was so in the law, but what is that to the gospel?" Now this answer is only true, when the law and the gospel have contrary measures in the same instance; that is, when the instance did not only relate to the law of Moses, but is against the analogy of the gospel. Thus, no unclean thing was to come into the presence of the Lord; and therefore the leper, or the polluted "in profluvio sanguinis," or "seminis," might not come into the temple; but then if we argue, this is much more true in the gospel, which is a state of greater purity than the law, we can conclude nothing, because the measures of legal and evangelical purity are wholly differing; and, therefore, here the relation to the several states and laws is considerable, and makes a material difference. But when there is nothing in one that appropriates it to itself, and nothing in the other that excludes it, then the circumstance and relation alters nothing of the proposition: and so it is in the matter of maintenance for the evangelical minister.

But no circumstance can alter the question, unless it be a material ingredient in the very constitution of it, and changes the reason of the former usage. Thus when, by the commandment, we are tied to give every one their own, if the owner be a madman, and in his fury demands his sword; although this particular be a specification of the general rule, yet it is altered by a circumstance, which changes the reason of the law, or supposes it changed. So when David brought his men to eat shew-bread in the days of need, the priest asked, if the young men had abstained from their wives, saying, that then they might; but he that shall argue from hence, that no man can receive the sacramental bread, but he that hath been continent in that instance, may be surely enough answered, by telling him that such contacts did sometimes, and to some purposes, contract legal impurities, but not evangelical, in which only the purity of the spirit is required; or if also corporal were required, yet such approaches, under the protection of marriage, are declared to be κοιτὴ ἀμίαντος, as great a purity as chastity itself, of which this is one kind. But when there is no cause of change of the ingredient in the article, if it be of the same nature, though differing in extrinsic or unconcerning circumstances, it is by way of specification included in the rule, and is to be conducted by its measures.

5. (3.) Whatsoever is equivalent to the instance of the law, is also within its sanction and constitution. By "equivalent," (speaking morally, not logically,) I mean that which is inferred from the greater to the less affirmatively: or, 2. from the less to the greater negatively: or, 3. from that which is equal to it, both affirmatively and negatively. For thus laws are extended on all hands; the same law that forbids murder, forbids cruel thoughts and violent anger, whatsoever tempts to murder, or is the beginning of it, or is in the natural progression towards it. So, on the other side, the law commands us to obey our superiors (meaning the spiritual); the same law, though it there names them not, does more strongly command us to obey princes; for they also "are over us, and watch for the good of our souls, and must give an account for them."^e Thus, if husbands must give honour to their wives, then wives must give honour much rather to their husbands. If you may not steal out of my house, you must not spoil my goods in it; much less may you fire my house, and burn my goods too; if you must be faithful in little things, much more in greater things; if you must give your life for God, much rather must you give your goods; if you must not defile a temple, much less must you dishonour your bodies.

6. This also is to be extended to the proportion-able obligation of correlatives. For if the relative be bound by the laws of Christ, then so also is the correlative; which rule hath no exception, but an explication of it is sufficient. For either the duty of relatives is equal, or unequal in degrees, and it is either in the same instance, or in divers. If the instances be divers, they are, in all cases, expressed competently in the New Testament; as the duty that husbands and wives, that children and parents, that masters and servants, that princes and subjects, owe to each other respectively, and they need not to be conducted by involution and consequence, for their duties are described in distinct lines. But if the duty and instances be in the same kind, but differ in degrees, then the measure of the degrees is to be conducted by proportion to the difference of persons, by public honesty, and the sayings of wise and good men, and the common usages of the best, and the measures of reason. But if they be the same in kind and degree, then the rule and measure of one is the rule and measure of both, though one only be named in the law. And this is of use, not only in the equal instances of unequal relatives, but in all the instances of equals; as in friendships, societies, guilds, colleges, exchanges, traffics, and the like. There must be care taken, that according to St. Paul's rule, "there must not be ἄνεσις, ease, remission, and advantage to one, and θλίψις, trouble, burden, and disadvantage to the other;" but in relations that are equal, the duty and the expression must be so too; ever with this caution, that,—If the duty be the same between relatives, it cannot follow that the privileges are the same.—The husband and wife are equally obliged in the duties of love and justice; but they have not equal powers, neither can the woman put away the man, as the man can the woman. For though man and woman are "pares in conjugio," tied to an equal love, and an equal duty, yet they have not an equal power, nor an equal liberty; in government and divorces, they are not equal.

7. But upon the account of this rule, the christians have a most certain demonstration of the unlawfulness of polygamy, or of having many wives at once. For our blessed Saviour said, "He that puts away his wife, unless it be for fornication, and marries another, committeth adultery;" therefore he much more is an adulterer who marries another, when his wife is not put away, and hath not committed fornication. But in this and the like cases, we are to proceed by the measures of reason, and the common usages of laws.

8. (1.) A law, drawn from a law, must be evidently and apparently in the bowels of it before such extraction, or else it must not be obtruded as the sentence and intendment of the lawgiver. "Obey them that have the rule over you,"—is a plain commandment; but if you infer, therefore, in all things that they say, "deny your own reason, and submit your understanding;" this follows not, because we are commanded to obey them only in such things, where they ought to rule over us, but that is not in our understandings, over which God alone is the ruler; and those whom he hath sent, are rational and authorized guides, they have power to teach, and power to exhort, they are to do any thing that can inform us, and invite us to good; and we must follow them in all ways that lead us to God: and that they do, we are to believe until we have reason to believe the contrary; but because, beyond these measures, the law neither said nor meant any thing, therefore the obligation extends not so far.

9. (2.) Whatsoever is not in the letter of the law, is then understood to be intended by the law, when it is drawn from thence by a prime and immediate consequence; in which there is no violence, nor artificial chains, nor devices of wit and labour. For laws ought to be but few, and they love not to be multiplied without apparent necessity, and he that makes more than Christ intended, lays a snare for his own foot, and is cozened by his own argument. Christ commanded us, that we should do our alms and prayers in secret: from hence it follows, that all solemnities of pride, and all the dressings and adornments of our prayers, designed for vanity and publication, are criminal; and under this prohibition come all acts of proper specification. But then if I argue from hence further, and say, "Therefore it is not lawful to appoint public assemblies for prayer; or, if it be, yet it is not lawful to appear to men to be passionate and devout: and further yet, that private prayer is better than public, and therefore that it is to be preferred before the public, and therefore yet that we may safely neglect the assembling of ourselves together for prayer," I argue foolishly, and cannot impose a necessity of obedience upon any. The law warrants me to go no further but within sight of it: if I go one step from her words, I am within the call of her voice: and my obedience can well be exacted, where it can be well proved, but never else. It is in laws, as it is in articles of belief, to which we are obliged primarily, and afterwards to every thing that is certainly and immediately drawn from thence. But if you go beyond one consequence, there are so many certain, but indiscernible fallibilities, so many intrigues of fancy in the disputer, and so much unaptness in the hearer, that it is ten to one they either do not understand one another, or do not understand the article; and so it is in laws, so long as we go on in the straight line of its letter, and known intention, we commit no error, or can soon be reproved if we do: but if we once double a point, we presently lose sight of the law; as appears in the instance now given in the precept of "praying in secret:" against which it is no objection to say, the consequents were not rightly deduced from the words of that precept. For I grant it; it is true they are not; but then I say, it is also ten to one but it will be so in any instance, that shall be made fruitful with anfractuous and involved consequences. For that is it that I say: a man's reason is to be suspected when he goes a great way from this rule; and we by our logic shall become but ill lawgivers. Whatsoever can certainly and truly be deduced from a law, does as certainly oblige us as the instance that is named, or the first specification of it, or the direct consequent, if it could be made as evident as it is certain; but because it cannot, therefore it can oblige but in the degree of its clarity and manifestation, for that is to the remote instance, the same as publication is to the commandment itself. But the precepts or laws of Christ, are like the "radix prosapiæ," the grand parent of a family, from whom the direct descendants are for ever to be reckoned to the kindred, in the straight and proper line; but when once it goes to the transverse and collateral, they not only have no title to the inheritance, but every remove is a step to the losing the cognation and relation to the chief house.

10. (3.) In drawing the consequent duties from express laws, the first presumption is for piety, and the honour of God, that is, if the obligation be not evident; yet if it be evident that such obedience is for the honour of God, it is more probably to be supposed that that consequent was intended by the law of God, whom it so apparently serves. But where this or the like material ingredient is not, we are to presume for our liberty, rather than for the multiplication of laws; because that is charity and prudence, and both of them are very considerable in the constitution and interpretation of a law. But this is more full in the next rule.

RULE IV.

When any Thing is forbidden by the Laws of Jesus Christ, all those Things are forbidden also which follow from that forbidden Action, and for whose Sake it was forbidden.

1. This rule is of use in all laws, and is expressed to the same caution both in the code of the civil law, and in the decretals; and the reason of it is because the laws of any lawgiver, being the effects of his greatest wisdom, are designed to the best end, and are intended only to operate towards and to effect that end: to this purpose laws are made to prevent evils; and though the evils are not always named, yet against them it is that the laws are cautionary and provisionary; so that the evil is much more forbidden than that which brings it, or leads it in; because sometimes the evil instrument may be destitute of its evil effect, and therefore is in many degrees, innocent and harmless; but if the evil be introduced, it is all that which the laws were afraid of. And therefore Aristotle^f said right: τὸ δὲ τέλος ἐκάστης πολιτείας οὐ δὲ λανθάνειν αἰροῦντα γὰρ τὰ πρὸς τὸ τέλος, "We are to consider the end of every republic, for they choose all things in order to their end;"—and the laws are made for public defence, security, and profit; so it is in religion and the laws of God. When we give alms, we are commanded not to blow a trumpet, so being warned against pride; but if, without that instance or signification, we be really proud, or value ourselves upon that account; or despise our brother as less holy, or oppress the fatherless and widow though without that pretence of holiness and the advantages of hypocrisy, they are greater breakers of the commandments, than by their fond and fantastic proclamations of their charity. Thus we find in St. Paul's an express prohibition, that we "should not make provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof;" that is, that we do not take in great stowage of meat and drink, or use arts of sharpening the desire, or caressing the fancy, to make the pleasures brisk and active, and the sense quick and pleased: but some there are that make temperance the instrument of pleasure, and the minister of sensuality, and can be most pleased when they take the least care; and some mind the pleasures so as they will not tarry for the instruments, or need them not; in these and the like cases, if there were no distinct prohibition of that evil effect, yet it were sufficiently prohibited in the prohibition of the instrument. But because most of the evil effects of evil instruments are, expressly and by name, forbidden in the New Testament, this rule is of use principally in the aggravation and condemnation of sin; and it means that every judgment and every evil we suffer, which we were foretold of, and which is a foreseen effect of such an action, is to be imputed to us; and besides the direct sin, we are also guilty of uncharitableness, by doing that which we know will hurt us. God, in the forbidding the sin, commands us also to preserve ourselves, and, besides the sin, is angry at the very death.

2. This rule hath two limitations: 1. It is not to be understood of events contingent and accidental; but either natural and proper, or foretold and threatened, or at least usual and noted. He that maliciously sows false doctrine in the church, is answerable, not only for the heresy, but for the mischief that he intends, or is willing it should produce; but if another man, to spite him, or to hinder his fame, shall set up a contrary heresy, although this was the spawn of the first toad, yet because it was an equivocal production, it shall be no otherwise imputed, but to reproach him amongst men, to reprove his folly, and to be an argument of a speedy repentance.

3. But, 1. Whatsoever effect is natural to a forbidden action, is directly upon the same account. Thus, whosoever divides the church, to him are imputed all the evil effects of schism, which are its natural productions. If an imperious, foolish woman, by a continual inquietude, by her evil nature and a vexatious spirit, so disturb her husband's quiet, and the ease of his soul, and the comforts of his life, that he also lose his health,—she is not only guilty of the violation of the laws of love, and duty, and meekness, by which she is bound to God and to her husband, but is guilty of murder, or high injuriousness and uncharitableness, according to the degree of the mischief, which she sees impressed and growing upon him.

4. (2.) Whatsoever event is foretold and threatened, all that also is imputed to him, that does the forbidden action to which it is threatened; and he is directly "felo de se," who by lust brings upon himself the rottenness of life, far worse than the putrefaction of the grave; and he is a perfect prodigal of his fortune, who, by committing sacrilege, invites the worm, and calls a spirit of unthriftiness and consumption to his estate; and he that grieves the Spirit of God, and causes him to depart, is guilty of that beggary and baseness of spirit, with which such evil usages of the Holy Spirit of God are often punished. For as God forbade some sins, not only for their own sakes, but that others which are their foul issues might be strangled in the womb; so he forbade all sins, and laid direct and collateral restraints upon them, that man might not be unhappy, and extremely miserable. As, therefore, he who by one sin introduces another, is guilty of both; so he who brings an evil which God graciously intended should not fall upon us, to him that evil is to be imputed, and that evil also does either directly or accidentally, according to the nature of the subject matter, increase his guilt.

5. (3.) If an evil effect be not either natural or threatened, yet if it happens ordinarily, and be noted, it is to be imputed to him who does that evil and forbidden action, which does infer it. The reason is, because he wilfully sins against the purpose of the law, who will not prevent that evil, which the law intendeth to prevent, and makes the law void and illusory, that is, destitute of its effect, and perfectly in vain as to that intention. Thus it is observed that the father's or the mother's curse destroys the pleasures of a sin, and the gaiety of a fortune, and the prosperity of an offending child: he, therefore, that shall do a forbidden action, which shall bring such a curse upon himself, is not only justly punished, and is to impute that to himself perfectly and alone,—but if, upon his account, evil descend upon his posterity or relatives, he is guilty of that evil, and is a direct sinner in their punishment.

6. (2.) The other limitation which I am to interpose, is this: That the evil effects of an evil action are imputed but in proportion to the will and actual understanding, beyond the sphere of which whatsoever does happen, it is collateral and accidental both to the intention and to the time. A man's action hath a proper life of its own, and it leaves a permanent effect, or is productive of the same by a continuing emanation; this, if it be foreseen, and considered, and chosen, is as imputable as if it were present or immediate. But because a man can see but so far, and hath a limited efflux and impression by all his actions, he is not to be judged or condemned by any thing that shall happen beyond that proper extension; and if some Polonians or Transylvanians, English or French, make ill use of the arguments of Arius, it is not to be supposed that it shall be put upon Arius's account at the day of judgment, and that his or any man's damnation shall increase upon such accounts, which as they are beyond the intention of the man, or the efficacy of his action, so also beyond the distance of his prevision.

7. But for this, that rule which is nearest to exactness, is this,—No effect which happens after a man's death, is imputable to him as a new sin.—So far as it was actually intended and designed in his lifetime, or foreseen and not reversed, so far it is imputed upon the stock of the present malice, not of the future event; his own act and his own intention for the present, and his actual design of the future, are sufficient load upon him; but then because his act and his actual design could not live after his death, therefore nothing beyond the life of the man can be a new sin: because as he cannot actually or habitually will that event, so neither can he rescind it: if he cannot will it in any sense, it can in no sense be imputed; but if it could be willed, then it may also be refused and rescinded, which because it is impossible, therefore the increase of evil stands not at his door that occasioned it, and cannot either will it any more, or hinder it. This is that which is meant by our blessed Saviour, "The night comes when no man worketh;" and whatsoever is beyond the line of life, is also beyond the line of malice; and therefore cannot increase or begin upon a new score, when the whole stock is spent.

8. Lastly, that which proves all this, does also further explicate the rule: whatsoever event depends upon the will of another, is so contingent in respect of him that first set the evil on work, that it is no longer upon his account, than he actually or habitually desires it or endeavours: because now the evil hath a new cause, and every emergent event is upon such a cause, as cannot be forced, or indeed produced, by any thing besides itself: and therefore to itself only it is to be imputed, excepting where the malice of the first agent hath an actual or intended influx into the second.

RULE V.

The laws of Jesus Christ are the Measures of the Spirit, and are always to be extended to a spiritual Signification.

1. IT was a fair character that was given of the christians,^b Πείθονται τοῖς ὠρισμένοις νόμοις, καὶ τοῖς ἰδίοις βίοις νικῶσι τοὺς νόμους "They obey the laws appointed for them, and, by the piety and charity of their lives, excel even the measure of the laws themselves:" for by what instance soever God would be glorified, and by what charity soever our brother can be relieved, and by what justice societies are established and continued, in all that they exercise themselves according to their whole power, and would do more if they could, and sometimes do more than they are required; and oftentimes with better circumstances than are exacted, and always with a mind more ready than their hand.

2. Human laws can exact but the outward action; they neither can command the understanding nor judge the will, because they cannot secure that, nor discern this; and without these two, their interest is well enough preserved. He that pays my money, though it be against his will, does me justice, and is quit before the king; and if he dissembles, yet if he gives me good words, I cannot implead him of calumny or slander. Thus the Phariseesⁱ understood the law of Moses, and called him innocent whom the laws could not charge; but therefore Christ calls them to new accounts. He that offers a pure lamb to God, may dishonour him with a foul thought: and no sacrifice is pure by the skin and colour, but by the heart and hand, of him that presents it. Acts of external religion are publications of the Divine honours, but the heart does only pay them; for there it is that God does sit judge alone; and though he hath given us bodies to converse below with a material world, yet God's temple is in heaven, in the intellectual world; and the spirit of a man is the sacrifice, and his purest thoughts are oblations, and holy purposes are the best presents, and the crucifixion of our passions is the best immolation, the only beasts of sacrifice, and the cross of Christ is the altar, and his passion is the salt of all our sacrifices, and his intercession makes the sweet perfume, and so atonement is made by the blood of the Lamb, and we are accepted in our services, and our wills are crowned with the rewards of a holy obedience: if our hearts be right, our services will never be wanting or rejected; and although our hearts can supply the want of external power, yet it is certain that nothing can supply the want of our hearts, and of good affections; these must be entire: for they are God's peculiar portion, and therefore must not be divided. Plutarch^k tells of Apollodorus that he dreamed he was taken by the Scythians, flayed alive, and then cut in pieces, and thrown into a boiling caldron, where his heart leaped forth into the midst of all the little portions of flesh, and told them, "I am the cause of all this evil." I was something like that saying of St. Bernard "Nihil ardet in inferno, nisi propria voluntas." "Nothing burns in the eternal flames of hell, but a man's heart, nothing but his will:"—for from "the heart proceed evil thoughts, adulteries," &c. said our blessed Saviour:^l but therefore God requires the heart, that is, that the principle of actions be secured, and the "principalis domus," "the chief house," where God loves to dwell and reign, be kept without thieves and murderers. This, then, is the first sense of the rule; that our obedience which Christ exacts, is a sincere obedience of the will, and is not satisfied with the outward work. He that gives alms to the poor, and curses them in his heart; he that entertains an apostle in the name of an apostle, and grudges the expenses of his diet;—is neither charitable nor hospitable, and shall neither have the reward of an apostle nor a brother. In vain it is to wash a goblet, if you mean to put into it nothing but the dead lees and vapour of wine; and a fair tomb of amber was too beautiful and rich an enclosure for Martial's viper and his fly.

Introrsum turpes, speciosæ pelle decorâ. Hor.

But this is a caution against hypocrisy in the moral sense of the words, but the legal sense of the rule is, that in all laws the first intention is, that God be served with the will and the affections; and that these be never separated from the outward work.

3. (2.) But it is also meant, that the whole design of the laws of Jesus Christ is to be perfective of the Spirit, and his religion is a spiritual service; that is, permanent and unalterable, virtuous and useful, natural and holy, not relative to time and place, or any material circumstances, nor integrated by corporal services; the effect of which is this:

4. (1.) The body of the christian services does wholly consist of natural religion, that is, such services whereby we can glorify God and represent our own needs; that is, prayers and eucharists, acts of love and fear, faith and hope, love of God and love of our neighbour, which are all those things by which we can be like God; by which we can do good, and by which we can receive any: and excepting the sacraments whose effect is spiritual, and the sense mysterious, and the rites easy, and the number the smallest of all, there is, in the digest of the christian law, no commandment of any external rite or ceremony.

5. (2.) As it intends wholly an exclusion of the Mosaic ceremonies, so it will not admit a body of new and superinduced ceremonies; for they are, or may be, as much against the analogy of the spiritual law of Christ, as the other. The ceremonies of the christian services must be no part of the religion; but either must be the circumstances of the religion, or the imperate acts of some virtue: the christian must be in a place when he prays, and that place may be determined, and thither he must go, and yet he may go any whither else; his action is finite, and must be done in time, and that time may be appointed him, and then he must do it at that time, and yet he may do it at any time else: if he be commanded by his superiors to pray kneeling, he must kneel at the appointment of the law; and yet he may, in his own devotions at another time, fall upon his face or pray standing. But the christian and the Mosaic ceremonies thus differ:

1. The Mosaic rites were appointed by God; the christian only by men.

2. Consequently they are necessary parts of religion, these are not.

3. The Mosaic ceremonies did oblige every where; the christian only in public.

4. They were integral parts of the religion; these are but circumstances and investitures of the religious actions.

5. These are to be done with liberty; but the Jews were in bondage under theirs.

6. Ours are alterable, theirs lasting as their religion.

7. Theirs were many and burdensome, ours ought to be few; of the number of which our superiors are to judge by charity, and the nature and common notices of things, and the analogy of the liberty and laws of christianity. But although there are no publicly described measures beforehand, by which princes or prelates shall appoint the number of their ceremonies; yet there is in reason and common voices sufficient to reprove the folly of him, who because he would have his body decently vested shall wear five-and-twenty cloaks: "stola et tunica;" something for warmth and something for ornament does well; but she that wears so many adornments on her head and girdle, that it is the work of half a day to dress her, is a servant of the tire of her own head; and thinks neither her soul nor her body, but her clothes, to be the principal. By this I intend to reprove the infinite number of ceremonies in the Roman church; they are described in a great book 'in folio;'

my purse will not reach to buy it: but it is too like the impertinency of the busily idle women I now mentioned: and although, by such means, religion is made pompous and apt to allure them that admire gay nothings, and fine prettinesses; yet then it also spends their religious passions and wonder in that which effects nothing upon the soul. It is certain, that actions of religion must be fitted with all those things; which minister to decent, and grave, and orderly, and solemn actions: but they must be no more but a just investiture of the religious action; and every thing can distract us in our prayers, and all the arts of watchfulness and caution are too little to fix our intentions in them; and therefore whatsoever can become a proper entertainment of the mind; can also be a diversion of the devotion and a hinderance to the prayer. The sum is this;—ceremonies may be the accidents of worship, but nothing of the substance.—This they were among the Jews, that they may be amongst the christians, time and place for the action: habit and posture for the men; that is all that religion needs, whatsoever else is grave and decent, and whatsoever else is orderly, is not to be rejected: but if it be not these, it is not to be imposed; and when they become numerous or grievous, they are to be removed by the same lawful hand that brought them in.

6. (3.) In the christian law, all purities and impurities are spiritual; and the soul contracts no religious change without her own act: he that touches a dead body, though he does not wash, may lift up pure hands in prayer; but if his soul be unclean, no water, no ceremony will wash him pure without repentance;

O nimium faciles quia tristia crimina cædis
Tolli flumineâ posse putatis aquâ.

It had been well, if, in all ages, this had been considered, and particularly in the matter of marriage: for when single life was preferred before the married for the accidental advantages to piety, (especially in times of persecution,) which might be enjoyed there rather than here, some from thence extended their declamation further,—and drawing in all the auxiliaries from the old law, began to prefer single life before marriage, as being a state of greater purity; and then, by little, they went on thinking marriage to be less pure, till at last they believed it to be a state of carnality; and with the persuasions of men, effected by such discourses, were also mingled the discourses of heretics, who directly condemned marriage, and that which descended from this mixture of doctrines, some false, and the others not true, was a less honourable opinion of that holy institution on which God founded the first blessing of mankind; and which Christ hath consecrated into a mystery; and the Holy Spirit hath sanctified by the word of God and prayer, and which is the seminary of the church, and that nursery from whence the kingdom of heaven is peopled. But if marriage be lawful, then he that lives in that state as he should, contracts no impurities,—but is capable of any holy ministry, and receptive of any sacrament, and fit for any employment, and capable of any office, and worthy of any dignity. Let them who have reason and experience to verify their affirmative, speak all the great things of single life that can be said of it, and they may say much; for the advantages are many which are in a single life, and in a private state, and an unactive condition, and a small fortune, and retirement; but then, although every one of these hath some;—yet a public state, and an active life, and a full fortune, and public offices, and a married life, have also advantages of their own, and blessings and virtues appropriate; and in all God may be equally served, according as the men are, and the advantages neglected or improved. But that which I insist upon is, that to be rich is no sin, and to be a public person is no crime, and to be married is no impurity: and therefore to suspect a disproportion between this state, and spiritual actions or offices, is a jealousy whose parent is heresy, and pride and interest are its nurses. Fornication is uncleanness,—and concubinate and voluntary pollutions, and unnatural lusts, are uncleanness, and make us unworthy to approach either to the altar or to the rails; but marriage, that fills heaven, makes no man unfit for churches or holy offices.

7. Upon this account I am also to take away those scruples which have been thrown into men's consciences by some indiscreet persons, concerning involuntary pollutions; concerning which we find many absurd stories of friars, and of pretended temptations and spites of the devil to hinder them from receiving the holy sacrament, by procuring such accidents to them before the solemnity: which persuasion was wholly upon this account, that the spirit could be polluted by something that is without; and that the accidents of the body could defile the soul, and this and the like were the accidents that could do it. In which cases it is without all peradventure true, that if the soul consented not before or after, neither nature, nor nature's enemy, are to be taken into the accounts of just dispositions or indispositions to spiritual ministries; if we serve God with our whole mind, and with all our heart, and do what we can that is good, and avoid all evil that we can avoid, we cannot be prejudiced by what we cannot avoid.

8. (4.) Although the spirituality of the gospel excludes all shadows of ceremonies, and all bodily rites, from being of the substance of religion; yet this spirituality does not exclude the ministry and service of the body; for the worship of the body may also be spiritual: to worship God with our bodies is λογική λατρεία, a "reasonable,"^m and therefore a "spiritual worship." Thus when the eyes are lift up in prayer, when the bowels yearn with pity, when the hands are extended to fill the poor man's basket, the body serves the spirit, and the spirit serves God, and all is a spiritual religion. But because a bodily religion, such as was that of the Jews, cannot be a spiritual religion, such as must be that of the christians, and yet the service of the body is also a part of the ministry of the Spirit; the rule which can determine our conscience in the instances of this article, is this:

Whatsoever is an elicit or imperate Act of Virtue, whether it be acted by the Soul or by the Body, is an Act of spiritual Religion.

For in virtues, there is a body and a soul; and all transient actions, or "ad extra," have something of materiality in them, which must be ministered to by the body. For therefore our blessed Lord hath commanded mortification of our bodies, that our bodies may become spiritual; and as acts of understanding are ministered to by material phantasms, so are the most spiritual acts of virtue, the love and the fear of God, by sad spectacles and gracious accidents, by feeling good and suffering evil; and as the actions of discerning sensitive objects are direct products of the soul, but yet have for every one of the faculties a proper organ in the body: so have the virtues of a christian; they are acts and habits of a sanctified soul, but to some the hand does co-operate, to some the eyes, and to some all the body, that as the graces of the soul are commencements and dispositions to glory; so these spiritual ministries of the body may nourish it, and dispose the body to its perfect spirituality in the resurrection of the just.

9. But then these ministries of the body are then only to be adjudged a spiritual service, when the soul and the body make but one entire agent, just as when the soul sees by the eye, we say the eye sees; because that seeing is the action or passion of the soul, which uses that organ in her operation: so when the act of the body and soul is but one and the same product of religion, it is the soul and the spirit which is the principal agent, and from thence the action must be denominated to be spiritual. But as when the eye is made to twinkle and look sprightly, or amorously, or is proposed as a piece of beauty, and does something of its own, but no natural and proper ministry of the soul, it is the instrument of vice or vanity, and not of the soul: so it is in the services of the body, if the body of our services be not the product of the soul, and the imperate act of some virtue, or the proper specific act of some grace, it can never be a part of the religion. St. Paulⁿ hath given us perfect measures in this inquiry, "To give our body to be burned, to give all our goods to the poor, to have all faith," are but the bodies and outsides or material parts of our religion, and are good for nothing: but when all these proceed from charity, that is, from a willing, a loving spirit, from a heart that is right to God, that is desirous to please him,—then faith justifies, and giving gifts to the poor, is true alms, and giving our bodies to the fire, is a holy martyrdom: and in this sense, dressing bodies to their burial, is an act of a spiritual grace; to adorn places of prayer, to build them and fit them for the service of God, is an act of spiritual religion,—to minister to the poor, to dress children, to make them clean, to teach them their catechisms, though bodily ministries, are yet actions of the spiritual religion of a christian. But from this, those things only are excluded, which either are not the direct productions of a sanctified soul, or proper and prudent ministries to some virtue.

10. (5.) The spirituality of the laws of Jesus Christ have yet one effect more: in all contracts or interfering of laws, or senses of the laws, the spiritual sense is to be preferred, the spiritual action is to be chosen. By which it is not meant that ever there can be a dispute between the act of the mind and an act of the body; because as no man, and no thing, can hinder the soul from willing or understanding, from loving or hating, from fearing or slighting, from valuing or neglecting its proper object: so the act of the body, which is to minister to the soul, cannot stand in contradiction to that, to which, in the very nature of the thing, it is subordinate. But the meaning is, when laws are to be expounded, that sense is to be chosen, which more relates to an act of grace, than that, which is nothing but an external ministry. Thus, if the question be between the beautifying of a chapel, or the rescuing of the poor from famine, although that might be an act of spiritual religion, when religion requires that specification of an act; yet because that hath less of the spirit in it than the other, and is not required in the presence of the other, this is to be adjudged the more spiritual, because it is the more holy. If the question be between keeping of a holy day, or doing charitable reliefs to necessitous people, Christ, in the instance of the sabbath, hath taught us to prefer charity before external ministries, obedience before sacrifice, mercy before oblations; and did not only make way for the taking off all mere bodily rites, but also for the expounding his own laws to the more spiritual sense, that is, to the compliance with the most excellent and useful grace. So also for the exposition of laws expressed by material significations; as cutting off the hand, plucking out the right eye, eating the flesh of Christ, drinking his blood,—the flesh, that is, carnal commentaries, profit nothing: but these words are spirit and life; that is, they are neither to be understood nor practised in the material, but spiritual sense.

11. But as to the general conduct of the conscience in all these inquiries, the rule is this:—All acts of virtue are to be preferred before the instruments of it and that which exercises it; before that which signifies it; and the inward acts before the outward.—Thus when fasting is appointed in order to prayer, and yet both cannot be together, (for that by fasting we are disabled to pray,) there it is, that prayer must be preferred and fasting let alone. If corporal austerities be undertaken for mortification of a rebellious body; if they hinder the body in the direct ministries to the soul in other cases, and become uncharitable, charity is to take place, and the austerities may be supplied by something else. Now this rule hath in it no exception nor variety but this: that it is to be understood in instances of corporal and spiritual acts, that are of a disparate nature, and but only accidentally subordinate, as fasting to prayer, keeping holy days for the special ministries of religion, lyings upon the ground to chastity, and the like: but in the actions internal, which are proper exercises of a virtue,—the external, which is directly, naturally, or by institution, subordinate to the internal, must never be omitted upon pretence of preferring the internal, because they never can contradict one another; as it never can be disputed whether the soul or the eye shall see; for the soul sees by the eye, and cannot see without it; and it may so happen in the external acts of virtue ministering to the internal: as, in some cases, a man is not charitable, unless he extends his hand to the poor, or lifts him out of a ditch, or guides him in the way. This instance and sense of the rule we learn from St. James:^o “If a brother or a sister be naked and destitute of daily food, and one of you say unto them, Be ye warmed and filled, notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body, what doth it profit?” That is, it is in vain to pretend internal charity without the external: in many cases, it cannot be without it; and when it can, it is because there is no object for the act, or no possibility to do it, and then the internal is to be done, not by way of preference to the external, but in destitution of it and supply. But this will be yet further explicated in the following rule.

RULE VI.

The imperate Acts or outward Expressions of the Virtue of one Commandment, must not contradict the elicit Acts of another.

I. By “imperate acts” I mean such, which are commanded to be done by the interest of any virtue whatsoever, not proper to the virtue, but such as may minister to it, or signify it. Thus to deny the impure solicitations of an anchaste person, is a proper, an elicit act of the virtue of chastity; but to lie upon the ground,—to wear a hair shirt,—to use disciplines,—to roll our naked body upon thorns,—to sleep in snows, are imperate acts; that is, such which the virtue may choose and exercise for its own advantage and interests; but such which are not necessary to any man in particular, nor to most men in the general: useful indeed, in some cases, but not necessary in any. To eat and drink sparingly, and so as may minister to health and religion, is directly, that is, a proper and elicit act of temperance; but if a man spares to eat, that he may have wherewithal to pay his debts, it is an imperate act of justice; if to make himself healthful and strong to war, it is an act of fortitude. The terms being so explicated, the measures of the rule are these following particulars:—

^o James ii. 15.

2. (1.) The elicit acts of several virtues can never be contrary to each other; as an act of religion is never against an act of charity; chastity is never against justice; temperance is never against piety. The effect of which proposition is this,—that one ought not to be pretended against another, and no piety to parents can engage us to be drunk for their sakes; no pretence of religion can make it lawful to neglect the care of our children: and to this purpose was that excellent precept of the son of Sirach; “Let not the reverence of any man cause thee to sin:” it is no good manners to comply with our superiors against our supreme, and there is a time and a place for every virtue; but no time nor place, no cause or opportunity of doing against any. It may so happen, that the external actions of several virtues cannot consist: as sometimes I cannot pay the gabel to the prince, and the offering to the priest; I cannot feed my child and the poor that begs; I cannot, at some times, tell truth, and yet preserve the life of my brother. Now when the two external elicit acts of virtue are inconsistent, the one must of necessity give place: the rules of which are to be given more properly in another place:^p but that which for the present I am to say, is this,—that although the outward act cannot at all times be exercised, and so must in certain cases be omitted—yet, in no case can it be lawful for the interest of one virtue to do against another.

3. (2.) The imperate acts of one virtue may contradict the imperate or instrumental and ministering acts of another:—as fasting when it is commanded by religion, may be against the advice of our physician, whom to observe it is sometimes a precept of prudence, sometimes of charity. Religion commands us sometimes to feast; and at the same time our charity bids us save our expense, that the poor may be fed the more plentifully. The reason of this is,—because all the imperate acts of virtue are external, and must depend upon something from without; which because it can unavoidably be hindered, it must needs also be, that it may inculpably be omitted. But then the rule is this; Because all imperate acts of virtue are nothing in themselves, but wholly in relation to the virtue,—that imperate act, which ministers to that virtue which is then to be preferred, must also be preferred. The reason is plain: the accessory must follow the nature of the principal; and therefore if we must now prefer the virtue, we must also prefer the instrument. The case is this; Don Antonio Licente, of Portugal, according to the Portuguese and Spanish vanity, loved to see his wife painted; and one evening commanded her to appear with him so disguised at a mask: she having notice that a young gentleman, who was passionately in love with her, would be there, and knowing that it would inflame his passion if she were so adorned, inquires of her confessor, by what means she should restrain the folly of that innamorato, and receives this amongst other advices; that at no hand she should appear before him with any artificial handsomeness: if she obeys her husband’s humour at that meeting, she does hurt to a soul, and gives fuel to an impure flame, which is already too big: if she does not obey him in that instance, her husband will lose the pleasure of his fancy. But because she finds there is no other evil will be consequent to her omission, but that her husband shall want a little fantastic pleasure; and the consequence of her obeying him would be, for ought she knew, that God might lose a soul,—she chose to do an act ministering to spiritual charity, and the chastity of her brother, rather than an act that could be instrumental to nothing but the airy pleasure of her husband; though otherwise she had been bound to signify her obedience to him by any thing that had been lawful.

4. But in this there is some variety, and ought to be some caution: for although the principal virtue is to be preferred not only in itself, or in its proper and elicit acts, but also in its imperate and instrumental; yet this is to be understood to be true, when the instruments are in equal order to their respective virtues, or when there is no considerable difference. For if the action in question ministering to the less principal virtue do very much promote it, and the other, which is instrumental to the more principal, do it but an inconsiderable advantage;—the ministry of the less principal is, in that case, to be preferred: the reason is, because, by this omission of an inconsiderable instrument, the present duty is not hindered; but the service of God is advantaged in the other; because it is able to effect something that is considerable towards the service of God, which the other is not. The case is this; I knew a brave man, who by a conspiracy of evil persons, was condemned to die. He having, of a long time, used to fast till the morning office was completed, because he found fasting to be practised by antiquity, and by holy persons in their more solemn offices, and thinking it might or did him some advantage in order to the bettering of his prayer, did think to do so in the morning before his execution. But then, on the other side, he considered, that if he fasted, he should suffer a great diminution of spirits, and possibly might be suspected of pusillanimity, if he did suffer a natural lipothymy; and therefore could not tell what he should do. He was sure that to acquit himself before God in his duty was much to be preferred before the other, of appearing brave and hardy before men; and therefore that his private prayers were more to be regarded than his public confidence; and therefore was choosing to fast: but then he reflected again on the instrumental actions, and considered that his abstinence from a little meat would bring but a very little and inconsiderable advantage to his prayers, but his eating would very much strengthen his heart, and do him a very considerable advantage that way, he chose this;—because the other could easily be supplied by the intenseness of his spirit, his zeal, and his present necessity, but this could not but by natural supplies and supportations of the strengths of the body.

5. But, in the like cases, prudence and the conduct of a good guide is the best security to him that inquires with an honest heart and pure intention; and then the determination is best, and the conscience is safest, when both can be reconciled; but when they cannot, the former measures are to be observed.

6. (3.) Those actions which can only signify or serve the interest of virtue by way of collateral advantage and indirect ministry, must ever give place, when they hinder the proper acts of any virtue whatsoever. Fasting must never be used, when to fast is against charity; because charity is directly commanded, but fasting is relative to something else, and is not commanded for itself. Now in those things which are of a disparate nature, a principal is ever to be preferred before an instrument, and an act of duty before an act of prudence, and necessity before convenience.

7. (4.) But in things subordinate, that is, when the outward act is an elicit act of virtue, and truly subordinate to the internal, there can be no contradiction of one to the other; but the outward act and the inward must be both performed; that is, neither of them must be pretended in objection to the other; for they cannot hinder each other; but the outward can be hindered only by something from without, but the inward by nothing. So that in order to conscience, the rule is this; "He that does an inward and elicit act of virtue, will certainly, if it be in his power, do the outward elicit act:" that is, the hand will move at the command of the will, and the foot will go if it be commanded,—and if the soul be charitable, the hand will be apt to minister. For it is not well within, unless it be well without; that is, unless the virtue express itself in outward action, where it can. And on the other side; an outward elicit act of virtue can never go alone; unless it be the product of a good heart and of an inward elicit act, it is the imperate act of pride, or ambition, or a vicious fear, or covetousness, or something criminal; but neither the imperate nor the elicit act of any virtue whatsoever.

8. (5.) Though the words of art here used be not common, yet the practice of these rules in the questions of conscience will not be difficult, if we shall, but with some diligence, observe the difference of external actions, and be able to discern what outward actions are the elicit or proper, and which are the imperate and instrumental acts of virtue; because these being to give place to other acts by the events and constitution of their own nature, and the other never but when they are hindered from without, our duty will be easy, when we once understand of what nature the outward action is. The rule, therefore, for the direction of our conscience in this affair, is this;—"Those actions, which either are commanded by name and in particular, or by direct and proper consequence from the general, they are the elicit and proper actions of a virtue." Thus to give alms is a proper and elicit act of charity: to condemn the criminal is a proper act of justice: to speak well of all men behind their backs, so far as we can with truth, is an elicit act of equity. But whatever is of that nature that it can be done innocently, and yet not be an act of virtue properly, that only is instrumental to a virtue, and is an imperate action. Thus to invite rich men to a feast may be done prudently and without scruple; but he that does so and no more, shall have no reward in heaven for it: but yet to invite rich men to a banquet may minister to friendships or peace, or it may obtain relief to a poor oppressed brother; and then it may be a good instrument of that virtue, to which, by accident or the personal intention of the man, (not the natural order or intention of the thing,) it does minister. By the serious observation of this difference of acts we may be guided in many cases of conscience, and in the interpretation of some of the laws of our religion.

RULE VII.

When any Thing is forbidden by the Laws of Christ, all those Things also, by which we come to that Sin, are understood to be forbidden by the same Law.

1. IN this, there is one great difference between positive and negative laws. When any thing is commanded or enjoined, to take or use any instrument to it is left to our choice, and is matter of prudence and not duty: as when we are commanded to mortify the lusts of the body; we are not commanded to lie upon the ground, or to masticate rhubarb, or to go barefoot, or to put on St. Francis's girdle upon the bare body: as we find these actions aptly instrumental to the duty, and fitted to the person, so we may use them; but if the fear of hell, or the hopes of heaven, can mortify us sufficiently to all the purposes of the Spirit,—or if he who is married, be not tempted,—or he who is unmarried, be by nature abstinent, or by disease and imperfection,—these instruments are out of use, as to these purposes. For here nothing is under command but the duty itself; and if by any good instrument it be done, it is all one as to the law. But in negative precepts, the case is otherwise: for the crime is not only to be abstained from, but every instrument of it, every path that leads to it, whatsoever can begin or promote it; and the reason is, because all these things are of the same nature with the sin; and therefore although every thing that is or may be good, is not commanded, yet every evil is forbidden. "One fly can spoil a pot of ointment." But this we are plainly taught by our blessed Saviour's sermon on the mount; where he expounded the precepts of the ancients, not only to signify the outward act, but the inward desire: and in this our blessed Master's law is much more perfect than the digest of Moses; for although there also God forbade concupiscence, yet it was only instanced in the matter of covetousness; and was not extended to the other instances of duty; but in Christ's law, "non concupiscas" is the "apex juris;" it is the conservatory and the last duty of every commandment.

Nam scelus intra se tacitum qui cogitat ullum,

He that thinks a lustful thought, hath broken a commandment; and if the eye be full of adultery, or the mouth be impure, or the hand be unclean,—the whole man is polluted before God, and stands guilty of the breach of the main law. “Exercetur, atque aperitur opere nequitia, non incipit.” The deed tells the heart, and opens the shop of crimes; but they begin in the heart, and end in the outward work.

2. But in this there is no difficulty: for God being Lord of all our faculties, and the Searcher of hearts, and the Judge of our thoughts, he must be served by all; and he searches, that he may judge all,—and judges, that he may punish or reward all. But the rule is only thus to be limited; that in those sins, whose being criminal is wholly relative to persons with whom we converse,—every thought is not a sin, unless that thought also be relative. As he sins not that thinks a lie, if he resolves not to abuse any body with it,—and a man may love to please himself with false news, and put on a fantastic confidence and persuasion of the truth of what he would fain have to be true; though to his reason it seem improbable. In this there is some folly, but no malice: but to lie is a relative action; and if he have but a thought or purpose to abuse the credulity of any one, then that thought or purpose is a lie; that is, it is of the same nature with a lie; and therefore of the same condemnation. The case is the same in all things, which are forbidden only because they are uncharitable or unjust to my brother, but are permitted when they are otherwise.

3. (2.) But the intention of the rule is more: for it means, that all the addresses and preparations to criminal and forbidden actions are also forbidden. Thus because Christ gave a law against fornication, he hath also forbidden us to tempt any one to it by words, or by wanton gestures, or lascivious dressings; and she fornicates that paints her face with idle purposes.

4. (3.) It is also meant concerning temptations to a forbidden instance; for they also are forbidden in the prohibition of the crime; which is to be understood with these cautions:

5. (1.) If the temptation be in a natural and direct order to the sin, it is forbidden, where the sin is. Thus because lusts of the flesh are prohibited, it is also our duty, that we do “not make provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts of it.” Eating high and drinking deep are actions of uncleanness, as well as of intemperance: and in the same proportion also is every thing, that ministers directly to the lusts of the lower belly, though in a less degree; as lying soft, studying the palate, arts of pleasure and provocation, enticing gestures: with this caution:—

6. (2.) If the effect be observed in these less and lower instances, then they are directly criminal: for whatsoever did bring a sin and is still entertained knowingly and choosingly, is, at least by interpretation, chosen for the sin’s sake: but first and before the observation, it may enter upon another account; which if it be criminal, to that these instances are to be reckoned, and not to that sin to which they minister unknowingly.

7. (3.) Every temptation is then certainly to be reckoned as a sin, when it is procured by our own act; whether the temptation ministers to the sin directly or accidentally: for if we can choose it, it can have no excuse: “tute quod intristi, tibi comedendum est:” and unless the man be surprised, his choosing of an instrument to sin withal, is not for the sake of the instrument, but for its relation: and this is true, although the usual effect does not follow the instrument. For there is sometimes a fantastic pleasure in the remembrances of sin, in the approaches of it, in our addresses to it: and there are some men who dare not act the foul crime, who yet love to look upon its fair face: and they drive out sin as Abraham did Ishmael, with an unwilling willingness, (God knows,) and therefore give it bread and water abroad though no entertainment at home, and they look after it, and are pleased with the stories of it, and love to see the place of its acting: and they roll it in their minds: now that they go but thus far, and love to tempt themselves by walking upon the brink of the river, and delight themselves in viewing the instrument of their sin, though they use it no further, they have given demonstration of their love of sin when they make so much of its proxy.

*Hic locus, hæc eadem, sub quâ requiescimus, arbor,

8. But there are others, who have great experience of the vanity of all sin, and the emptiness and dissatisfaction that is in its fruition,—and know as soon as ever they have enjoyed it, it is gone, and that there is more pleasure in the expectation than in the possession;—and therefore they had rather go towards it than arrive thither; and love the temptation better than the sin: these men sin with an excellent philosophy and wittiness of sinning: they love to woo always and not to enjoy, ever to be hungry and sitting down to dinner, but are afraid to have their desires filled; but if we consider what the secret of it is, and that there is in these men an immense love to sin, and a perfect adhesion to the pleasure of it, and that they refuse to enter lest they should quickly pass through,—and they are unwilling to taste it, lest they should eat no more,—and would not enjoy, because they will not be weary of it; and will deny any thing to themselves, even that which they most love, lest for a while they should loathe the beloved sin; we shall see reason enough to affirm these men to be the greatest breakers of the laws of Jesus Christ; though they only tempt themselves and handle the instruments of sin, and although these instruments serve nothing but the temptation, and the temptation does not serve the sin, whither in its own nature it is designed.

9. (4.) If the temptation be involuntary, then it is not imputed: and yet this is to be understood with this provision; that it be neither chosen directly, nor by interpretation; that is, that it be not entered into by carelessness, or confidence, or choice. If it be by choice, then it is directly against that law of Christ, which forbids that sin whither the temptation leads; but if it enter by carelessness or confidence, it belongs not to this rule; for although every such temptation is against the laws of Christ, yet they are not under the same law, by which the effect is prohibited,—but unlawful, because they are against christian prudence and christian charity.

RULE VIII.

The suppositive Propositions with the supervening Advices of our blessed Saviour, are always equivalent to Matter of Duty, and are, by Interpretation, a Commandment.

1. THIS rule is intended as an explication of the precepts of prayer, alms, and fasting: all which our blessed Saviour, in his sermon upon the mount, expressed by way of supposition; which way of expression although it be not a positive and legal expression of a commandment, yet it either supposes a preceding law, or a confirmed practice; or at least that those to whom such words are directed, are willing, and loving, and obedient people, understanding the intimations and secret significations of the Divine pleasure. “When ye give alms, do not blow a trumpet,” said our blessed Saviour: “When ye pray, stand not in the corners of the streets; when you fast, do not disfigure your faces.” Now concerning prayer and alms there is no difficulty, because our blessed Lord and his apostles have often repeated the will of God in express commandments concerning them; but because of fasting he hath said much less, and nothing at all but these suppositive words, and a prophecy, that his disciples should fast in the days of the bridegroom’s absence, and a declaration of the blessed effects of fasting; this hath a proper inquiry and a special difficulty, whether or no these words have the force of a commandment.

2. Concerning which we may take an estimate by those other expressions of our lawgiver concerning alms; which we without further scrutiny know to be commandments, because, in other places, they are positively expressed: and therefore if we can find it so concerning fasting, this inquiry will be at an end. Now concerning this I will not only observe, that the three great heads and representatives of the law, the prophets, and the gospel,—Christ, Moses, and Elias, who were concentrated and enwrapped in one glory upon mount Tabor, were an equal example of fasting,—which, in their own persons, by a miracle, was consigned to be an example and an exhortation to fasting to all ages of religion; and each of them, fasting forty days upon great occasions, told to them who have ears to hear, what their duty is in all the great accidents of their life; but that which is very material to the present inquiry is, that this supposition of our blessed Lord, “When ye fast,” was spoken to a people who made it a great part of their religion to fast, who placed some portions of holiness in it, who had received the influence of their greatest, their best, their most imitable examples for religious fasting: and the impression of many commandments, not only relative to themselves, as bound by such a law, but as being under the conduct of religion in general. Such was the precept of the prophet Joel; “Thus saith the Lord, Turn ye even to me, with all your heart, with fasting, and with weeping, and with mourning.”¹ Now whatever the prophets said, that related to religion abstractedly or morally, all that is evangelical (as I proved^r formerly in this book): besides, there was a universal solemn practice of this exercise, under Joshua, at Ai; under the Judges, at Gibeah; under Samuel, at Mizpah: under David, at Hebron: fasts frequently proclaimed, frequently instituted; at the preaching of Jeremy and David, of Joel and Zachary; before the captivity, under it, and after it; in the days of sorrow and in the days of danger; in their religion solemn and unsolemn; after they had sinned and when they were punished; at Jerusalem among the Jews, and at Nineveh amongst the gentiles: now because it is certain, that all this could not be confined to the special religion of the Jews, but was an expression and apt signification and instrument of a natural religion, our blessed Saviour needed not renew this and efform it over again into the same shape, but had reason to suppose the world would proceed in an instance, whose nature could not receive a new reason and consequent change in the whole.

3. This heap of considerations relates to that state of things, in which our blessed Saviour found this religious exercise at his coming. Now if we consider what our blessed Saviour did to it in the gospel, we shall perceive he intended to leave it no less than he found it; for, (1.) He liked it and approved it, he allowed a time to it, a portion of that by which God will be served; and he that gave us time only to serve him, and in that to serve ourselves, would not allow any time to that, by which he was no way served. (2.) We cannot tell why Christ should presuppose that a thing was to be done, which God did not require to be done: such things Christ used to reprove, not to recommend,—to destroy, not to adorn by the superfetation of a new commandment. (3.) These words he speaks to his disciples in the promulgation of his own doctrine, in his sermon upon the mount, which is the great institution and sanction of the evangelical doctrine,—and therefore left it recommended and bound upon them by a new ligature, even by an adoption into the everlasting covenant. (4.) He represents it equally with those other of prayer and alms, which, in this excellent digest of laws, he no otherwise recommends, but as supposing men sufficiently engaged to the practice of these duties: “When ye pray, enter into your chamber,” and “When ye pray, say, Our Father,” and “When ye fast,” be sincere and humble. (5.) He that presupposes, does also establish; because then one part of the duty is a postulate, and a ground for the superstructure of another; and is sufficiently declared by its parallels in the usual style of Scripture. “My son, when thou servest the Lord, prepare thy soul for temptation;" so the son of Sirach:—and again, "When thou hearest, forgive;"^s and again, "When thou art afflicted, call upon him:" which forms of expression suppose a perfect persuasion and accepted practice of the duty; and is more than a conditional hypothetic; "si jejunitis" hath in it more contingency, but "cum jejunitis" is an expression of confidence, and is gone beyond a doubt. (6.) That exercise which Christ orders and disposes, which he reforms and purges from all evil superinduced appendage, is certainly dressed for the temple and for the service of God; now this of fasting Christ reforms from its being abused, as he did prayer and alms; and therefore left it in the first intention of God, and of a natural religion, to be a service of God, like that of bowing the head, or going to worship in the houses of prayer. (7.) To this duty he promises a reward: our heavenly Father that seeth thy fasting in secret shall reward thee openly: that is, its being private shall not hinder it from being rewarded; for God sees it, and likes it, and loves it, and will reward it.

4. Now for confirmation of all this, and that this was to this purpose so understood by the disciples and followers of our Lord: St. Paul was "in fastings often;"¹ and this was a characteristic note of the ministers of the gospel, "in all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God, in much patience—in watchings, in fastings:"² and when Paul and Barnabas were ordained apostles of the uncircumcision, they "fasted^x and prayed," and laid their hands on them, and so sent them away; and esteemed this duty so sacred, that St. Paul permitted married persons, σχολλάζειν, "to appoint vacant times" from their endearments, that they may "give themselves to fasting^y and prayer:" and the primitive christians were generally such ascetics in this instance of fasting, that the ecclesiastical story is full of strange narratives of their prodigious fastings.

5. Lastly, fasting is an act of many virtues; it is an elicit and proper act of temperance, and of repentance, and of humiliation, and of mortification of the flesh, with its affections and lusts; it is an imperate and instrumental act ministering to prayer, and is called a service of God: so the good old prophetess^z served God day and night in fasting and prayer; and that which serves God, and ministers so much to religion, and exercises so many graces, and was practised by the faithful in both Testaments, and was part of the religion of both Jews and gentiles, and was the great solemnity and publication of repentance, and part of a natural religion, and an endearment of the Divine mercy and pity; that which was always accounted an instrument of impetration or a prevailing prayer; which Christ recommended, and presupposed, and adorned with a cautionary precept, and taught the manner of its observation, and to which he made promises, and told the world that his heavenly Father will reward it; certainly this can be no less than a duty of the evangelical or christian religion.

6. But, although it be a duty, yet it is of a nature and obligation different from other instances. When it relates to repentance, it is just a duty, as redeeming captives is commanded under the precept of mercy: that is, it is the specification or positive exercise and act of an affirmative duty; it is a duty in itself, that is, an act whereby God can be served; but it becomes obligatory to the man by other measures, by accidental necessities and personal capacities, in time and place, by public authority and private resolution. Not that a man cannot be said to be a true penitent unless he be a faster; but that fasting is a proper, apt, natural, usual, approved expression, and an exercise of repentance: it is more fitted to the capacities of men, and usages of religion, than any other outward act; it hath some natural and many collateral advantages more than other significations of it: and it is like bowing the head or knee in prayer, and is to repentance the same outwardly as sorrow is inwardly; and it is properly the penance or repentance of the body, which because it hath sinned must also be afflicted, according to that of St. James, "Be afflicted, and mourn, and weep: let your laughter be turned to mourning, and your joy to heaviness: humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord:" that is, "repent ye of your sins:" for all these expressions signify but this one duty, and this great exercise and signification of it are so much a duty in the general, that it cannot be omitted without good reason,—nor then neither unless it be supplied by something else, in its just time and circumstances.

7. In order to other ends fasting is to be chosen and preferred before instruments less apt, less useful, less religious, that is, indeed, before the imperate and ministering acts of any kind whatsoever; for it is the best in many respects, and remains such, unless it be altered by the inconveniences or healthlessness of the person.

RULE IX.

The Institution of a Rite or Sacrament by our blessed Saviour, is a direct Law, and passes a proper obligation in its whole Integrity.

1. This rule can relate but to one instance, that of the holy sacrament of Christ's body and blood; for although Christ did institute two sacraments, yet that of baptism was under the form of an express commandment, and therefore for its observation needs not the auxiliaries of this rule. But, in the other sacrament, the institution was by actions, and intimations of duty, and relative precepts, and suppositions of action; as "quoties feceritis," and the like. Now whether this do amount to a commandment or no, is the inquiry; and though the question about the half-communion be otherwise determinable, yet by no instrument so certain and immediate as this.

2. In order therefore to the rule of conscience in this instance I consider, that an institution of a thing or state of life by God, and by his Christ, is to be distinguished from the manner of that thing so instituted. When a thing is instituted by God, it does not equal a universal commandment; but obtains the force of a precept according to the subject-matter and to its appendant relations. Thus when God instituted marriage, he did not, by that institution, oblige every single person to marry: for some were eunuchs from their mothers' wombs, and some were made eunuchs by men; and some make themselves eunuchs for religious and severe ends, or advantages of retirement and an untroubled life. But "by this institution," say the doctors of the Jews, "every man was at first obliged;" and so they are still, if they have natural needs or natural temptations; but because the institution was relative to the public necessities of mankind, and the personal needs of man, therefore it was not a universal or unlimited commandment; but only so far as it did minister to the necessary end, so far it was a necessary commandment. It was not instituted for eunuchs; but for whom it was instituted, to them it was a remedy against sin, and the support of the world, and the original of families, and the seminary of the church, and the endearment of friendships, and the parent of societies: and until the necessities of the world were abated, and the needs of single persons were diverted, or broken in pieces, by the discipline of a new institution,—it was esteemed infamous, and it was punishable, not to marry.

3. But then if we consider the manner of this thing so instituted, it is certainly a perfect, unalterable, and universal commandment. For although every man in every circumstance be not, by virtue of the institution, obliged to marry; yet if he does marry, by the institution he is tied up strictly, that at no hand he must prevaricate the measures and limits of the institution. He that marries, must marry by that rule and by no other. He must marry one woman only while she is alive: he must leave father and mother and adhere to her; he must treat her with charity and honour; he must use her by the limits of nature and sobriety; he must make her the mother of his family; he must make her serve no desire but what is natural; and so in every thing he is limited to the first institution.

4. The reason is, because a Divine institution is the whole cause, and the entire beginning and the only warranty and legitimation, of the state or of the action: and therefore whatsoever is otherwise than the institution, is not from God, but from ourselves: so that although the institution does not oblige us in all cases to do the thing at all; yet in all cases it obliges us to do it in the manner it is appointed: and in this sense the word is used in good authors, "Nam is, quanquam triennium nutricibus dederit, tamen ab illis quoque jam formandam quam optimis institutis mentem infantium judicat," said Quintilian;^a "The understanding even of infants is, from the very beginning, to be formed with the best institutions:" that is, with the best laws and precepts of manners. "Institutiones sunt præceptiones, quibus instituuntur et docentur homines," said Laurentius Valla: "The precepts by which men are taught what to do, are called institutions:"—so Quintilian inscribed his books, "de Institutione Oratoria," and Lactantius wrote "Institutions;" that is, "commentaries" on the precepts and laws of christianity. But it hath in it this peculiarity of signification, that the word "institution" does signify properly rules and precepts of manners, properly the measures of practice, or rules teaching us what we are obliged to do. So that institution does not directly signify a commandment, but it supposes the persons obliged, only it superadds the manner and measures of obedience. "Cum ad literas non pertineat ætas, quæ ad mores jam pertinet," &c. says Quintilian;^b "since that age is not capable of letters, but is capable of manners," they are to be efformed by the best and noblest institutions.

5. And thus it is in the matter of the sacrament, as it is in the matter of marriage. All men are not always obliged to receive the sacrament; for the institution of it being in order to certain ends, and in the recipients certain capacities and conditions required by way of disposition, there can be but a relative, and therefore a limited commandment of its reception: but to them who do receive it, the institution is a perfect indispensable commandment for the manner in all the essential parts, that is, in all which were intended in the institution. Now whence I argue, Whatsoever is a part of Christ's institution of the sacrament, is for ever obligatory to all that receive it.

But the sacrament in both kinds is a part of the institution of the sacrament: therefore,

It must for ever oblige all that communicate or receive it. That first proposition relies upon the nature of Divine institutions, which giving all the authority and warranty to the whole action, all its moral being and legitimation, must be the measure of all the natural being, or else it is not of God, but of man. "Indignum dicit esse Domino, qui aliter mysterium celebrat, quam ab eo traditum est: non enim potest devotus esse, qui aliter præsumit quam datum est ab auctore," saith St. Ambrose;^c "St. Paul saith, "He is unworthy of the Lord who celebrates the mystery otherwise than it was delivered by him: he cannot be devout who presumes otherwise than it was given by the author:" and to this purpose are those severe words of the apostle; "Si quis evangelizaverit præter quod accepistis," "If any man preach any other gospel than what he have received, let him be anathema;"^d that is, from Christ we have received it; and so as we received it, so we deliver it; and so it must descend upon you without the superfetation of any new doctrine.

6. And indeed how is it possible to pretend a tradition from Christ by the hands of his apostles, and the ministry of the church, if we celebrate it otherwise than Christ delivered it? "Religioni nostræ congruit, et timori, et ipsi loco, et officio sacerdotii nostri custodire traditionis Dominicæ veritatem. Et quod prius videtur apud quosdam erratum, Domino monente corrigere, ut cum in claritate suâ et majestate cœlesti venire cœperit, inveniat nos tenere quod monnit, observare quod docuit, facere quod fecit;" they are the excellent words of St. Cyprian,^e and perfectly conclusive in this article. For there were some, who, out of an impertinent pretension of sobriety, would not use wine, but water, in the sacrament; the instrument by which St. Cyprian confutes their folly, is a recourse to the institution. See, how did Christ deliver it: "Invenimur non observari à nobis quod mandatum est, nisi eadem quæ Dominus fecit, nos quoque faciamus:" "Unless we do what Christ did, we do not observe what he commanded;"—plainly implying, that the institution itself was a commandment: "we must hold what he admonished, we must observe what he taught, we must do what he did." Not every thing done at the time of the institution, but, "every thing of it." "For," says he, "Christ did institute it after supper, but we in the morning. But every thing by which he did signify what he did exhibit, and exhibit what he did promise, every such thing was a part of the institution, and cannot be changed." And therefore St. Paul, when he instructs the Corinthians in the mystery of the holy eucharist, uses no demonstration of the rites but this: "I have received this of the Lord:" and, "This I have delivered unto you. Other things I will set in order when I come;"^f that is, "Whatsoever I did not receive from the Lord Jesus; whatsoever was not of his institution, I have power to dispose of; but not of any thing which he appointed."

7. (1.) Now there is no peradventure, but the apostles understood this institution to be a commandment, οὕτως παρέδωκαν ἐντετάλθαι αὐτοῖς τὸν Ἰησοῦν said Justin Martyr,^g speaking of the distribution of the bread and wine, ἐκάστω τῶν παρόντων, "to every one that was present," he says that "the apostles did deliver that Jesus so commanded them." For what commandment have we to consecrate in bread and wine? What precept is there, that the consecration should be by a priest? Nothing but the institution. For if it be said, that Christ added the preceptive words of "Hoc facite," "This do in remembrance of me."—I reply, He did so: but "Hoc facite" is no commandment of itself, but when it is joined with, "in mei commemorationem," "in remembrance of me;"—that is, when ye remember me, then do thus: so St. Paul^h more expressly, "This do, as often as ye drink it, in remembrance of me." Therefore "Hoc facite" will be but ill expounded to be a commandment for the priests' consecration; unless it borrow all its force from the whole institution: for it plainly says only this; "When ye remember me, then do this which ye see me do." But "Hoc facite" does not signify any particular commandment, but that which is relative to the whole action; and all the discourses of mankind can never extract any other signification.

8. But, (2.) The apostles received an express commandment; "Drink ye all of this."—If therefore Christ instituted the sacrament for the whole church, and that they were the representatives of the whole body of Christ,—then all the whole church, when they communicate, are bound by the commandment to receive the chalice. But if they did not represent the whole church, then where shall we find a warranty that the people may receive it all? For if they received only in the capacity of clergymen, then the institution extends no further; and it is as much sacrilege for the people to eat and drink the symbols as to offer at the consecration. But if they received in the capacity of christians only, then they received the commandment of drinking in the chalice for themselves and for all christians.

9. And indeed the apostles were not then priests.—"True," say they of the church of Rome, "they were not;" but James Payva, a Portuguese, in the council of Trent, talked merrily, and said that "the apostles as laics received the bread; but then when Christ said, 'Hoc facite,' 'This do,' he made them priests; and then gave them the chalice as representatives of the clergy, not of the people." But as merry a fancy as this seemed then, it was found to be the best shift they had; and therefore, upon better advice, it was followed by Canasius, Suarez, Belarmino, and divers others. But if this be stood upon, besides that it must be crushed to nothing by the preceding argument, the pretence itself crosses their own devices. For if it be said, that the apostles were made priests by "Hoc facite," spoken before the institution of the chalice,—then "Hoc facite" does not signify, "Offerte sacrificium," and consequently cannot make them priests, that is, (with them,) "sacrificers;" for, by their own doctrine, to offer both kinds is necessary to its being a sacrifice. Since therefore the first "Hoc facite" (which indeed is the only one mentioned by the evangelists) can but relate to the consecrating of the bread,—as the second (mentioned by St. Paul) does to the consecrating of the chalice,—either they are priests without a power of sacrifice; or the sacrifice is complete without the chalice; or else they were not then made priests when Christ first said, "Hoc facite;" and if they were by the second, besides that a reason cannot be fancied, why the same words should, and should not, effect so differing changes, without difference in the voice, or in the action, or in the mystery,—besides this, I say it is plain that Christ reached the cup to them, commanding them all to drink before he made them priests, that is, they received the chalice as representatives of the people: for being laics at least till all that ceremony was done, they did represent the people; and consequently as such, received a commandment to drink. Let them choose by what part they will be reproved. Every one of these overthrows their new doctrine, and all of them cannot be escaped. But let it be considered, whether it be likely that Christ should at one time institute two sacraments (for they pretend ordination to be as very a sacrament as the Lord's supper) of so different natures, and yet speak nothing of the use or the reason, the benefit or the necessity, of one of them: nor tell them that he did so, nor explicate the mystery, nor distinguish the rite, or the words, but leave it to be supposed or conjectured by the most imperfect and improbable construction in the world. But suppose it; yet at least it must be confessed that the words which Christ used, and the same ritual, must, in the apostles' ministry, be able to effect the same grace : and if so, then a priest hath power to ordain priests; for he hath power to say, "Hoc facite," in all the same meanings which Christ had, when he used them: and if this be not accepted, yet at least a bishop may ordain all the congregations' priests, if he please,—by saying of one mass; which are pretty fancies and rare propositions in our divinity.

10. To which I add this consideration, that if our blessed Lord did, by those words of "Hoc facite," make his disciples priests, then they were priests before the Lord himself; for although he was designed for ever, yet he was consecrated on the cross, there he entered upon his priestly office; but officiates in that office not on earth but in heaven; "for if he were on earth, he should not be a priest," saith St. Paul; ⁱ therefore, being consecrate on the cross, he ascended into heaven to be there "our priest for ever, there making intercession for us." Now it were strange, if the apostles should be declared priests before the consecration, or first sacerdotal action, of their Lord: or that they should be priests without the power of the keys, without the commission to baptize in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; for these were given afterwards. But this device is so very a dream, so groundless and airy a phantasm, so weakly laid, and employed to such trifling purposes, that it needs no further inquiry into it;—it was raised to serve the end of this question, to answer an objection, and pretends no strength of its own, neither can it weaken that which hath; and that it is indeed only pretended for a shift, and intended to operate no further, appears in this manifestly; because, if the apostles did drink of the chalice in the capacity of being priests, then it ought to be followed, at least so far; and all the priests that are present, ought to receive the chalice,—which because they do not in the church of Rome, it is apparent they prevaricate the institution; and that they may exclude the laity from the cup, they use their clergy as bad, when themselves do not officiate.

11. (3.) This trifling pretence being removed, it remains that the words of institution, "Drink ye all of this," be also the words of a commandment; and although they were spoken to the apostles only, as being only present, yet the precept must equally concern all christians and disciples of Christ. Just like those of "Watch and pray, lest ye fall into temptation;" ^k and "Unless ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of God:" ^l which were spoken only in the presence of the apostles: but as these precepts and moral rules concern all christians; so do the words of institution of the holy sacrament and commandment of "Drink ye all of this." For, "oportet cœnam Dominicam esse communem, quia ille omnibus discipulis suis, qui aderant, æqualiter tradidit sacramenta," said St. Jerome: ^m "the Lord's supper is common to all, and so ought to be; because our Lord did equally deliver it to all that were present:" and upon this very account Durandus affirms, "In primitivâ ecclesiâ, singulis diebus, omnes qui celebrationi missarum intererant, communicare solebant, eo quod apostoli omnes de calice biberunt, Domino dicente, 'Bibite ex eo omnes:'" "In the primitive church all that were present, did, every day, receive, because the apostles did all drink of the chalice, and the Lord said, 'Drink ye all of this.'" ⁿ

12. And this appears, beyond all contradiction, to have been so intended. So St. Ignatius: ^o "There is one bread broken to all, καὶ ἓν ποτήριον τοῖς ὅλοις διανεμηθὲν, and one chalice distributed to all;" —and "there is no difference in this between the priest and the people," said St. Chrysostom; ^p and it is evident that St. Paul gives the same commandment of drinking the chalice, as of eating the bread; six times distinctly mentioning both the symbols, and directing the rule and the precepts of eating and drinking "to all that are sanctified in Christ Jesus," ^q even to all who are to examine themselves; for "let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread and drink of that cup:" ^r and that it was so the custom of the church, and their doctrine, that all are to receive the chalice, that there was no scruple made by the church concerning it,—we are fairly induced to a belief, by the addition made to the Greek text of 1 Cor. x. 17, by the vulgar Latin; for whereas it is in the Greek, "We all partake of the same bread," the vulgar Latin adds, "et de uno calice," "and of the same cup."—This I the rather note, because the Jesuits of Cologne did use this for an argument of the half-communion; "because, when St. Paul had spoken of the consecration, he mentions breaking bread, and drinking the cup; but when he speaks of sumption or participation, he only mentions the bread:" now supposing that, yet that defect is supplied by the vulgar Latin, the author of which knowing the universal custom of the church and the doctrine of it, supplied that out of the sentence of the church, which is not in the Greek text. Though if it had not been, yet the argument would have been just nothing, as being a conclusion drawn from a particular negative in one place; and against his custom in other places, and besides the institution.

13. For the doctrine and practice of the church are so notorious in this article, that in the Greek church there was never any variety in it; and to this day it is used, as it was in the beginning, and in all the intermedial ages: and in the Latin church for a thousand years it was not altered; nay, to this day the church of Rome sings in the hymn upon Corpus Christi day,

Dedit fragilibus corporis ferculum,
Dedit et tristibus salutis poculum,
Dicens, "Accipite quod trado vasculum:
Omnes ex eo bibite."

this vessel that I reach unto you, Drink ye all of this.'” Indeed it was often attempted to be changed upon the interest of divers heresies and superstitious fancies, and rare emergencies. For,

14. (1.) It was attempted to be omitted in the time of St. Cyprian, when some impertinent people would have water only; but not the chalice of the Lord's institution in the fruit of the vine; but these men's folly went not far, for being confuted and re-proved by St. Cyprian^s in a letter to his brother Cæcilius, I find no mention of them afterwards.

15. (2.) It was attempted to be changed upon occasion of the Eremites, who coming but seldom to church, could but seldom receive the chalice, but desiring more frequently to communicate, they carried the consecrated bread with them into their cells; and, when they had a mind to it, in that imperfect manner did imitate the Lord's supper. That they did so is certain, that they had no warrant for so doing is as certain; and therefore their doing so can be no warrant to us to do as they did,—much less ought it to be pretended in justification of the denying the chalice to the whole laity, when they desire it and may have it. However, this unwarrantable custom of the Eremites was taken away by the first council of Toledo in the year 390, and afterwards again forbidden in the year 500, by the fathers met in council at Cæsar Augusta. The words of the council of Toledo^t are these: “Si quis autem acceptam à sacerdote eucharistiam non sumpserit, velut sacrilegus propellatur:” but this is more fully explicated in that of Cæsar Augusta; “Eucharistiæ gratiam si quis probatur acceptam non consumpsisse in ecclesiâ, anathema sit in perpetuum:” so that under the pain of a perpetual curse, and under the crime of a sacrilege, they were commanded to spend the eucharistical symbols in the church; and this took from them all pretence of the necessity in some case of not receiving the chalice.

16. (3.) In the time of Pope Leo I. the Manichees, who abstained from wine as an abomination, would yet thrust themselves into the societies of the faithful, and pretend to be right believers; but St. Leo^u discovered them by their not receiving the chalice in the holy eucharist; and whereas they would have received in one kind only, he calls it sacrilege; and reproves them with the words of St. Paul; ^x “Mark them which cause divisions amongst you, and offences contrary to the doctrine which ye have received.” This was about the year 449.

17. (4.) Awhile after, about the year 490, some had gotten some superstitious fancy by the end; and, out of reverence to the holy sacrament, or some other device of their own, they thought it fit to abstain from the consecrated chalice: but Pope Gelasius made short work with them; he condemned their superstition, and gave sentence,^y “Aut integra sacramenta percipiant, aut ab integris arceantur,” “Either all or none:” drive them from the holy bread, if they refuse the sacrament of the Lord's blood.

18. (5.) The church had sometime, in extraordinary cases, as in communicating infants or dying people, dipped the holy bread into the chalice, and so ministered the sacrament: upon occasion of which, some fell in love with the trick, and would have had it so in ordinary ministrations: we find it mentioned in the history of Serapion in Eusebius, and in St. Cyprian “4. de Lapsis,” and in Prosper. But against this breach Pope Julius opposed himself, and stood in the gap, declaring it to be against the Divine order, and apostolical institutions, and contrary to the doctrine of the gospel and of the apostles and the custom of the church; and his words^a are remarkable to show from whence this article is to be adjusted and determined: “Non difficile hoc ab ipso fonte veritatis probatur, in quâ ordinata ipsa sacramentorum mysteria processerunt;” “The very ordination or institution of the sacrament is the fountain from whence we are to derive the truth in this inquiry.” But when this superstition was again revived about the year 580, the now-mentioned decree of Pope Julius was repeated in the third council of Braccara, and all set right again according to the perpetual custom of the church, and the institution of our blessed Lord, and their pretence (which was lest they should spill any thing of the holy chalice) laid aside as trifling and superstitious.

19. (6.) And yet after all these motions made by heretics and superstitious persons, and so many cautions, suppressions, and decrees against them; about the year 920, the order of Cluniac monks did communicate with the bread dipped in the chalice, as Cassander^b reports: and about the year 1120, it was permitted in some churches so to do: for by this time the world was so rude and ignorant, that they knew little of the mysteries of religion, and cared less; so that, for the danger of effusion of the holy wine, they in some places chose that expedient: which although it was upon great reason condemned by Pope Julius and the council of Braccara, yet it is a great argument that they still believed it necessary to communicate under both symbols.

20. (7.) But about the time that the schoolmen began to rule the chair, this danger of spilling the chalice wrought so much in their wise heads, that they began, about the year 1250, in some churches to leave out all use of the chalice, excepting to the priests, and some great men who would be careful not to spill. This was but in “some churches,” said Aquinas;^c and it was permitted to all the priests present, “de quibus præsumitur quod magis sint cauti;” and to some grandees of the people too for the same reason, as we find in Richard Middleton, Innocent IV. and Petrus de Tarantasia.

21. (8.) But by little and little the abuse went further, and grew confirmed, and miracles pretended and invented, as Alexander of Ales reports, to stop the outcries of certain religious, who were extremely troubled at the loss of the chalice: and now at last it became the general custom of the western churches; and it grew scandalous to desire it; and it was established into a doctrine in the council of Constance, and the institution of Christ and the custom of the primitive church were openly defied, taken notice of, and so laid aside, and anathema pronounced on them that should insist upon their right, or deny whole Christ to be under each kind, in the council of Trent; and so it abides at this day.

22. The question being now reduced to this short issue;—"whether under each kind whole Christ be received:"—it is not unworthy a short inquiry, concerning the truth, and concerning the consequence of it.

23. (1.) For the truth.—I consider that the effect of external rituals and ceremonials cannot be disputed philosophically; as we inquire into the portions of effect, which every herb hath in an infusion; but we are to take and use them in the simplicity of their institution; leaving them under that secrecy of their own mysteriousness, in which they were left in their first appointment and publication. The apostle explicating the mysteries of our religion, saith, that "Christ was delivered" (meaning unto death) "for our sins, and was raised again for our justification;"^d and yet that "we are justified by his blood."^e Upon these accounts we can say, that by Christ's death and by his resurrection we are justified, —and therefore we are to be partakers of both; but because we are "justified by faith in his blood," it will at no hand follow we may let alone our faith, or neglect to procure our part in his resurrection. So it is in the symbols eucharistical: supposing it had been said of the bread, "This is Christ," or, "This is the death of Christ," and the same said of the chalice; yet one alone is not sufficient to be received, when both are instituted; for as all the mysteries of our redemption are effective to our pardon and salvation; so are both the symbols of the eucharist to our reception of Christ; and baptism or absolution may better be pretended to the exclusion of the whole eucharist, than the sufficiency of bread to the exclusion of the chalice; for remission of sins is perfectly the grace of baptism; and those sins return not, but in the case of apostasy: but what is the effect of bread alone, is no where told; but that it is the commemoration or remembrance of the broken body of Christ, and the communication of that body; but then the chalice is also the remembrance of Christ's blood poured forth, and the exhibition of that which is for the remission of sins: and how these two do work that in us which we hope for, we know not, but that they work as mysteries and sacraments do work, but not as herbs, or natural agents, that we may believe.

24. (2.) I consider, that when Christ appointed to the two symbols two distinct significations, and that we believe that the sacraments exhibit to worthy communicants what they represent to all,—it must be certain that all Christ, that is, that all the benefits of Christ, are not conveyed by each, which are conveyed by both,—because, as they signify, so they exhibit; but they do not each signify what both together do. The breaking of the body does not signify the effusion of the blood; neither does the shedding of the blood signify the breaking the body: and to think that the reduplication of the symbols is superfluous, is to charge Christ with impertinency; and if it be not superfluous, then there is something of real advantage by both that is not in each. I will not venture to assign to each their portion of effect; for what they have, they have not naturally, but by Divine donation and appointment; and therefore I will not take notice, that the same chalice is representative and effective of union and charity, (though that is usual enough in societies and friendships,— but this I shall observe, that the whole effect of the sacrament is equally attributed to the worthy receiving the chalice as to that of the bread; and therefore St. Remy caused these verses to be written on the chalice:

Hauriat hinc populus vitam de sanguine sacro,
Inflicto æternus quem fudit vulnere Christus:

"Let the people from hence draw life issuing from the wounds of Christ:"—now whatsoever effect is attributed to one, is not in exclusion of the other, but in concomitance with it: and therefore, as it would be a strange folly to dispute what benefit we receive by Christ's flesh distinctly, and how much of our redemption is wrought by his blood, and it could have no use and no certainty,—so it would be as strange to say there is so much distinctly in the holy bread, so much in the wine; and it is worse to attribute to one that which can be employed to exclude the other: and it is certain there can be nothing said of advantage that either one or the other hath; and therefore the chalice may exclude the bread, as well as the holy bread the chalice, both alike, that is, indeed neither.

25. But it is to be observed, that in this inquiry, the question cannot be concerning the receiving Christ; but of receiving the sacrament of Christ, of his body and of his blood. For we receive Christ in baptism, and we receive Christ by faith; and yet nevertheless we are to receive the sacraments of Christ's body and blood: and therefore suppose we did receive Christ in the holy bread, yet that bread is but the sacrament of his broken body; and therefore we must also receive the sacrament of his blood spilt for us; or else we omit to receive the one half of the sacrament. And if the question were only about receiving Christ, we might pretend the whole sacrament to be needless; because a spiritual communion and faith alone will do that work; but yet faith alone, or the spiritual communion, does not give us the sacrament, nor obey Christ in this instance, nor commemorate and represent his death, which is the duty here inquired of, and here enjoined.

26. (1.) And therefore the dream of the church of Rome, that he that receives the body, receives also the blood, because, by concomitance, the blood is received in the body,—is neither true nor pertinent to this question. Not true, because the eucharist being the sacrament of the Lord's death, that is, of his body broken, and his blood poured forth, the taking of the sacrament of the body does not by concomitance include the blood; because the body is here sacramentally represented as slain and separate from blood: and that is so notorious, that some superstitious persons A. D. 490, refused the chalice, because, said they, "the body of Christ represented in the holy sacrament, 'exanguis est,' 'it is without blood;'" but now the Romanists refuse the chalice, because the body is not without blood. They were both amiss; for it is true the body is represented sacramentally as killed, and therefore without blood, which had ran out at the wounds; and therefore concomitance is an idle and an impertinent dream: but although the body is without blood in his death, yet because the effusion of the blood is also sacramentally to be represented, therefore they should not omit the chalice.

^d Rom. iv. 25.

27. But as to them of the Roman church; if the blood be in the body by concomitance, and therefore they who receive the body receive also the blood;—then they who sacrifice the body, do also sacrifice the blood; and then it will be no more necessary to celebrate in both kinds than to communicate in both. And indeed though the Roman schools will not endure that the "sacrifice," as they call it, or the consecration, should be in one kind, yet Volateranus says that "Pope Innocent VIII. gave leave to the Norwegians to sacrifice in bread only;" certain it is the priest may as well do so, as the people receive in one kind; for the people do, in their manner, as much celebrate the death of Christ as the priest,—nor he alone, nor they alone, but the whole action is the due celebration: however, the argument of concomitance concludes, equally, against the celebration in both kinds, as against the participation; and why the priest should be obliged to drink the chalice, and cannot be excused by concomitance, and yet the people are not obliged, but are excused by that pretension, abating the reasons of interest,—cannot easily be imagined.

28. Certain it is, they had other thoughts in the council of Turin; for when they considered the necessities of sick and dying people, they appointed the consecrated bread to be sopped in the consecrated chalice; adding this reason, "ut veraciter presbyter dicere possit, 'Corpus et sanguis Domini nostri Jesu Christi proficiat tibi in remissionem peccatorum et vitam æternam;'" "that the priest may say truly, 'The body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ be profitable unto you for the remission of your sins and unto life eternal.'" If they had then understood the device of concomitance, they would have known, that the priest might have said so truly, without sopping the holy bread in the chalice: but the good fathers had not yet learned the new metaphysics.

29. (2.) Now for the consequence of this pre-tension; I consider that let the thing be as true as the interested persons would have it,—yet it is not well that we should dispute against a Divine institution upon a pretence of our vain arguings. The apostles, with great simplicity, took in both kinds at that time, in which only the device of concomitance was or could be true; for then when they received it, the blood was in the body of Christ: but it was sacramental of the blood to be poured out the next day; however, they obeyed with simplicity and without inquiry, and never feared spilling, nor argued, nor sought excuses; such simplicity would equally become us: and as to the usefulness of receiving in both kinds, although it will ill become any man to argue concerning the usefulness of a Divine institution,—and to pretend excuses against Christ, upon the account of a philosophy of their own invention, is very much unlike the spirit of humility and wisdom and obedience, which ought to be the investiture of a christian's heart and the tiara of his head; yet I observe, that even in this particular the disadvantage is not little.

30. For if receiving the sacrament be of any advantage to souls, then it is certain he that does not receive it, is a loser; and yet he that does not receive the chalice, does not receive the sacrament, but a piece of it only; now in sacraments, half is as good as none: as he who should only dip a child in pure water, and yet not invoke the Trinity,—should do nothing at all with his half baptism; so it is certain, that the effect of a sacrament is not imparted by a half communion. And therefore Alexander of Ales^f said well, "Sumpto hoc sacramento digne in utraque specie, major est effectus unius corporis mystici cum capite, quam sumpto sub alterâ:" and in another place^g he says, to receive under both kinds is, "majoris meriti tum ratione augmentationis devotionis tum ratione fidei dilata-tionis actualis, tum ratione sumptionis completioris:" "it is of greater merit or value, there is a greater mystical union between the head and the members, a greater increase of devotion, a larger and more actual extent of faith, and a more complete sacramental reception of Christ himself." To the same purpose there are good things spoken in Albertus Magnus^h and in Thomas Aquinas,ⁱ Bonaventure,^k and Petrus de Palude,^l and divers others, all agreeing that one alone does not make a sacrament but a piece of one; and that there is advantage by both kinds, which is not to be had in one: which advantage if it be spiritual, (as it is, if it be at all,) then he that robs the people of a spiritual good, which our blessed Lord hath designed for them and left unto them, is sacrilegious and profane; it is uncharitable and it is impious. I say, it is impious.

31. For it is not to be despised, that our blessed Lord gave this sacrament as his last will and testament; and though he gave it in his body and blood, yet he expressed only "the new testament in his blood;" and for any church to violate the testament of our blessed Lord, however men may make no great matter of it; yet it will receive a punishment, according as God sets a value upon it: and he that shall pluck one seal from a testament, and say that one is as good as two, when two were put to it by the testator, cannot be excused by saying it was nothing but a formality and a ceremony. God's ceremonies are bound upon us by God's commandment; and what he hath made to be a sign, does signify and exhibit too: and as the brazen serpent, though it was but a type or shadow of the holy crucifix, yet did real cures; so can the symbols and sacraments of the crucifixion, being hallowed by the Divine institution, and confirmed by his power; and therefore a violation here is not to be called only a question in a ceremony: it is a substantial part of the christian religion, it is the sanction of the New Testament, the last will of our dying Lord. "Now if it be but a man's testament," saith St. Paul,^m "yet no man disannulleth or addeth thereto," and therefore to disannul or lessen a portion of the testament of the Son of God must needs be a high impiety. "Testamentum, quia individuum est, pro parte agnosci et pro parte repudiari non possit," says the law.ⁿ If you repudiate a part of the will, you must renounce it all; if you permit not to the people the blood of Christ, you hinder them from having a part in the death of Christ, so far as lies in you. Add to this; that this holy mystery being acknowledged by all to be the most mysterious solemnity of the religion, and, by the church of Rome, affirmed to be a proper sacrifice, and so contended for; it would be remembered that our blessed Saviour did adapt and fit this rite to the usages and customs both of Jews and gentiles; amongst whom laws, and societies, and contracts, and sacrifices, were made solemn by effusion and drinking of blood; and instead of blood, amongst the more civil nations, they drank wine: and by that were supposed partakers even of the blood of the sacrifice. Ἀπὸ τούτου γε φασι μεθύειν ὀνομάσθαι, (says Philo,) ὅτι μετὰ τὸ θύειν ἔθος ἦν τοῖς προτέροις οἰνοῦσθαι. "To be drunk," viz. in the Greek, "hath its name from their drinking wine after their sacrifices:" and with this custom among the gentiles, and with the paschal ceremony of this nature amongst the Jews, our blessed Lord, complying, loses the wisdom and prudence of it, if the priest shall sacrifice, and the people drink none of the blood of the sacrifice, or that which ritually and sacramentally represents it. The covenant of the gospel, the covenant which God made with us, our blessed Saviour established and ratified with blood: wine was made to represent and exhibit it; he therefore that takes this away, takes away the very sacramentality of the mystery, and "without blood there is no remission." For as he that gives bread and no water, does not nourish the body, but destroy it; so it is in the blessed sacrament; for (that I may use St. Austin's expression which Paschasius and Algerus in this article did much insist upon) "nec caro sine sanguine, nec sanguis sine carne jure communicatur. Totus enim homo ex duabus constans substantiis redimitur, et ideo carne simul et sanguine saginatur:" "neither the flesh without the blood, nor the blood without the flesh, is rightly communicated. For the whole man consisting of two substances, is redeemed, and therefore nourished both with the flesh and the blood." Καὶ οὐ καθάπερ ἐπὶ τῆς παλαιᾶς, τὰ μὲν ὁ ἱερεὺς ἤσθιε, τὰ δὲ ὁ ἀρχόμενος, καὶ ξέμις οὐκ ἦν τῷ λαῷ μετέχειν ᾧ μετείχεν ὁ ἱερεὺς, ἀλλὰ πᾶσιν ἐν σῶμα πρόκειται καὶ ποτήριον ἓν. "It is not now as it was in the Old Testament, where the priest ate one portion, the prince another, and the people another; here it is alike to all, the same body and the same chalice is to all."° I end this inquiry with the saying of St. Cyprian:^p "Si ne unum quidem ex minimis mandatis legis solvere debet, multo minus ex his magnis mandatis, pertinentibus ad ipsum Dominicæ passionis et nostræ redemptionis sacramentum, fas est ullum infringere, vel humanâ traditione mutare:" "If it be not permitted to break one of the least commandments of the law, much less is it to be endured, to break any one, or by human tradition to change any, belonging to the sacrament of our Lord's passion and of our redemption:" and therefore if ever any sect or any single person was guilty of the charge, it is highly to be imputed to the church of Rome, that "they teach for doctrine the commandments of men; and make the commandment of God of none effect by their tradition."

RULE X.

If the Sense of a Law be dubious, we are sometimes to expound it by Liberty, sometimes by Restraint.

1. ALTHOUGH all the laws of Jesus Christ are so legible in the sense intended, that all good men, being placed in their proper circumstances, conducted by the Divine Providence, making use of all their prepared and ready instruments, can certainly read the prime intention and design of God; yet because some laws are so combined with matter, and twisted with material cases, so intricated by the accidents of men and the investiture of actions, that they cast a cloud upon the light of God's word, and a veil upon the guide of our lives; and because the sense of words does change, and very often words cannot be equal with things, it comes to pass, that the laws are capable of different senses: when, therefore, any thing of this nature happens, the first sense of the words is either to be enlarged or restrained according to the following measures.

In what Cases the stricter Sense of the Laws of Christ is to be followed.

2. (1.) When the duty enjoined by the law is in deliberation, and is to be done, we are to use restraint, and take the severer sense of the law. The reason is, because that is the surer way, and hath in it no inconvenience or impossibility; but being it is the matter of choice, in all deliberation for the future we must give sentence for God, and for the interest of religion. Thus when it is commanded we should "judge ourselves, that we be not judged of the Lord;" in the inquiry, which every penitent

^m Gal. iii. 15.

ⁿ Lib. 7. Jus nostr. Dom. de Reg. Jur.

^o Chrysost. Hom. 18. in 2 Cor.

^p Lib. ep. 3.

man makes concerning the extension of the duty of judging ourselves, if the question be whether judging ourselves means only "to condemn" ourselves for having sinned, and to confess ourselves justly liable to the Divine judgment; or does it also mean "to punish" ourselves, and by putting our own sentence against our sin into a severe execution of that sentence upon ourselves by corporal inflictions? He that can no otherwise be determined in the question, can safely proceed by choosing the severer side; for there is no loss in it, no omission, it contains all that any man can think to be required; and therefore hath in it prudence and charity, caution and regard, to God and to himself.

3. (2.) This is not to be understood only in case there is a doubt no otherwise to be resolved, but by the collateral advantage of the surer side; but this severer sense of the law is of itself most reasonable to be chosen, as being the intended sense and design of the lawgiver, who certainly puts no positive measures to his own laws of love and duty. For since the great design of the law is such a perfection, which must for ever be growing in this world, and can never here arrive to its state and period, that sense which sets us most forward, is the most intended; and therefore this way is not only to quiet the doubt, but to govern and to rule the conscience: this is not only the surer way, but the only way that is directly intended. It is agreeable to the measures of charity, or the love of God, which is to have no other bounds, but even the best we can, in the measures of God and the infirmities and capacities of man.

4. (3.) In the interpretation of the laws of Christ, the strict sense is to be followed, when the laws relate to God and to religion, and contain in them direct matter of piety and glorifications of God, or charity to our neighbour; because in them the further we go, the nearer we are to God, and we are not at all to be stopped in that progression, till we are at our journey's end, till we are in the state of comprehension. To this purpose are those words of Ben Sirach,^a "When you glorify the Lord, exalt him as much as you can; for even yet will he far exceed; and when you exalt him, put forth all your strength, and be not weary, for you can never go far enough. Who hath seen him that he might tell us, and who can magnify him as he is? There are hid greater things yet than these be, for we have seen but a few of his works:" meaning, that although we cannot glorify God sufficiently for the works of power and mercy which we see and feel, yet because there are very many works, which we see not, and infinite numbers and seas of glories above the clouds, which we perceive not, and cannot understand,—the only measures of religion and the love of God which we are to take, are to "pray continually, to love God always, to serve him without end, to be zealous beyond all measures, excepting those of duty and prudence,—to be religious without a limit, always to desire, always to endeavour, never to rest as long as we can work, never to give over as long as any thing is unfinished;" and consequent or symbolical to all this, that in all disputes of religion we choose the sense of love, not of weariness; that we do not contend for the lesser measures, but strive in all our faculties and desires beyond their strength, and propound Christ for our precedent, and heaven for our reward, and infinity for our measures, towards which we are set forth by our active and quick endeavour, and to which we are to reach by our constancy and desires, our love and the Divine acceptance.

When the Laws of Christ are to be expounded to a Sense of Ease and Liberty.

5. If to the sense of the duty there be a collateral and indirect burden and evil appendage, the alleviating of that burden is to be an ingredient into the interpretation of the law, and the direct duty is to be done in such measures, as may do the most good with suffering the least evil. This happens in two cases:

6. (1.) If the strict and severer sense of the law be too great for the state and strength of the man; that is, if it be apt to make him despair, to make him throw away his burden, to make him tire, to be weary of and to hate religion,—his infirmities are to be pitied, and the severest sense of the law is not to be exacted of him. "Apices juris non sunt juris," say the lawyers: "The little punctilios and minute of law are not law;" because if our duty be extended to every little tittle of duty, it were necessary that our observation and attendance should be as particular and punctual; but because that cannot always be actual and intent, particular and incumbent, those things which insensibly pass by the observation of a diligent watchful person, do also inculpably pass by the man. But of this I have already given accounts in another place.^r For the present I further consider, that charity being the great end of the law, and every law being a design of making a man happy, every commandment of God is then best understood, when it is made to do most good, and rescued from being an occasion of evil. The government of Jesus Christ is most paternal and serene; his rod is not heavy, his commandments are not grievous, his bands are not snares; but they are holiness, and they are liberty, they are "glory to God and good-will towards men."

7. But this at no hand means, that any material or integral part of duty can be omitted, and the omission indulged in compliance with any man's infirmity or danger; for the law is to be our measure, our weaknesses cannot be the measure of the integrity of the law; that infirmity by which we omit any part of duty is a state of sin; and God, who knows all our infirmities, and possibilities or impossibilities of obedience, complied sufficiently in the sanction of the law, and imposed no more burden than was even with our powers: and therefore for what remains we must stoop our shoulder and bear the burden which God's wisdom made reasonable and tolerable, and our necessity and interest make unavoidable, and love will make easy and delectable.

8. But the burden which can be lessened, is the burden of degrees of intension, or any thing which consists not in a mathematical point, but is capable of growth: whatsoever is of such a nature as is always to increase in this life, in that such abatements may be made as will fit the person and the state; and no man is to be quarrelled at for degrees in the beginnings, or in the first progressions of his piety, only he is to be invited on by proper and fair inducements; and if he stands still always, as he is to be suspected for want of love, so he is to be warned of his danger, and thrust forward by the memory of the best examples. Thus it may not, upon any terms, be permitted to any weak person to do an act of injustice, to blaspheme God, to reproach his father, to be wanton; he may not be allowed to slander his brother, to neglect his children, to despise his wife, to part from her because he is weary of her; for fear the not indulging any thing of this nature to him should provoke him to anger against the religion. We may not give easy answers in cases of conscience, or promise heaven to them that live evil lives, for fear that our severity should make them forsake our communion and go to the Roman church; that is, we must not allow any man to do one evil to hinder him from another, or give leave to him to break one commandment that we may preserve another. But of this I have already given more particular accounts.⁵ That which at present I intend is, that no sin or omission of duty is to be permitted, no law of Christ is to be expounded to comply with us against God; but when a less severe sense is within the limits of duty, that our weaknesses are to be complied withal, is affirmed as being most charitable and necessary. Thus, if it be inquired whether our sorrow for our sins ought to be punitive and vindictive, sharp and sensible as the perception of any temporal evil, as the sorrow of a mother for the death of her only child, this being a question of degrees which cannot consist in an indivisible point, is never limited and determinate; any degree that can consist with the main duty, may be permitted to him whose necessity requires such indulgence; and if he be sorrowful in such a degree as to move him to pray passionately and perseveringly for pardon, to beget in him a wise and a wary caution against temptation, to produce in him hatred against sin, and dereliction of it, a war and a victory, the death of sin and the life of righteousness, the penitent is not to be prejudiced by the degree of his sorrow, or the thickness of its edge, and the commandment is so to be expounded as to secure the duty and secure the man too: and if he be told that a less degree of sorrow than the supreme will not serve his turn, and that the commandment is to be expounded in the greatest and severest measures, he that finds this impossible to him, will let it alone,—for as good never a whit as never the better; but then, he that tells him so, hath laid a snare for his brother's foot, and binds upon his shoulder a burden too heavy for him. For to what purpose can we imagine that there should be a latitude in the commandment, and yet no use to be made of the least degree? and if God cherishes the babes in Christ, and is pleased in every step of our progression, then it is certain that they who are but babes, are to be treated accordingly, and the commandment is to be acted by the proportions of the man. But then if the question be concerning the integrity of the repentance, he that is troubled at heart because he is told that a resolution to leave sin is not enough, that without restitution there is no repentance; he that will kick at religion, because it requires all the duties which integrate the commandment, is not to be complied with, nor permitted to his folly.—I have read of a gentleman who, being on his death-bed,—and his confessor searching and dressing of his wounded soul,—was found to be obliged to make restitution of a considerable sum of money, with the diminution of his estate. His confessor found him desirous to be saved, a lover of his religion, and yet to have a kindness for his estate, which he desired might be entirely transmitted to his beloved heir: he would serve God with all his heart, and repented him of his sin, of his rapine and injustice, he begged for pardon passionately, he humbly hoped for mercy, he resolved, in case he did recover, to live strictly, to love God, to reverence his priests, to be charitable to the poor; but to make restitution he found impossible to him, and he hoped the commandment would not require it of him, and desired to be relieved by an easy and a favourable interpretation; for it is ten thousand pities so many good actions and good purposes should be in vain, but it is worse, infinitely worse, if the man should perish. What should the confessor do in this case? shall not the man be relieved, and his piety be accepted? or shall the rigour and severity of the confessor, and his scrupulous fears and impertinent niceness, cast away a soul either into future misery, or present discomfort? neither one nor other was to be done; and the good man was only to consider what God had made necessary, not what the vices of his penitent and his present follies should make so. Well: the priest insists upon his first resolution, “Non dimittitur peccatum, nisi restituatur ablatum:” the sick man could have no ease by the loss of a duty. The poor cleric desires the confessor to deal with his son, and try if he could be made willing that his father might go to heaven at the charge of his son; which when he had attempted, he was answered with extreme rudenesses and injurious language; which caused great trouble to the priest and to the dying father. At last the religious man found out this device, telling his penitent, that unless by corporal penances there could be made satisfaction in exchange for restitution, he knew no hopes; but because the profit of the estate which was obliged to restitution, was to descend upon the son, he thought something might be hoped, if, by way of commutation, the son would hold his finger in a burning candle for a quarter of an hour. The glad father being overjoyed at this loop-hole of eternity, this glimpse of heaven, and the certain retaining of the whole estate, called to his son, told him the condition and the advantages to them both, making no question but he would gladly undertake the penance. But the son with indignation replied,

"he would not endure so much torture to save the whole estate." To which the priest espying his advantage, made this quick return to the old man, "Sir, if your son will not, for a quarter of an hour, endure the pains of a burning finger to save your soul, will you, to save a portion of the estate for him, endure the flames of hell to eternal ages?" The unreasonableness of the odds, and the ungratefulness of the son, and the importunity of the priest, and the fear of hell, and the indispensable necessity of restitution, awakened the old man from his lethargy, and he bowed himself to the rule, made restitution, and had hopes of pardon and present comfort.

9. (2.) The other case in which the law is to be expounded to the sense of ease and liberty, is, when the question is concerning outward actions, or the crusts and outsides of religion. For the christian religion being wholly spiritual, and being ministered to by bodily exercises, and they being but significations of the inward, not at all pleasing to God for themselves, but as they edify, instruct, or do advantages to men,—they are in all cases to be exacted, but in such proportions as can consist with charity, which is the life of religion: and therefore if a soul be in danger to be tempted, or overburdened with a bodily exercise, if there be hazard that all religion will be hated, and that the man will break the yoke, if he be pinched in his skin,—it is better to secure the great and internal principle of obedience, than the external instance and expression. This caution is of use in the injunction of fasting-days, and external acts of mortification, which are indeed effects of the laws of Christ, but the measures of these laws are to be such as consist with the great end of the laws, that is, mercy and internal religion. And the great reason of this is; because all external actions are really such as without our fault they may be hindered; there may be some accidents and causes by which they shall not be at all, and there may be many more by which they may be eased and lessened. An external accident, or a corporal infirmity, is to be complied withal in the matter of external ministries; that is, when there is mercy in it: and so must every virtue and inward grace, because it is for the interest of religion. Now what must be permitted in the action ought to be so in the sentence; and that is the meaning of the law, which is either commanded to the strong or indulged to the weak. Add to this, that outward actions of religion are for the weak, not for the strong; they are to minister to weakness and infirmities, and by bodily expressions to invite forward, to entertain; to ferment, to endear the spirit of a man to the purposes of God; but even the body itself shall be spiritual, and it is intended that it shall wholly minister to God in spiritual services hereafter. In the mean time, by outward acts it does something symbolical, or at least expressive of the inward duty. But therefore if the external do disserve the Spirit of God by oppressing the spirit of the man; that whose nature and institution are wholly instrumental, must be made to comply with the end; and therefore must stand there when it is apt to minister to it, but must go away if it hinders it.

10. (3.) In the interpretation of the laws of Christ to a sense of ease and liberty, there must be no limits and lessenings described beforehand; or in general; because any such proceeding would not only be destitute of that reason, which warrants it in some cases, but would evacuate the great purpose of the law in all: that is, it would be more than what is necessary to comply with new and accidental necessities; and to others it would be less than what is intended in the law, it would either tie the weak to impossibilities, or give leave to the strong to be negligent and unprofitable; it would command too much, or permit too much; it would either hold the bridle too hard, or break it all in pieces. But the interpretation and ease must be as accidental as the cause that enforces it, or the need that invites it; that is, every law of Christ intends that we should obey it in the perfection, that we should do it in the best way we can; and every man must do so; but because all cannot do alike, every man's best is alike in the event, but not in the action; and therefore the law which is made for man, must mean no more than every man can do; but because no man is to be supposed to be in disorder and weakness, till he be found to be so, therefore beforehand no compliance or easy interpretation is to be made of the degrees of duty.

11. (4.) No laws of Christ are to suffer diminution of interpretation in the degrees to persons that make themselves weak, that they may bear but a little burden: but the gentler sentence and sense of laws are to be applied to ease the weary and the afflicted, him that desires much and can do but little; to him that loves God and loves religion; to him that endeavours heartily, and inquires diligently, and means honestly; to him that hath every thing but strength, and wants nothing but growth, and time, and good circumstances, and the prosperities of piety. The best indications of which state of persons are these:

Who are truly and innocently weak, and to be complied with.

12. (1.) They are to be complied with who are new beginners in religion, or the uninstructed; they who want strengths not by reason of any habitual sin, but by the nature of beginnings and new changes; for none can more innocently pretend to a forbearance and sufferance than those who have the weakness of infancy. But I added also that the uninstructed have the same pretension, for according as their degrees of ignorance are, so are the degrees of their excusable infirmity. But then by "uninstructed" is only meant such who have not heard, or could not learn; not such who are ever learning and never sufficiently taught; that is, such who love to hear but not to be doers of the word, such who are perverse and immorigerous, such who serve a humour or an interest, an opinion or a peevish sect in their learning. For there are some who have spent much time in the inquiries of religion, whom if you call ignorant, they suppose themselves injured; and yet will require the privileges and compliances of the weak: these men trouble others, and therefore are not to be eased themselves; their weakness of state is the impotency of passion, and therefore they must not rejoice in that by which they make others grieved.

13. (2.) They are to be complied with according to the foregoing measures, who in all things where they know and can, do their hearty endeavours, and make no abatement to themselves, but with diligence and sincerity prosecute their duty. For this diligence and sincerity are a competent testimony that the principle of their necessity is not evil, but innocent and unavoidable. Whatsoever is not an effect of idleness or peevishness, may come in upon a fair, but always comes in upon a pitiable account; and therefore is that subject which is capable of all that ease of rigour and severity which the wise masters of assemblies and interpreters of the Divine laws do allow to any persons in any cases.

14. (3.) The last sign of subjects capable of ease, is infirmity of body; and that is a certain disposition to all the mercies and remissions of the law in such cases as relate to the body, and are instanced in external ministries. To which also is to be referred disability of estate in duties of exterior charity; which are to be exacted according to the proportions of men's civil power, taking in the needs of their persons and of their relations, their calling and their quality. And that God intends it should be so appears in this; because all outward duties are so enjoined that they can be supplied, and the internal grace instanced in other actions, of which there are so many kinds that some or other can be done by every one; and yet there is so great variety that no man, or but very few men, can do all. I instance in the several ways of mortification, viz. by fastings, by watchings and pernoctations in prayer, lyings on the ground, by toleration and patience, laborious gestures of the body in prayer, standing with arms extended, long kneelings on the bare ground, suffering contradiction and affronts, lessenings and undervaluings, peevish and cross accidents, denying ourselves lawful pleasures, refusing a pleasant morsel, leaving society and meetings of friends, and very many things of the like nature; by any of which the body may be mortified and the soul disciplined: or the outward act may be supplied by an active and intense love, which can do every thing of duty: so also it is in alms, which some do by giving money to the poor, some by comforting the afflicted, some by giving silver and gold,—others which have it not, do yet do greater things: but since it matters not what it is we are able to do, so that we do but what we are able,—it matters not how the grace be instanced, so that by all the instances we can, we do minister to the grace, it follows, that the law can be made to bend in any thing of the external instance, so that the inward grace be not neglected; but therefore it is certain that because every thing of matter can by matter be hindered, and a string or a chain of iron can hinder all the duty of the hand and foot, God who imposes and exacts nothing that is impossible, is contented that the obedience of the spirit be secured, and the body must obey the law as well as it can.

But there are some other considerations to be added to the main rule.

15. (5.) When the action is already done, and that there is no further deliberation concerning the direct duty, yet the law is not at all to be eased and lessened, if there be a deliberation concerning the collateral and accidental duty of repentance: and this is upon the same reasons as the first limitation of the rule: for when a duty is to be done, and a deliberation to be had, we are in perfect choice, and therefore we are to answer for God and for religion: and this is all one, whether the inquiry be made in the matter of innocence or repentance, that is, in the preventing of a sin or curing of it. For we are in all things tied to as great a care of our duty after we have once broken it, as before; and in some things to a greater; and repentance is nothing but a new beginning of our duty, a going from our error, and a recovery of our loss, and a restitution of our health, and a being put into the same estate from whence we were fallen; so that at least all the same severities are to be used in repentance, as great a rigour of sentence, as strict a caution, as careful a walking, as humble and universal an obedience, besides the sorrow and the relative parts of duty, which come in upon the account of our sin.

16. (6.) But if the inquiry be made after the sin is done, and that there is no deliberation concerning any present or future duty, but concerning the hopes or state of pardon, then we may hope that God will be easy to give us pardon, according to the gentlest sense and measures of the law. For this, provided it be not brought into evil example in the measures of duty afterwards, can have in it no danger: it is matter of hope, and therefore keeps a man from despair; but because it is but matter of hope, therefore it is not apt to abuse him into presumption, and if it be mistaken in the measures of the law, yet it makes it up upon the account of God's mercy, and it will be all one; either it is God's mercy in making an easy sense of the law, or God's mercy in giving an easy sentence on the man, or God's mercy in easing and taking off the punishment, and that will be all one as to the event, and therefore will be a sufficient warrant for our hope, because it will some way or other come to pass as we hope. It is all alike whether we be saved because God will exact no more of us, or because though he did exact more by his law, yet he will pardon so much the more in the sentence: but this is of use only to them who are tempted to despair, or oppressed by too violent fears; and it relies upon all the lines of the Divine mercy, and upon all the arguments of comfort by which declining hopes use to be supported: and since we ourselves, by observing our incurable infirmities, espy some necessities of having the law read in the easier sense, we do, in the event of things, find that we have a need of pardon greater than we could think we should in the heats of our conversion, and the fervours of our newly-returning piety; and therefore God does not only see much more reason to pity us upon the same account; but upon divers others, some whereof we know, and some we know not; but therefore we can hope for more than we yet see in the lines of revelation, and possibly we may receive in many cases better measure than we yet hope for: but whoever makes this hope to lessen his duty, will find himself ashamed in his hope; for no hope is reasonable but that which quickens our piety, and hastens and perfects our repentance, and purifies the soul, and engages all the powers of action, and ends in the love of God, and in a holy life.

17. (7.) There are many other things to be added by way of assistance to them, who are pressed with the burden of a law severely apprehended, or unequally applied, or not rightly understood; but the sum of them is this.

1. If the sense be hidden or dubious, do nothing till the cloud be off, and the doubt be removed.

2. If the law be indifferent to two senses, take that which is most pious and most holy.

3. If it be between two, but not perfectly indifferent, follow that which is most probable.

4. Do after the custom and common usages of the best and wisest men.

5. Do with the most, and speak with the least.

6. Ever bend thy determination to comply with the analogy of faith, and the common measures of good life, and the glorifications and honour of God, and the utility of our neighbour.

7. Then choose thy part of obedience, and do it cheerfully and confidently, with a great industry and a full persuasion.

8. After the action is done, enter into no disputes, whether it was lawful or no, unless it be upon new instances and new arguments, relating to what is to come,—and not troubling thyself with that, which with prudence and deliberation thou didst (as things were then represented) well and wisely choose.

RULE XI.

The positive Laws of Jesus Christ cannot be dispensed with by any human power.

1. I have already in this book^t given account of the indispensability of the natural laws, which are the main constituent parts of the evangelical; but there are some positive laws whose reason is not natural nor eternal, which yet Christ hath superinduced; concerning which there is great question made whether they be dispensable by human power.—Now concerning these I say, that all laws given by Christ are now made for ever to be obligatory, and he is the King of heaven and earth, the Head and Prince of the catholic church, and therefore hath supreme power; and he is the “wonderful Counsellor, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace,” and his wisdom is supreme, he is the wisdom of the Father, and therefore he hath made his laws so wisely, so agreeably to the powers and accidents of mankind, that they can be observed by all men and all ways, where he hath passed an obligation. Now because every dispensation of laws must needs suppose an infirmity or imperfection in the law, or an infirmity in the man, that is, that either the law did infer inconvenience which was not foreseen, or was unavoidable; or else the law meets with the changes of mankind with which it is not made in the sanction to comply, and therefore must be forced to yield to the needs of the man, and stand aside till that necessity be passed: it follows, that in the laws of the holy Jesus there is no dispensation; because there is in the law no infirmity, and no incapacity in the man: for every man can always obey all that which Christ commanded and exacted; I mean, he hath no natural impotency to do any act that Christ hath required, and he can never be hindered from doing of his duty.

2. (1.) And this appears in this: because God hath appointed a harbour whither every vessel can put in, when he meets with storms and contrary winds abroad: and when we are commanded by a persecutor not to obey God, we cannot be forced to comply with the evil man; for we can be secure against him by suffering what he pleases, and therefore disobedience to a law of Christ cannot be made necessary by any external violence: I mean, every internal act is not in itself impeded by outward violence; and the external act which is made necessary, can be secured by a resolution to obey God rather than men.

3. (2.) But there are some external actions and instances of a commandment, which may accidentally become impossible, by subtraction of the material part: so for want of water a child cannot be baptized; for want of wine or bread we cannot communicate; which indeed is true; but do not infer that therefore there is a power of dispensing left in any man or company of men; because in such cases there is no law, and therefore no need of dispensation; for affirmative precepts, in which only there can be an external impediment, do not oblige but in their proper circumstances and possibilities: and thus it is even in human laws. No law obliges beyond our power; and although it be necessary sometimes to get a dispensation even in such cases, to rescue ourselves from the malice or the carelessness, the ignorance or the contrary interests, of the ministers of justice, who go by the words of the law, and are not competent or not instructed judges in the matter of necessity or excuse, yet there is no such need in the laws of God. For God is always just and always wise, he knows when we can and when we cannot; and therefore as he cannot be deceived by ignorance, so neither can he oppress any man by injustice, and we need not have leave to let a thing alone, which we cannot do if we would never so fain; and if we cannot obey, we need not require of God a warrant under his hand, or an act of indemnity, for which his justice and his goodness, his wisdom and his very nature, are infinite security: and therefore it cannot be necessary to the church, that a power of dispensing should be intrusted to men, in such cases where we cannot suppose the law of God to bind. That is our best security, that we need no dispensation.

4. (3.) In external actions and instances of virtue, or of obedience to a commandment of Jesus Christ, wherever there can be a hinderance, if the obligation does remain, the instance that is hindered can be supplied with another of the same kind. Thus relieving the poor hungry man, can be hindered by my own poverty and present need, but I can visit him that is sick, though I cannot feed the hungry, or I can give him bread when I cannot give him a cloak; and therefore there can need no dispensation when the commandment, if it be hindered in one instance, can as perfectly, and to all the intentions of our Lawgiver, be performed in another.

5. (4.) In external actions which can be hindered, and which cannot be supplied by the variety of the instances in the same kind, yet if the obligation remains, they may be supplied with the internal act, and with the spiritual. Thus if we cannot receive actual baptism, the desire of it is accepted; and he that communicates spiritually, that is, by faith and charity, by inward devotion and hearty desire, is not guilty of the breach of the commandment, if he does not communicate sacramentally, being unavoidably and inculpably hindered. For whatsoever is not in our power, cannot be under a law, and where we do not consent to the breach of a commandment, we cannot be exposed to the punishment. This is the voice of all the world, and this is natural reason, and the ground of justice, without which there can be no government but what is tyrannical and unreasonable. These things being notorious and confessed, the consequents are these:

6. (1.) That there is no necessity that a power of dispensing in the positive laws of Christ should be intrusted to any man, or to any society. Because the law needs it not, and the subjects need it not: and he that dispenses, must either do it when there is cause, or when there is none. If he dispenses when there is no cause, he makes himself superior to the power of God by exercising dominion over his laws: if he dispenses when there is cause, he dispenses when there is no need. For if the subject can obey, he must obey, and man cannot untie what God hath bound: but if he cannot obey, he is not bound, and therefore needs not be untied: he may as well go about to unbend a straight line, or to number that which is not, as to dispense in a law, to which in such cases God exacts no obedience.

7. Panormitan^u affirms that "the pope hath power to dispense in all the laws of God, except in the articles of faith;" and to this purpose he cites Innocentius "in cap. Cum ad Monasterium, de Statu Monachorum." Felinus^x affirms that "the pope can change the form of baptism, and that he can with one word, and without all solemnity, consecrate a priest, and that he can by his word alone make a bishop:" and though these pretences are insolent and strange, yet in fact he does as much as this comes to: for the pope gives leave sometimes to a mere priest to give confirmation, which by Divine right is only belonging to bishops by their own confession. That the blessed eucharist is to be consecrated in both kinds is certainly of Divine right; and so confessed by the church of Rome: but the pope hath actually dispensed in this article, and given leave to some to consecrate in bread only, and particularly to the Norwegians a dispensation was given by Innocent VIII. as I have already noted out of Volaterranus.

8. There are some learned men amongst them who speak in this question with less scandal, but almost with the same intentions and effects. Some of their divines,—particularly the bishop^y of the Canaries, says that "the pope hath not power to dispense in the whole, or in all the laws of God, but in some only; namely, where the observation of the law is 'impeditiva majoris boni,' 'a hinderance or obstruction to a greater spiritual good;' as it may happen in oaths and vows;"—and (Sanchez adds) in the consecration of the blessed sacrament in both kinds: in these, say they, the pope can dispense; but where the observation of the laws in the particular brings no evil or inconvenience, and does never hinder a greater good, there the laws are indispensable; such as are "confessions, baptism, using a set form of words in the ministration of the sacraments." So that the meaning is, the pope never wants a power to do it, if there be not wanting an excuse to colour it; and then, in effect, the divines agree with the lawyers; for since the power of dispensing is given in words indefinite and without specification of particulars, if it be given at all; the authority must be unlimited as to the person, and can be limited only by the incapacity of the matter; and if there could be any inconvenience in any law there might be a dispensation in it: so that the divines and the lawyers differ only in the instances; which if we should consider, or if any great interest could be served by any, there can be no doubt but it would be found a sufficient cause of dispensation. So that this is but to cozen mankind with a distinction to no purpose; and to affirm that the pope cannot dispense in such things which yield no man any good or profit: such as is the using a set form of words in baptism, or the like; and they may at an easy rate pretend the pope's power to be limited, when they only restrain him from violating a Divine law, when either the observation of it is for his own advantage, as in confession, (meaning to a priest,) or when it serves the interest of no man to have it changed, as in the forms of sacraments.

9. But then, that I may speak to the other part; to say that "the pope may dispense in a Divine law, when the particular observation does hinder a greater spiritual good, and that this is a sufficient cause," is a proposition in all things false, and, in some cases, even in those where they instance, very dangerous. It is false, because if a man can by his own act be obliged to do a thing which yet is impeditive of a greater temporal good, then God can by his law oblige his obedience, though accidentally it hinder a greater spiritual good. Now if a man have promised, he must "keep it though it were to his own hinderance," said David;^z and a man may not break his oath; though the keeping of it hinder him from many spiritual comforts and advantages; nay, a man may neglect a spiritual advantage for a temporal necessity; and in the Bohemian wars, the king had better been at the head of his troops, than at a sermon; when Prague was taken.

But I consider (for that is also very material) that it is dangerous. For when men, to justify a pretence, or to verify an action, or to usurp a power, shall pretend that there is on the other side a greater spiritual good, they may very easily deceive others, because either voluntarily or involuntarily they deceive themselves; for when God hath given a commandment, who can say that to let it alone can do no more good to a man's soul than to keep it? I instance in a particular which is of great interest with them. If a man have vowed to a woman to marry her, and contracted himself to her "per verba de præsenti;" she, according to her duty, loves him passionately, hath married her very soul to him, and her heart is bound up in his: but he changes his mind, and enters into religion; but stops at the very gate, and asks who shall warrant him for the breach of his faith and vows to his spouse. The pope answers he will; and though by the law of God he be tied to that woman, yet because the keeping of that vow would hinder him from doing God better service in religion, this is a sufficient cause for him to dispense with his vow. This then is the case concerning which I inquire: 1. How does it appear that to enter into a monastery is absolutely a greater spiritual good than to live chastely with the wife of his love and vows? 2. I inquire, whether to break a man's vow be not of itself (abstracting from all extrinsical pretensions and collateral inducements) a very great sin? and if there were not a great good to follow the breach of it, I demand whether could the pope dispense or give leave to any man to do it? If he could, then it is plain he can give leave to a man to do a very great evil; for without the accidentally consequent good, it is confessed to be very evil to break our lawful vows; but if he cannot dispense with his vow, unless some great good were to follow upon the breach of it, then it is clear he can give leave to a man to do evil, that good may come of it: for if without such a reason, or such a consequent good, the pope could not dispense, then the consequent good does legitimate the dispensation: and either an evil act done for a good end is lawful and becomes good; or else the pope plainly gives him leave to do that, which is still remaining evil, for a good end: either of which is intolerable, and equally against the apostle's rule, which is also a rule of natural religion and reason: No man must do evil for a good end. But then, 3. Who can assure me that an act of religion is better than an act of justice? or that God will be served by doing my wife an injury? or that he will accept of me a new vow, which is perfectly a breaking of an old? or that, by our vows to our wives, we are not as much obliged to God as by monastical vows before our abbot? or that marriage is not as great an act of religion, if wisely and holily undertaken, (as it ought to be,) as the taking the habit of St. Francis? or that I can be capable of giving myself to religion, when I have given the right and power of myself away to another? or that I may not as well steal from a man to give alms to the poor, as wrong my wife to give myself to a cloister? or that he can ever give himself to religion, who breaks the religion of vows and promises, of justice and honour, of faith and the sacramental mystery, that he may go into religion? or that my retirement in a cloister, and doing all that is there intended, can make recompence for making my wife miserable, and, it may be, desperate and calamitous all her lifetime? Can God be delighted with my prayers which I offer to him in a cloister, when, it may be, at the same time my injured spouse is praying to God to do her justice and to avenge my perjuries upon my guilty head, and, it may be, cries aloud to God, and weeps and curses night and day? who can tell which is better, or which is worse? for marriage and single life, of themselves, are indifferent to piety or impiety; they may be used well, or abused to evil purposes; but if they take their estimate by the event, no man can beforehand tell which would have been the greater spiritual good. But suppose it as you list yet,

11. I consider, that when God says that "obedience is better than sacrifice," he hath plainly told us, that no pretence of religion, or of a greater spiritual good, can legitimate vow-breach, or disobedience to a Divine commandment: and therefore either the pope must dispense in all laws of Christ and without all reason;—that is, by his absolute authority and supereminency over the law and the power that established it, or else he cannot dispense at all; for there is no reason that can legitimate our disobedience.

12. But then, if we consider the authority itself, the considerations will be very material. No man pretends to a power of dispensing in the law of God but the pope only; and he only upon pretence of the words spoken to St. Peter, "Whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven." Now did ever any of the apostles or apostolical men suppose, that St. Peter could, in any case, dispense with vow-breach, or the violation of a lawful oath? Was not all that power, which was then promised to him, wholly relative to the matter of fraternal correction? and was it not equally given to the apostles? for either it was never performed to St. Peter, or else it was alike promised and performed to all the apostles in the donation of the Spirit, and of the power of binding, and the words of Christ to them before and after his resurrection; so that by certain consequence of this, either all the successors of the apostles have the same power, or none of the successors of St. Peter. Or if the successors of St. Peter only, why not his successors at Antioch, as well as his successors at Rome? since it is certain that he was at Antioch; but it is not so certain that he was at all at Rome: for those things that Ulricus Velenus says against it in a tractate on purpose on that subject, and published by Goldastus in his third tome, are not inconsiderable allegations and arguments for the negative. And suppose he was, yet it is as likely, that is, as certain as the other,—that, after the martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul, there were two bishops or popes of Rome; as it is conjectured by the different catalogues of the first successions, and by their differing presidencies or episcopacies; one being over the circumcision, and the other over the uncircumcision (if, I say, they were at all, concerning which I have no occasion to interpose my sentence). But if either this gift was given in common to all the apostles, or if it was given personally to St. Peter, or if it means only the power of discipline over sinners and penitent persons, or if it does not mean to destroy all justice and human contracts, to rescind all the laws of God and man, to make Christ's laws subject to Christ's minister, and Christ's kingdom to be the pope's inheritance and possession, "in alto Dominio," if those words of Christ to St. Peter are so to be understood as that his subjects and servants shall still be left in those rights, which he hath given and confirmed and sanctified, then it follows undeniably, that St. Peter's power of the keys is not to be a picklock of the laws of his Master, but to bind men to the performance of them, or to the punishment of breaking them; and if by those words of "Whatsoever thou shalt loose," it be permitted to loose and untie the band of oaths and vows, then they may also mean a power of loosing any man's life, or any man's right, or any man's word, or any man's oath, or any man's obligation, solemn or unsolemn, when he hath really an interest or reason so to do, of which reason himself only can be the warrantable judge: which things, because they are insufferably unreasonable, that pretence which infers such evils and such impieties, must be also insufferable and impossible.

13. I conclude therefore with this distinction: There is a proper dispensation, that is, such a dispensation as supposes the obligation remaining upon that person, who is to be dispensed with: but no man or society of men can, in this sense, dispense with any law of Christ. But there is a dispensation improperly so called, which does not suppose a remanent obligation, and therefore pretends not to take away any, but supposes only a doubt remaining, whether the law does, by God's intention, oblige or no. He that hath skill and authority and reason to declare, that, in such special cases, God intended not to oblige the conscience, hath taken away the doubt, and made that to become lawful, which, without such a declaration, by reason of the remaining doubt, was not so. This is properly an interpretation; but because it hath the same effect upon the man, which the other hath directly upon the law, therefore by divines and lawyers it is sometimes also called a dispensation, but improperly.

14. But the other consequent arising from the first observations, which I made upon this rule, is this,—that as there is no necessity that there should be any dispensation in the laws of Jesus Christ; so in those cases where there may be an improper dispensation, that is, an interpretation or declaration that the law in this case does not bind at all, no man must, by way of equity or condescension and expedient, appoint any thing that the law permits not, or declare that a part of the law may be used, when the whole is in the institution. For example: The Norwegians complained, that they could very seldom get any wine into their country, and, when it did come, it was almost vinegar or vappe: he who had reason and authority, might then certainly have declared, that the precept of consecrating did not oblige, when they had not matter with which they were to do it; because no good law obliges to impossibilities: but then no man of his own head might interpose an expedient, and say, "Though you have no wine to consecrate and celebrate withal, yet you may do it in ale or meath;" nor yet might he warrant an imperfect consecration, and allow that the priests should celebrate with bread only. The reason is, because all institutions sacramental, and positive laws, depend not upon the nature of the things themselves, according to the extension or diminution of which our obedience might be measured; but they depend wholly on the will of the lawgiver, and the will of the supreme, being actually limited to this specification, this manner, this matter, this institution; whatsoever comes besides, it hath no foundation in the will of the legislator, and therefore can have no warrant or authority. That it be obeyed or not obeyed, is all the question and all the variety. If it can be obeyed, it must; if it cannot, it must be let alone. The right mother, that appeared before Solomon, demanded her child; half her own was offered; but that was not it which would do her good, neither would she have been pleased with a whole bolster of goats' hair, or with a perfect image of her child, or with a living lamb; it was her own child which she demanded: so it is in the Divine institution; whatsoever God wills, that we must attend to: and therefore, whatsoever depends upon a Divine law or institution, whatsoever is appointed instrumental to the signification of a mystery, or to the collation of a grace or a power, he that does any thing of his own head, either must be a despiser of God's will, or must suppose himself the author of a grace, or else to do nothing at all in what he does,—because all his obedience, and all the blessing of his obedience, depend upon the will of God, which ought always to be obeyed when it can, and when it cannot, nothing can supply it; because the reason of it cannot be understood; for who can tell why God would have the death of his Son celebrated by bread and wine? why by both the symbols? why by such? and therefore no proportions can be made; and if they could, yet they cannot be warranted.

15. This rule is not only to be understood concerning the express positive laws and institutions of our blessed Lawgiver; but even those which are included within those laws, or are necessary appendages to those institutions, are to be obeyed, and can neither be dispensed withal, nor diverted by any suppletory or expedient. Thus to the law of representing and commemorating the death of our dearest Lord by the celebration of his last supper, it is necessarily appendant and included, that we should come worthily prepared,—lest that which is holy be given to dogs, and holy things be handled unholy. In this case, there can be no dispensation; and although the curates of souls, having the key of knowledge and understanding to divide the word of God rightly, have power and warrant to tell what measures and degrees of preparation are just and holy; yet they cannot give any dispensation in any just and required degree, nor, by their sentence, effect that a less degree than God requires in the appendant law, can be sufficient to any man,—neither can any human authority commute a duty that God requires; and, when he demands repentance, no man can dispense with him, that is, to communicate, or give him leave to give alms, instead of repentance. But if, in the duty of preparation, God had involved the duty of confession to a priest, this might have, in some cases, been wholly let alone: that is, in case there were no priest to be had but one, who were to consecrate and who could not attend to hear my confessions: and the reason is, because in case of the destitution of any material or necessary constituent part of the duty, there is no need of equity or interpretation: because the subject matter of degrees of heightenings and diminutions being taken away, there can be no consideration of the manner or the degrees superstructed. When any condition, intrinsically, and in the nature of the thing included in an affirmative precept, is destituent or wanting, the duty itself falls without interpretation.

16. Lastly; This rule is to be understood also much more concerning the negative precepts of the religion: because there can be no hinderance to the duties of a negative precept; every man can let any thing alone; and he cannot be forced from his silence or his omission; for he can sit still and die; violence can hinder an action, but cannot effect it or express it: and therefore here is no place for interpretation, much less for dispensation: neither can it be supplied by any action or by any omission whatsoever.

But upon the matter of this second consequent remarked above,^c it is to be inquired, whether in no case a supply of duty is to be made? or whether or no it is not better in some cases, that is, when we are hindered from doing the duty commanded, to do something when we cannot do all; or are we tied to do nothing, when we are innocently hindered from doing of the whole duty?

When we may be admitted to do Part of our Duty, and when to supply it by something else.

17. (1.) Negative precepts have no parts of duty, no degrees of obedience, but consist in a mathematical point; or rather in that, which is not so much; for it consists in that, which can neither be numbered nor weighed. No man can go a step from the severest measure of a negative commandment; if a man do but in his thought go against it, or in one single instance do what is forbidden, or but begin to do it, he is entirely guilty. “He that breaks one, is guilty of all,” said St. James; it is meant of negative precepts; and then it is true in every sense relating to every single precept, and to the whole body of the negative commandments. He that breaks one, hath broken the band of all; and he that does sin, in any instance or imaginary degree, against a negative, hath done the whole sin, that is in that commandment forbidden.

18. (2.) All positive precepts that depend upon the mere will of the lawgiver, (as I have already discoursed,) admit no degrees, nor suppletory and commutation; because in such laws we see nothing beyond the words of the law, and the first meaning and the named instance; and therefore, it is that “in individuo” which God points at; it is that, in which he will make the trial of our obedience; it is that, in which he will so perfectly be obeyed, that he will not be disputed with, or inquired of why, and how, but just according to the measures there set down: so, and no more, and no less, and no otherwise. For when the will of the lawgiver is all the reason, the first instance of the law is all the measures; and there can be no product but what is just set down. No parity of reason can infer any thing else, because there is no reason but the will of God, to which nothing can be equal, because his will can be but one. If any man should argue thus:—“Christ hath commanded us to celebrate his death by blessing and communicating in bread and wine; this being plainly his purpose, and I, finding it impossible to get wine, consider that water came out of his side as well as blood, and therefore water will represent his death as well as wine; for wine is but like blood, and water is more like itself; and therefore I obey him better, when in the letter I cannot obey him.”—he, I say, that should argue thus, takes wrong measures; for it is not here to be inquired, which is most agreeable to our reason, but which complies with God’s will; for that is all the reason we are to inquire after.

19. (3.) In natural laws and obligations depending upon true and proper reason drawn from the nature of things, there we must do what we can; and if we cannot do all that is at first intended,—yet it is secondarily intended, that we should do what we can. The reason is, because there is a natural cause of the duty, which, like the light of the sun, is communicated in several degrees, according as it can be received; and therefore whatever partakes of that reason, is also a duty of that commandment. Thus it is a duty of natural and essential religion, that we should worship God with all the faculties of the soul, with all the actions of the body, with all the degrees of intension, with all the instances and parts of extension: for God is the Lord of all; he expects all, and he deserves all, and will reward all; and every thing is designed in order to his service and glorification: and therefore every part of all this is equally commanded, equally required; and is symbolical to the whole; and therefore, in the impossibility of the performance of any one, the whole commandment is equally promoted by another; and when we cannot bow the knee, yet we can incline the head, and when we cannot give, we can forgive; and if we have not silver and gold, we can pay them in prayers and blessings; and if we cannot go with our brother two miles, we can, it may be, go one, or one half; let us go as far as we can, and do all that is in our power and in our circumstances. For since our duty here can grow, and every instance does according to its portion do in its own time, and measures the whole work of the commandment, and God accepts us in every step of the progression, that is, in all degrees; for he breaks not the bruised reed, and he quenches not the smoking flax; it follows, that though we are not tied to do all, even that which is beyond our powers, yet we must do what we can towards it; even a part of the commandment may, in such cases, be accepted for our whole duty.

20. (4.) In external actions which are instances of a natural or moral duty, if there be any variety, one may supply the other; if there be but one, it can be supplied by the internal only and spiritual. But the internal can never be hindered, and can never be changed or supplied by any thing else; it is capable of no suppletory, but of degrees it is: and if we cannot love God as well as Mary Magdalene loved him, let us love him so as to obey him always, and so as to superadd degrees of increment to our love, and to our obedience; but for this or that expression it must be as it can, and when it can, it must be this or another; but if it can be neither upon the hand, it must be all that is intended upon the heart; and as the body helps the soul in the ministries of her duty, so the soul supplies the body in the essentialities of it and indispensable obedience.

RULE XII.

Not every Thing, that is in the Sermons and Doctrine of Jesus Christ, was intended to bind as a Law or Commandment.

1. EVERY thing that is spoken by our blessed Saviour, is to be placed in that order of things, where himself was pleased to put it.—Whatsoever he propounded to us under the sanction of love, and by the invitation of a great reward, that is so to be understood, as that it may not become a snare, by being supposed in all cases and to all persons to be a law. For laws are established by fear and love too, that is, by promises and threatenings; and nothing is to be esteemed a law of Christ, but such things which if we do not observe, we shall die, or incur the Divine displeasure in any instance or degree. But there are some things in the sermons of Christ, which are recommended to the diligence and love of men; such things whither men must tend and grow. Thus it is required, that we should love God with all our heart; which is indeed a commandment, and the first and the chiefest: but because it hath an infinite sense, and is capable of degrees, beyond all the actualities of any man whatsoever,—therefore it is encouraged and invited further by a reward, that will be greater than all the work that any man can do. But yet there is also the “minimum morale” in it, that is, that degree of love and duty, less than which is by interpretation no love, no duty at all; and that is, that we so love God, that, 1. we love nothing against him; 2. that we love nothing more than him; 3. that we love nothing equal to him; 4. that we love nothing disparately and distinctly from him, but in subordination to him; that is, so as to be apt to yield and submit to his love, and comply with our duty. Now then, here must this law begin, it is a commandment to all persons, and at all times, to do thus much; and this being a general law, of which all other laws are but instances and specifications, the same thing is in all the particular laws, which is in the general: there is in every one of them a “minimum morale,” a legal sense of duty, which, if we prevaricate or go less than it, we are transgressors: but then there is also a latitude of duty, or a sense of love and evangelical increase, which is a further pursuance of the duty of the commandment; but is not directly the law, but the love; to which God hath appointed no measures of greatness, but hath invited us forward as the man can go.

2. For it is considerable, that since negative precepts include their affirmatives, and affirmatives also do infer the negatives, (as I have already discoursed,) and yet they have differing measures and proportions; and that the form of words and signs, negative or affirmative, is not the sufficient indication of the precepts, we can best be instructed by this measure;—There is in every commandment a negative part and an affirmative:—the negative is the first, the least, and the lowest, sense of the law and the degree of duty; and this is obligatory to all persons, and cannot be lessened by excuse, or hindered by disability, or excused by ignorance, neither is it to stay its time, or to wait for circumstances; but obliges all men indifferently. I do not say that this is always expressed by negative forms of law or language, but is by interpretation negative; it operates or obliges as does the negative. For when we are commanded to love our neighbour as ourself; the least measure of this law, the legal or negative part of it, is, that we should not do him injury; that we should not do to him, what we would not have done to ourselves. He that does not in this sense love his neighbour as himself, hath broken the commandment; he hath done that which he should not do; he hath done that which he cannot justify; he hath done that which was forbidden: for every going less than the first sense of the law, than the lowest sense of duty, is the commission of a sin, a doing against a prohibition.

3. But then there are further degrees of duty than the first and lowest; which are the affirmative measures, that is, a doing excellent actions and instances of the commandments, a doing the commandment with love and excellency, a progression in the exercise and methods of that piety; the degrees of which, because they are affirmative, therefore they oblige but in certain circumstances; and are under no law absolutely, but they grow in the face of the sun, and pass on to perfection by heat and light, by love and zeal, by hope and by reward.

4. Now concerning these degrees it is that I affirm, that every thing is to be placed in that order of things where Christ left it: and he that measures other men by his own stature, and expects of children the wisdom of old men, and requires of babes in Christ the strengths and degrees of experienced prelates, he adds to the laws of Christ, that is, he ties where Christ hath not tied, he condemns where Christ does not condemn. It is not a law that every man should, in all the stages of his progression, be equally perfect: the nature of things hath several stages, and passes by steps to the varieties of glory. For so laws and counsels differ, as first and last, as beginning and perfection, as reward and punishment, as that which is simply necessary, and that which is highly advantageous: they differ not in their whole kind; for they are only the differing degrees of the same duty. He that does a counsel evangelical, does not do more than his duty, but does his duty better: he that does it in a less degree, shall have a less reward; but he shall not perish, if he does obey the just and prime or least measures of the law.

5. Let no man, therefore, impose upon his brother the heights and summities of perfection, under pain of damnation or any fearful evangelical threatening; because these are to be invited only by love and reward,—and by promises only are bound upon us, not by threatenings. The want of the observing of this, hath caused impertinent disputes and animosities in men, and great misunderstandings in this question. For it is a great error to think, that every thing spoken in Christ's sermons is a law, or that all the progressions and degrees of christian duty are bound upon us by penalties as all laws are. The commandments are made laws to us wholly by threatenings; for when we shall receive a crown of righteousness in heaven, that is by way of gift, merely gratuitous, but the pains of the damned are due to them by their merit and by the measures of justice: and therefore it is remarkable, that our blessed Saviour said, "When ye have done all that ye are commanded, ye are unprofitable servants;" that is, the strict measures of the laws or the commandments given to you are such, which if ye do not observe, ye shall die according to the sentence of the law; but if ye do, "ye are yet unprofitable;" ye have not deserved the good things that are laid up for loving souls: but therefore towards that we must superadd the degrees of progression and growth in grace, the emanations of love and zeal, the methods of perfection and imitation of Christ. For by the first measures we escape hell; but by the progressions of love only, and the increase of duty, through the mercies of God in Christ, we arrive at heaven. Not that he that escapes hell, may, in any case, fail of heaven; but that whosoever does obey the commandment in the first and least sense, will, in his proportion, grow on towards perfection. For he fails in the first, and does not that worthily,—who, if he have time, does not go on to the second.

6. But yet neither are these counsels of perfection left wholly to our liberty, so as that they have nothing of the law in them; for they are pursuances of the law; and of the same nature, though not directly of the same necessity; but collaterally and accidentally they are. For although God follows the course and nature of things, and therefore does not disallow any state of duty that is within his own measures; because there must be a first before there can be a second, and the beginning must be esteemed good, or else we ought not to pursue it and make it more in the same kind; yet because God is pleased to observe the order of nature in his graciousness, we must do so too in the measures of our duty; nature must begin imperfectly, and God is pleased with it, because himself hath so ordered it; but the nature of things that begin and are not perfect cannot stand still. God is pleased well enough with the least or the negative measure of the law; because that is the first or the beginning of all; but we must not always be beginning, but pass on to perfection, and it is perfection all the way, because it is the proper and the natural method of the grace to be growing; every degree of growth is not the perfection of glory; but neither is it the absolute perfection of grace, but it is the relative perfection of it: just as corn and flowers are perfectly what they ought to be, when in their several months they are arrived to their proper stages; but if they do not still grow till they be fit for harvest, they wither and die, and are good for nothing. He that does not go from strength to strength, from virtue to virtue, from one degree of grace to another, he is not at all in the methods of life, but enters into the portions of thorns, and withered flowers, fit for excision and burning.

7. Therefore, (1.) No man must, in the keeping of the commandments of Christ, set himself a limit of duty;—"Hitherto will I come, and no further:"—for the tree that does not grow, is not alive, unless it already have all the growth it can have: and there is in these things thus much of a law: evangelical counsels are thus far necessary, that although in them, that is, in the degrees of duty, there are no certain measures described; yet we are obliged to proceed from beginnings to perfection.

8. (2.) Although every man must impose upon himself this care, that he so do his duty, that he do add new degrees to every grace; yet he is not to be prejudiced by any man else, nor sentenced by determined measures of another man's appointment. God hath named none, but intends all; and therefore we cannot give certain sentence upon our brother, since God hath described no measures; but intends "that all," whither no man can perfectly arrive here; and therefore it is supplied by God hereafter.

9. (3.) But the rule is to be understood in great instances as well as in great degrees of duty; for there are in the sermons of Christ some instances of duties, which although they are pursuances of laws and duty, yet in their own material nature being are not laws,—but both in the degree implied and in the instance expressed, are counsels evangelical; to which we are invited by great rewards but not obliged to them under the proper penalties of the law. Such are, making ourselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven, selling all, and giving it to the poor. The duties and laws here signified are, chastity, charity, contempt of the world, zeal for the propagation of the gospel: the virtues themselves are direct duties, and under laws and punishment; but that we be charitable to the degree of giving all away, or that we act our chastity by a perpetual celibate, are not laws; but for the outward expression we are wholly at our liberty; and for the degree of the inward grace, we are to be still pressing forwards towards it, we being obliged to do so by the nature of the thing, by the excellency of the reward, by the exhortations of the gospel, by the example of good men; by our love to God, by our desires of happiness, and by the degrees of glory. Thus St. Paul took no wages of the Corinthian churches; it was an act of an excellent prudence, and great charity, but it was not by the force of a general law; for no man else was bound to it, neither was he; for he did not do so to other churches; but he pursued two or three degrees to excellent measures and degrees; he became exemplary to others, useful to that church, and did advantage the affairs of religion: and though possibly he might, and so may we, by some concurring circumstances, be pointed out to this very instance and signification of his duty, yet this very instance, and all of the same nature, are counsels evangelical; that is, not imposed upon us by a law, and under a threatening; but left to our liberty, that we may express freely, what we are necessarily obliged to do in the kind, and to pursue forwards to degrees of perfection.

10. These therefore are the characteristic notes and measures to distinguish a counsel evangelical from the laws and commandments of Jesus Christ.

The Notes of Difference between Counsels and Commandments evangelical.

1. Where there is no negative expressed or involved, there it cannot be a law; but it is a counsel evangelical. For in every law there is a degree of duty so necessary, that every thing less than it, is a direct act or state of sin: and therefore, if the law be affirmative, the negative is included, and is the sanction of the main duty. "Honour thy father and mother," that is a law: for the lowest step of the duty there enjoined is bound upon us by this negative, "Thou shalt not curse thy father or mother:" or, "Thou shalt not deny to give them maintenance, thou shalt not dishonour them, not slight, not undervalue, not reproach, not upbraid, not be rude or disobedient to them:" whenever such a negative is included, that is the indication of a law. But in counsels evangelical, there is nothing but what is affirmative. There are some who make themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven: that is the indication of a religious act or state: but the sanction if it is nothing that is negative, but this only; "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear,"—and, "Qui potest capere, capiat:" "He that can receive it, let him receive it:"—and, "He that hath power over his will, and hath so decreed in his heart, does well."—In commandments it is, "He that does the duty, does well; he that does not, does ill:" but in counsels it is, "He that does not, may do well; but he that does, does better:" as St. Paul discourses in the question of marriage;^d in which instance it is observable, that the comparison of celibate and marriage is not in the question of chastity, but in the question of religion, one is not a better chastity than the other. Marriage is κοίτη ἀμίαντος, "an undefiled state;" and nothing can be cleaner than that which is not at all unclean; but the advantages of celibate above marriage, as they are accidental and contingent, so they are relative to times and persons and states, and external ministries: for to be made a "eunuch for the kingdom of heaven," is the same that St. Paul means by, "the unmarried careth for the things of the Lord;" that is, in these times of trouble and persecution, they who are not entangled in the affairs of a household, can better travel from place to place in the ministries of the gospel, they can better attend to the present necessities of the church, which are called "the things of the Lord," or "the affairs of the kingdom of heaven:" but at no hand does it mean, that the state of single life is, of itself, a counsel evangelical, or a further degree of chastity, but of an advantageous ministry to the propagation of the gospel. But be it so, or be it otherwise; yet it is a counsel and no law, because it hath no negative part in its constitution, or next appendage.

11. (2.) When the action or state is propounded to us only upon the account of reward, and there is no penalty annexed, then it is a counsel and no law: for there is no legislative power where there is no coercitive: and it is but a precarious government, where the lawgiver cannot make the subject either do good or suffer evil: and therefore the "jus gladii" and the "merum imperium" are all one: and he that makes a law and does not compel the involuntary, does but petition the subject to obey, and must be content he shall do it, when he hath a mind to it. But therefore as soon as men made laws, and lived in communities, they made swords to coerce the private, and wars to restrain the public, irregularities of the world.

For it was impossible to preserve justice, or to defend the innocent, or to make obedience to laws, if the consuls lay aside their rods and axes; and so it is in the Divine laws; the Divine power and the Divine wisdom make the Divine laws, and fear is the first sanction of them: it is the beginning of all our wisdom, and all human power being an imitation of and emanation from the Divine power, is in the sum of affairs nothing but this; "Habere potestatem gladii ad animadvertendum in facinorosos homines;" and therefore we conclude it to be no law, to the breaking of which no penalty is annexed: and therefore it was free to St. Paul to take or not to take wages of the Corinthian church; for if he had taken it, it had been nothing but the making of his glorying void; that is, he could not have had the pleasure of obliging them by an uncommanded instance and act of kindness. Hope and reward are the endearment of counsels; fear and punishment are the ligatures of laws.

12. (3.) In counsels sometimes the contrary is very evil:—Thus to be industrious and holy, zealous and prudent, in the offices ecclesiastical, and to take holy orders in the days of persecution and discouragement, is an instance of love, I doubt not, very pleasing and acceptable to God; and yet he that suffers himself to be discouraged from that particular employment, and to divert to some other instance in which he may well serve God, may remain very innocent or excusable: but those in the primitive church, who so feared the persecution or the employment, that they cut off their thumbs or ears to make themselves canonically incapable, were highly culpable; because he that does an act contrary to the design of counsel evangelical is an enemy to the virtue and the grace of the intendment: he that only lets it alone, does not indeed venture for the greater reward; but he may pursue the same virtue in another instance or in a less degree, but yet so as may be accepted. He that is diverted by his fear and danger, and dares not venture,—hath a pitiable, but, in many cases, an innocent infirmity; but he that does against it, hath an inexcusable passion; and is so much more blamable than the other, by how much a fierce enemy is worse than a cold friend, or a neuter more tolerable than he that stands in open hostility and defiance. But in laws, not only the contrary, but even the privative, is also criminal: for not only he that oppresses the poor, is guilty of the breach of charity, but he that does not relieve them; because there is in laws an affirmative and a negative part; and both of them have obligation; so that in laws both omissions and commissions are sins; but where nothing is faulty but a contrariety or hostility, and that the omission is innocent, there it is only a counsel.

13. (4.) In internal actions there is properly and directly no counsel,—but a law only: counsels of perfections are commonly the great and more advantageous prosecutions of an internal grace or virtue: but the inward cannot be hindered by any thing from without, and therefore is capable of all increase and all instances only upon the account of love; the greatest degree of which is not greater than the commandment: and yet the least degree, if it be sincere, is even with the commandment: because it is according to the capacity and greatness of the man. But the inward grace, in all its degrees, is under a law or commandment, not that the highest is necessary at all times, and to every person; but that we put no positive bars or periods to it at any time, but love as much as we can to-day, and as much as we can to-morrow, and still the duty and the words to have a current sense: and “as much as we can” must signify “still more and more;” now the using of direct and indirect ministries for the increasing of the inward grace, this I say, because it hath in it materiality and an external part, and is directly subjeible to the proper empire of the will: this may be the matter of counsel in the more eminent and zealous instances, but the inward grace directly is not. To be just consists in an indivisible point, and therefore it is always a law; but if to signify and act our justice we give that which is due, and a great deal more to make it quite sure, this is the matter of counsel; for it is the external prosecution of the inward grace, and although this hath many degrees, yet that hath; and therefore that hath liberty and choice, whereas in this there is nothing but duty and necessity.

RULE XIII.

Some things may be used in the Service of God which are not commanded in any Law, nor explicitly commended in any Doctrine of Jesus Christ.

1. This rule is intended to regulate the conscience in all those questions, which scrupulous and superstitious people make in their inquiries for warranties from Scripture in every action they do,—and in the use of such actions in the service of God; for which particulars because they have no word, they think they have no warrant, and that the actions are superstitious. The inquiry then hath two parts;

1. Whether we are to require from Scripture warrant for every action we do, in common life.

2. Whether we may not do or use any thing in religion, concerning which we have no express word in Scripture, and no commandment at all.

1. Concerning the first the inquiry is but short, because there is no difficulty in it, but what is made by ignorance and jealousy; and it can be answered and made evident by common sense, and the perpetual experience and the natural necessity of things. For the laws of Jesus Christ were intended to regulate human actions in the great lines of religion, justice, and sobriety, in which as there are infinite particulars which are to be conducted by reason and by analogy to the laws and rules given by Jesus Christ; so it is certain that as the general lines and rules are to be understood by reason how far they do oblige, so by the same we can know where they do. But we shall quickly come to issue in this affair. For if for every thing there is a law or an advice; let them that think so find it out and follow it. If there be not for every thing such provision, their own needs will yet become their law-giver, and force them to do it without a law. Whether a man shall speak French or English; whether baptized persons are to be dipped all over the body, or will it suffice that the head be plunged; whether thrice or once; whether in water of the spring, or the water of the pool; whether a man shall marry, or abstain; whether eat flesh or herbs; choose Titius or Caius for my friend; be a scholar or a merchant, a physician or a lawyer; drink wine or ale; take physic for prevention, or let it alone; give to his servant a great pension, or a competent;—what can the Holy Scriptures have to do with any thing of these, or any thing of like nature and indifferency?

2. For by nature all things are indulged to our use and liberty; and they so remain till God, by a supervening law, hath made restraints in some instances to become matter of obedience to him, and of order and usefulness to the world; but therefore where the law does not restrain, we are still free as the elements, and may move as freely and indifferently as the atoms in the eye of the sun. And there is infinite difference between law and lawful; indeed there is nothing that is a law to our consciences but what is bound upon us by God, and consigned in Holy Scripture (as I shall in the next rule demonstrate); but therefore every thing else is permitted or lawful, that is not by law restrained: liberty is before restraint; and till the fetters are put upon us, we are under no law and no necessity, but what is natural. But if there can be any natural necessities, we cannot choose but obey them, and for these there needs no law or warrant from Scripture. No master needs to tell us or to give us signs to know when we are hungry or athirst: and there can be as little need that a lawgiver should give us a command to eat, when we are in great necessity so to do. Every thing is to be permitted to its own cause and proper principle; nature and her needs are sufficient to cause us to do that which is for her preservation; right reason and experience are competent warrant and instruction to conduct our affairs of liberty and common life; but the matter and design of laws is ‘honestè vivere, alterum non lædere, suum cuique tribuere;’ or as it is more perfectly described by the apostle, that we should “live a godly, righteous, sober life,” and beyond these there needs no law. When nature is sufficient, Jesus Christ does not interpose; and unless it be where reason is defective or violently abused, we cannot need laws of self-preservation, for that is the sanction and great band and endearment of all laws: and therefore there is no express law against self-murder in all the New Testament: only it is there and every where else by supposition; and the laws take care to forbid that, as they take care of fools and madmen; men that have no use or benefit of their reason, or of their natural necessities and inclinations, must be taken under the protection of others; but else when a man is in his wits, or in his reason, he is defended in many things, and instructed in more, without the help or need of laws: nay, it was need and reason that first introduced laws; for no law, but necessity and right reason, taught the first ages, more safe:” and since laws were not “the first inducers of these great transactions, it is certain they need not now to enforce them, or become our warrant to do that, without which we cannot be what we cannot choose but desire to be.

3. But if nothing were to be done but what we have Scripture for, either commanding or commending, it were certain that with a less hyperbole than St. John used, “the world could not contain the books which should be written;” and yet in such infinite numbers of laws and sentences no man could be directed competently, because his rule and guide would be too big: and every man, in the inquiry after lawful and unlawful, would be just so enlightened, as he that must for ever remain blind, unless he take the sun in his hand to search into all the corners of darkness; no candlestick would hold him, and no eye could use him. But supposing that in all things we are to be guided by Scripture, then from thence also let us inquire for a conduct or determination even in this inquiry;—Whether we may not do any thing without a warrant from Scripture? And the result will be, that if we must not do any thing without the warrant of Scripture, then we must not for every thing look in Scripture for a warrant; because we have from Scripture sufficient instruction, that we should not be so foolish and importune, as to require from thence a warrant for such things, in which we are by other instruments competently instructed, or left at perfect liberty.

4. Thus St. Paul affirms, “All things are lawful for me;” he speaks of meats and drinks, and things left in liberty, concerning which, because there is no law, (and if there had been one under Moses, it was taken away by Christ,) it is certain that every thing was lawful, because there was no law forbidding it: and when St. Paul said, “This speak I, not the Lord;” he that did according to that speaking, did according to his own liberty, not according to the word of the Lord; and St. Paul’s saying in that manner is so far from being a warranty to us from Christ,—that because he said true, therefore we are certain he had no warranty from Christ, nothing but his own reasonable conjecture. But when our blessed Saviour said, “And why of yourselves do ye not judge what is right?” he plainly enough said, that to our own reason and judgment many things are permitted, which are not conducted by laws or express declarations of God.

Add to this, that because it is certain in all theology, that “whatsoever is not of faith, is sin,” that is, whatsoever is done against our actual persuasion becomes to us a sin, though, of itself, it were not; and that we can become a law unto ourselves, by vows and promises, and voluntary engagements and opinions,—it follows, that those things which of themselves infer no duty, and have in them nothing but a collateral and accidental necessity, are permitted to us to do as we please, and are in their own nature indifferent, and may be so also in use and exercise: and if we take that which is the less perfect part in a counsel evangelical, it must needs be such a thing as is neither commanded nor commended, for nothing of it is commanded at all; and that which is commended, is the more not the less perfect part; and yet that we may do that less perfect part, of which there is neither a commandment nor a commendation, but a permission only, appears at large in St. Paul's^f discourse concerning virginity and marriage. But a permission is nothing but a not prohibiting, and that is lawful which is not unlawful, and every thing may be done that is not forbidden; and there are very many things which are not forbidden, nor commanded; and therefore they are only lawful and no more.

5. But the case in short is this; In Scripture, there are many laws and precepts of holiness, there are many prohibitions and severe cautions, against impiety; and there are many excellent measures of good and evil, of perfect and imperfect: whatsoever is good, we are obliged to pursue; whatsoever is forbidden, must be declined; whatsoever is laudable, must be loved, and followed after. Now if all that we are to do can come under one of these measures, when we see it, there is nothing more for us to do but to conform our actions accordingly. But if there be many things which cannot be fitted by these measures, and yet cannot be let alone; it will be a kind of madness to stand still, and to be useless to ourselves and to all the world, because we have not a command or a warrant to legitimate an action which no lawgiver ever made unlawful.

6. But this folly is not gone far abroad into the world; for the number of madmen is not many, though possibly the number of the very wise is less: but that which is of difficulty, is this,

Quest. Whether in matters of religion, we have that liberty, as in matters of common life?—or whether is not every thing of religion determined by the laws of Jesus Christ, or may we choose something to worship God withal, concerning which he hath neither given us commandment or intimation of his pleasure?

Of Will Worship.

To this I answer by several Propositions.

7. (1.) All favour is so wholly arbitrary, that whatsoever is an act of favour, is also an effect of choice, and perfectly voluntary. Since therefore that God accepts any thing from us, is not at all depending upon the merit of the work, or the natural proportion of it to God, or that it can add any moments of felicity to him, it must be so wholly depending upon the will of God, that it must have its being and abiding only from thence. He that shall appoint with what God shall be worshipped, must appoint what that is by which he shall be pleased; which because it is unreasonable to suppose, it must follow that all the integral constituent parts of religion, all the fundamentals and essentials of the Divine worship, cannot be warranted to us by nature, but are primarily communicated to us by revelation. “Deum sic colere oportet, quomodo ipse se colendum præcepit,” said St. Austin.^g Who can tell what can please God, but God himself? for to be pleased, is to have something that is agreeable to our wills and our desires: now of God's will there can be no signification but God's word or declaration; and therefore by nothing can he be worshipped, but by what himself hath declared that he is well pleased with: and therefore when he sent his eternal Son into the world, and he was to be the great Mediator between God and man, the great instrument of reconciling us to God, the great Angel that was to present all our prayers, the only Beloved by whom all that we were to do would be accepted, God was pleased with voices from heaven and mighty demonstrations of the Spirit to tell all the world that by him he would be reconciled,—in him he would be worshipped,—through him he would be invoked,—for his sake he would accept us,—under him he would be obeyed,—in his instances and commandments he would be loved and served; saying, “This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.”

8. (2.) Now it matters not by what means God does convey the notices of his pleasure; ποικίλως καὶ πολυτρόπως, “in sundry ways and in sundry manners” God manifests his will unto the world: so we know it to be his will, it matters not whether by nature, or by revelation, by intuitive and direct notices, or by argument or consequent deduction, by Scripture or by tradition, we come to know what he requires and what is good in his eyes; only we must not do it of our own head. To worship God is an act of obedience and of duty, and therefore must suppose a commandment; and is not of our choice, save only that we must choose to obey. On this God forewarned his people: he gave them a law,^h and commanded them to obey that entirely without addition or diminution; neither more or less than it; “Whatsoever I command you, observe to do it; thou shalt not add thereto nor diminish from it:” and again; “Ye shall not do after all the things that we do here this day, every man whatsoever is right in his own eyes:” that is, “This is your law that is given by God; make no laws to yourselves or to one another, beyond the measure and limits of what I have given you; nothing but this is to be the measure of your obedience and of the Divine pleasure.” So that in the Old Testament there is an express prohibition of any worship of their own choosing; all is unlawful, but what God hath chosen and declared.

9. (3.) In the New Testament we are still under the same charge; and ἐθελοθρησκεία, or “will worship,” is a word of an ill sound amongst christians most generally, meaning thereby the same thing which God forbade in Deuteronomy, viz. ἐκαστος τὸ ἀρεστὸν ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ πράττει, as the LXX expresses it, “when every man does that” no which God commands or loves, but “which men upon their own fancies and inventions think good, that “which seems good in their own eyes;” or as our blessed Saviourⁱ more fully, “teaching for doctrine trines the traditions, the injunctions or commandments of men:" the instance declares the meaning. The Pharisees did use to wash their hands before meat, cleanse the outside of cups and dishes, they washed when they came from the judgment-hall; and these they commanded men to do, saying that by such things God was worshipped and well-pleased. So that these two together, and indeed each of them severally, is will-worship in the culpable sense. He that says, "An action which God hath not commanded, is of itself necessary;" he that says, "God is rightly worshipped by an act or ceremony, concerning which himself hath no way expressed his pleasure,"—is superstitious, or a will-worshipper. The first sins against charity; the second against religion: the first sins directly against his neighbour; the second against God: the first lays a snare for his neighbour's foot; the second cuts off a dog's neck, and presents it to God: the first is a violation of christian liberty; the other accuses Christ's law of imperfection. So that thus far we are certain, 1. That nothing is necessary but what is commanded by God. 2. Nothing is pleasing to God in religion that is merely of human invention. 3. That the commandments of men cannot become the doctrines of God, that is, no direct parts of the religion, no rule or measures of conscience.

10. But because there are many actions, which are not under command, by which God in all ages had been served and delighted, and yet may as truly be called ἐθελοθρησκεία, or "will-worship," as any thing else, and the name is general and indefinite, and may signify a new religion, or a free-will offering, an uncommanded general or an uncommanded particular, that is, in a good sense or in a bad, we must make a more particular separation of one from the other, and not call every thing superstitious that is in any sense a will-worship, but only that which is really and distinctly forbidden, not that which can be signified by such a word which sometimes means that which is laudable, sometimes that which is culpable. Therefore,

What voluntary or uncommanded Actions are lawful or commendable.

11. (1.) Those things which men do, or teach to be done, by a probable interpretation of what is doubtful or ambiguous, are not will-worship in the culpable sense.—God said to the Jews, that they should rest, or keep a sabbath, upon the seventh day. How far this rest was to be extended, was to be taught and impressed not by the law, but by the interpretation of it; and therefore when the doctors of the Jews had rationally and authoritatively determined how far a sabbath day's journey was to extend, they who strictly would observe that measure which God described not, but the doctors did interpret, all that while were not to be blamed, or put off with a "Quis requisivit?" "Who hath required these things at your hands?" for they were, all that while, in the pursuance and in the understanding of a commandment. But when the Jew, in Synesius, who was the pilot of a ship, let go the helm in the even of his sabbath, and did lie still till the next even, and refused to guide the ship, though in danger of shipwreck, he was a superstitious fool, and did not expound but prevaricate the commandment. This is to be extended to all probable interpretations so far, that, if the determination happen to be on the side of error, yet the consequent action is not superstitious, if the error itself be not criminal. Thus when the fathers of the primitive church did expound the sixth chapter of St. John's gospel of sacramental manducation; though they erred in the exposition, yet they thought they served God in giving the holy communion to infants: and though that was not a worship which God had appointed, yet it was not superstition, because it was (or for aught we know was) an innocent interpretation of the doubtful words of a commandment. From good nothing but good can proceed, and from an innocent principle nothing but what is innocent in the effect. In fine, whatsoever is an interpretation of a commandment, is but the way of understanding God's will, not an obtruding of our own; always provided the interpretation be probable, and that the gloss do not corrupt the text.

12. (2.) Whatsoever is an equal and reasonable definition or determination of what God hath left in our powers, is not an act of a culpable will-worship or superstition.—Thus it is permitted to us to choose the office of a bishop, or to let it alone; to be a minister of the gospel, or not to be a minister. If a man shall suppose that by his own abilities, his inclination, the request of his friends, the desires of the people, and the approbation of the church, he is called by God to this ministry, that he should please God in so doing, and glorify his name, although he hath no command or law for so doing, but is still at his liberty, yet if he will determine himself to this service, he is not superstitious or a will-worshipper in this his voluntary and chosen service, because he determines by his power and the liberty that God gives him, to a service which in the general is pleasing to God; so that it is but voluntary in his person, the thing itself is of Divine institution.

13. (3.) Whatsoever is done by prudent counsel about those things which belong to piety and charity, is not will-worship or superstition.—Thus when there is a commandment to worship God with our body; if we bow the head, if we prostrate ourselves on the ground, or fall flat on our face, if we travel up and down for the service of God, even to weariness and diminution of our strengths, if we give our bodies to be burned, though in these things there is no commandment, yet neither is there superstition, though we design them to the service of God; because that which we do voluntarily, is but the appendage, or the circumstance, or the instance, of that which is not voluntary, but imposed by God.

14. (4.) Every instance that is uncommanded, if it be the act or exercise of what is commanded, is both of God's choosing and of man's; it is voluntary and it is imposed; this in the general, that in the particular. Upon this account, the voluntary institution of the Rechabites in drinking no wine, and building no houses, but dwelling in tents, was pleasing to
